

✓ 100530

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

<http://archive.org/details/nation162jannewy>

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE,
FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE,
DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED, 1865

102530

VOLUME 162

JANUARY 5, 1946, to JUNE 29, 1946

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, INC.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK 7

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE,
FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE,
DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED, 1865

VOLUME 165

JANUARY 2, 1946, to JUNE 23, 1946

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, INC.
20 VESKY STREET, NEW YORK 2

INDEX TO VOLUME 162

JANUARY 5, 1946, to JUNE 29, 1946

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

- A Art
Arc Architecture
C Correspondence
CH Chart
C Cartoon
D Drama
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages	Pages
1-28 January 5	385-412 April 6
29-56 January 12	413-448 April 13
57-84 January 19	449-492 April 20
85-112 January 26	493-520 April 27
113-132 February 2	521-556 May 4
133-160 February 9	557-584 May 11
161-188 February 16	585-612 May 18
189-216 February 23	613-640 May 25
217-244 March 1	641-676 June 1
245-272 March 8	677-704 June 8
273-300 March 15	705-732 June 15
301-328 March 22	733-768 June 22
329-356 March 29	769-796 June 29
357-384 March 30

A	PAGE
AMG. See Allied military government
A.V.C. See American veterans' committee
Adams, Mildred
Philippine aftermath; S.....	38, 95, 163
Poor young art of radio; the; S.....	544
Adamson, Ernie. See Committee on un-American activities
Aeronautics. See Aviation
Aftermath. L. MacGee; P.....	756
Agee, James
Best films of 1945.....	81;
See also.....	205
Movie news.....	580
Reviews of motion pictures:
At land.....	269
Bedlam.....	334
Bells of St. Mary's, the.....	701
Blue dahlia, the.....	701
Cluny Brown.....	701
Cornered.....	205
Days and nights.....	580
Deadline at dawn.....	516
Devotion.....	516
From this day forward.....	516
Green years, the.....	516
Her kind of man.....	701
Hymn of the nations.....	580
It happened at the inn.....	205
Kid from Brooklyn, the.....	636
Make mine music.....	516
Meshes of the afternoon.....	269
Murder, my sweet.....	205
Night in Casablanca, a.....	636
Open city.....	354, 443, 516
Portrait of a woman.....	580
Postman always rings twice, the.....	580
Reactor of the rose.....	765
Spiral staircase, the.....	354
Stranger, the.....	765
Study in choreography for camera, a.....	269
They were expendable.....	354
Three strangers.....	354
Vacation from marriage.....	354
Walk in the sun, a.....	24
Without reservations.....	701
Agencies, governmental. See United States; names of agencies Agriculture
American wheat export program, the; E.....	772
America's responsibility for helping to feed the starving abroad. I. F. Stone; S.....	335, 361; see also.....
EP.....	193; E.....
Anderson, C. P., opposes rationing or mandatory restrictions to increase food shipments abroad; EP.....	414;
see also E.....	451
Case of the seasonal farm laborer, the. C. McWilliams; S.....	343;
see also C.....	582
Nature of farmers and farming, the. J. Hearst; S.....	508
Parity price and inflation. K. Hutchinson; S.....	427
Truman restricts the use of wheat in order to increase shipments to Europe and Asia. K. Hutchinson; S.....	196;
see also EP.....	181; EP.....
Air power. See Aviation
Aitken, Webster. B. H. Haggin; M.....	25, 270, 354

Akers, Milburn P.	PAGE
Twilight of Boss Kelly; S.....	425
What are Stassen's chances? S.....	777
Alabama
Primary elections; EP.....	585;
see also.....	648
Albencio trio, the. B. H. Haggin; M.....	25
Alcoa. See Aluminum company of America
Alexander, Leon
California labor school, the; C.....	411
Alexander, Raymond Pace
Haiti's bid for freedom; S.....	534
Allied military government
Officer of, rebuts "AMG — Innocents abroad" by S. K. Padover; C.....	27
Orders nazi-inspired books to be burned in Germany; EP.....	614
Altamira, Rafael, nominated for the UN international court; EP.....	57
Aluminum company of America
Agrees to license its patents to competitors. I. F. Stone; S.....	90
Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
Ciano diaries, the; S.....	74
Congress of the U. S. T. S.....	509
Czechoslovakia's political and economic recovery; S.....	129, 529, 570, 600
Dinner with Herriot; S.....	461
First impressions of France; S.....	262
France after de Gaulle; S.....	370
France moves to nationalize the electric gas industries; S.....	334
Franco's zero hour; S.....	279;
see also E.....	275
French attitude on the question of the Ruhr, the; S.....	317
French elections, the; S.....	691;
see also E.....	709;
French reaction to Churchill's speech at Fulton, the; S.....	317
Giral, J., proposes to enlarge the Spanish government in exile; S.....	18;
see also 346; EP.....	357
Hitler's testament; S.....	45
Interview with Francois Billoux; S.....	509
Mexico's right-wing press attacks his articles on the elections; S.....	101
New French cabinet, the; S.....	712
Peron's "descamisados" prepare for the elections; S.....	18
Placisite for Spain; S.....	197
Portrait of the Spanish pretender; S.....	101
Secretariat of the UN, the; S.....	423;
Socialism and Europe's fate; S.....	730
see also E.....	730
Trujillo's proposal to name a Dominican town "Franklin D. Roosevelt" is rejected by the State department; S.....	775
Western Catholic bloc, the; S.....	745
Who's who in the White press; S.....	656
Why Britain wants Franco; S.....	169
World federation of trade unions, the; S.....	101
Yankee dollar and Europe's trend toward socialism, the; S.....	679
America. See United States
American culture; EP.....	679
American federation of musicians
Petrillo, J. C., bans broadcasts of radio programs including music from foreign stations; EP.....	3
American legion
Stelle, J., charges a breakdown in the Veterans administration and demands the removal of General O. Bradley; EP.....	155
Veterans new veterans' organizations. W. Price; S.....	623
American missionary association
Institute of race relations to convene. C. S. Johnson; C.....	674
American relief for Europe; EP.....	27
Seeks clothes contributions. F. Gilliam; C.....	384
American tobacco company
Its workers now on strike for higher wages. K. Korstad; C.....	240
Annual convention, the. J. S. Atlee; S.....	746
Attacked by W. Pegler; EP.....	246
Defends marines jailed for protesting the slowness of demobilization; EP.....	246
Its structure; program. W. Price; S.....	623
Amvets. W. Price; S.....	623
Anderson, Clinton P. See Agriculture
Angell, Norman
Leftism in the atomic age; S.....	564;
see also E.....	561;
Anti-Semitism. See Jewry
Anti-trust laws. See Monopolies
Antigone. J. W. Krutch; D.....	269
Arab league. See Pan-Arab league
Arendt, Hannah
French existentialism; S.....	226
Argentina
And the Uruguayan proposal of collective intervention against regimes which threaten hemisphere security. F. Kirchwey; S.....	156; see also E.....

Argentine-Soviet rapprochement; EP.....	PAGE
Hidden German assets reported by the F.E.A. I. F. Stone; S.....	278
Memorandum of The Nation associates requesting its suspension from the UN; E.....	88
2. Nazi-fascist pattern, the.....	142
3. The impossible candidate.....	151
Nazi colony in the south turns "Swiss"; EP.....	413
New order, the. V. Prewett; S.....	685
Peron nationalizes the Central bank. F. Kirchwey; S.....	388; see also.....
Peron: South American Hitler. S. Ross; S.....	189; see also EP.....
Peron's "descamisados" prepare for the elections. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	101;
see also EP.....	57; 141
Report on the elections. F. Kirchwey; S.....	249, 277, 362; see also EP.....
United States blue book, the; E.....	212;
see also EP.....	495
Armour, Richard
Next; P.....	16
Poor but honest; P.....	744
Remember? P.....	344
Army, United States. See United States—Army
Arstark, Lester D.
Comments on The Nation Associates' memorandum on Argentina; C.....	299
Art (articles by C. Greenberg)
Exhibitions:
American abstract artists.....	444
Beckmann, Max.....	610
Bloom, Hyman.....	109
Chagall, Marc.....	610
De Niro, Robert.....	532
Gauguin, Paul.....	532
Gorky, Arshile.....	176
Hare, David.....	109
Spiciter, Jacques.....	109
Motherwell, Robert.....	727
O'Keeffe, Georgia.....	444
Pollock, Jackson.....	792
School of Paris, the.....	109
Smith, David.....	294;
Weston, Edward, photography.....	518
see also C.....	241;
Whitney annual, the.....	327
see also C.....	24
Paintings brought here from German museums for safekeeping will not be exhibited.....	24
Associated American artists. T. Gale; C.....	327;
see also.....	241
Associated press
Refuses to make its service available to the State department's Office of international information and cultural affairs; EP.....	88
Association of limb manufacturers, the
Indicted for conspiracy to fix prices on artificial limbs; EP.....	2
At land. I. Agee; MP.....	269
At the Indian killer's grave. R. Lowell; P.....	752
Athletics. See Sports
Atlee, John S.
A. V. C. sets the pace; S.....	740
Atomic energy
And atomic spies in Canada; E.....	247, 360; see also 336; C.....
And medical research. L. N. Ridenour; S.....	256; see also EP.....
Baruch, B. M. submits UN Atomic State plan for United Nations control; E.....	735
Civilian or military control? T. Coffin; S.....	187; see also 256; E.....
S.....	360; 436; EP.....
Leftism in the atomic age. N. Angell; S.....	564 see also E.....
Gromyko, A., submits the Soviet plan for United Nations control; E.....	771
United Nations report, the. L. F. Stone; S.....	390, 582; see also C.....
McMahon bill, the. I. F. Stone; S.....	454;
see also EP.....	677; 741
Recommendations of the Moscow conference. F. Kirchwey; S.....	314
Sleepless beauty. Low; C.....	5
State department report, the. I. F. Stone; S.....	390, 418
UN sets up an atomic-power commission. F. Kirchwey; S.....	116;
see also E.....	890; E.....
Atlee, Clement. See Great Britain
Austin, Warren R., named to succeed E. R. Stettinius as U. S. representative to the United Nations security council; EP.....	707
Austria
Economic and political life under the Allied control council; EP.....	275
Russia seizes control of industrial enterprises in the eastern region; EP.....	275

PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Aviation		Extension of OPA: E.....304;		Cluny Brown, J. Agee; MP.....	701
Air transport's growing pains. K. Hutchison; S.....	749	see also EP.....301; EP.....449;		Coal
Anglo-American air-transport conference in Bermuda, the. K. Hutchison; S.....168;	209	EP.....493; 500; E.....523; EP.....559;		Britain's plan for nationalization of the mines. A. Vallance; S.....	69
see also EP.....		567; EP.....587; EP.....613; EP.....643;		Obstacles to a settlement of the strike: EP.....495; see also 528; EP.....559; EP.....585; E.....616;	617
B		E.....708; E.....736; 741; 774		Strike settlement; EP.....	677
Baizer, Ashur		A. Friendly; S.....	261	Coburn, F. W.
Was at Lichfield; S.....	715	Is there a buyer's strike? EP.....	770	Comments on "Guide to the primaries" by R. Bendiner; C.....794; see also.....	648
Balanchine, George, choreographies. B. H. Haggins; S.....138, 297, 409		Statement by B. M. Baruch; EP.....	386	Coffin, Tris
Balkan states		Wages and production. B. Fischer; S.....	223	Congress clears the calendar; S.....	741
Compromise at Moscow meeting of the foreign ministers. F. Kirchwey; S.....	5	What will your dollar buy in 1946? A. Friendly; S.....	13	Housing lobby, the; S.....	340
Ballet, russe de Monte Carlo. B. H. Haggins; S.....138, 297, 409, 673		Profits:		Labor fight on Capitol hill, the; S.....617; see also E.....680; 681; EP.....	733
Ballet theater. B. H. Haggins; S.....673, 728		In the steel industry. E. Jones; S.....119; see also	214	Murdering the OPA, by amendment; S.....500, 567; see also EP.....493; EP.....	559
Barrett, Jack		Stock-market boom. K. Hutchison; S.....73; see also EP.....	88	Save-price-control campaign, the; S.....	774
Crossword puzzles		World bank and fund. See International bank for reconstruction and development		Truman's lost weekend: his speech on the railroad strike; S.....	645;
36, 84, 112, 140, 180, 208, 244, 272, 300, 328, 356, 384, 412, 448, 491, 519, 555, 583, 611, 639, 675, 703, 731, 767, 795		Yankee dollar and Europe's trend toward socialism, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	169	Washington's atomic war; S.....	187
Barsky, Edward K. See Joint anti-fascist refugee committee		Byrnes, James F. See United States—State department		Cole, George
Barlett, E. L.		C		Comments on C. Greenberg's review of the Weston exhibition; C.....518; see also.....	294
Comments on "The far north: international frontier" by D. M. Lebourdais; C.....179; see also	42	C.G.T. See France		Cole, Stewart G.
Baruch, Bernard M.		C.I.O. See Congress of industrial organizations		University of Southern California and the Pacific coast council on intercultural education to hold summer workshop; C.....	492
Presents the United States plan for United Nations control of atomic energy; E.....	735	CRALOG. See Council of relief agencies licensed for operation in Germany		Commager, Henry Steele
Statement on wages and prices; EP.....	386	California labor school, the. L. Alexander; C.....	411	Don't believe anything you read! S.....	463
Baxter, Rufus		Negro householders in Los Angeles contest restrictive covenants. C. McWilliams; S.....	690	Commerce. See Business
Arabia Britannica; S.....	125	Primary elections. R. Bendiner; S.....	707	Committee on Un-American activities
Beckmann, Max, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....	610	see also EP.....	742	Adams, E., attacks the National committee to combat anti-Semitism; EP.....	114
Bedlam, J. Agee; MP.....	354	Warren E., defeats R. W. Kenny for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination. C. McWilliams; S.....	742	Adamson, E., protests the use of the word democracy to describe the American government; EP.....	209
Belgium		Camp in the Prussian forest, a. R. Jarrell; C.....	756	Calls G. L. K. Smith; EP.....155; see also EP.....	209
Election results. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	262	Canus, Albert, and the existentialist movement. H. Arendt; S.....	226	Launches witchhunt against the joint anti-fascist refugee committee; EP.....58; see also EP.....114; EP.....	209
Bells of St. Mary's, the. J. Agee; MP.....	24	Canada		Communist party
Bender, Robert		Arrests Canadian citizens for revealing atomic information to Soviet agents; E.....247, 360; see also 536; C.....	554	And Browder's mission to Moscow. R. Spruille Braden; S.....	568
Browder's mission to Moscow; S.....	568	Far north: international frontier. D. M. Lebourdais; S.....42; see also C.....	179	Expels E. Browder; S.....	211
Guide to the primaries; S.....648; see also C.....	794	Literature today. R. L. Weaver; S.....	198	Murray, P., formulates CIO policy on Communists in the trade unions; EP.....	614
Spruille Braden; S.....	215	Candler, Demetrio. See Spain	487	Confédération générale du travail. See France
Benes, Eduard. See Czechoslovakia		Cartels. See Monopolies		Congress
Bethlehem Bach choir. B. H. Haggins; M.....	354	Cartoons		Clears the calendar. T. Coffin; S.....	741
Billaux, François. See France		Delegates arrive, the. Low.....	91	Elections:
Black, Algernon D.		Haunted queue, the. Low.....	36	Primaries, the. R. Bendiner; S.....648; see also EP.....585; EP.....707; EP.....734; 742; C.....	794
Black, Hugo L. See Supreme court, United States		He prefers sand-castle. Low.....	95	In anti-labor mood. T. Coffin; S.....617; see also E.....89; E.....680; 681
Blind leading the halt, the. R. Lowell; P.....	694	Pictures from the UN gallery; Low.....	260	Northwest's liberal bloc, the. R. L. Neuberger; S.....	309
Bloom, Hyman, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....	109	Resolutions for 1946. Low.....	70	Record of the first session; E.....	3
Blue dahlia, the. J. Agee; MP.....	701	Sleepless beauty. Low.....	314	Report of the committee on reorganization; E.....	305
Bogomolets, A. See Medicine		"Sticks and stones may break my bones." Low.....	318	Senate filibuster against the FEPC; E.....89; see also EP.....115; 158
Born yesterday. J. W. Krutch; D.....	205	Temporary Elysia. Low.....	167	Congress of industrial organizations
Bowles, Chester A. See Price administration, office of		Toward Anschluss.....	776	Murray, P., formulates policy on Communists in the trade unions; EP.....	614
Braden, Spruille		Case bill, the. See Labor—Strikes		"Operation Dixie"; EP.....	450
Calls for multilateral American action against regimes that threaten the security of the western hemisphere; E.....88; see also 116; 156; E.....212; 215		Chagall, Marc, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....	671	Political action committee:
Profile, a. R. Bendiner; S.....	215	Chase, Stuart		Announces list of congressional campaigns in which it will play an active role; EP.....	585
Brady, General. See Veterans, war Bretton Woods monetary agreement. See World bank and monetary fund		Calling all social scientists; S.....538; see also C.....638; C.....	674	Southern Democrats charge it with attempting to take over the party; E.....	417
Britain. See Great Britain		Chicago		Connecticut
British empire. See Great Britain		China		Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S.....	648
Broadcasting. See Radio		All parties accept an expanded state council as supreme governing body until the new constitution is adopted; EP.....113; see also EP.....	154	Conscientious objectors for amnesty formed. A. J. Muste; C.....	326
Brooks, Howard		Appeal for unity by a group of Chinese students; C.....	55	Conscription. See United States—Army
Unitarian service committee's work in aiding war victims abroad; C.....	139	Civil war in Manchuria; E.....245; see also 331; E.....496; EP.....	769	Cooperatives
Browder, Earl. See Communist party		Consultative council reaches an agreement on nationalizing the Kuomintang and Communist military forces; EP.....113; see also EP.....154; EP.....	274	Congress studies a proposal to tax them. P. Greer; S.....	40
Broz, Josip (Tito). See Yugoslavia		Marshall, General G. C., returns to try for a new Kuomintang-Communist understanding; E.....496; see also EP.....559; EP.....	769	Swedish co-ops' post-war plans. K. Hutchison; S.....	225
Bryan, Helen R. See Joint anti-fascist refugee committee		Nationalist government controls the distribution of UNRRA relief supplies. C. D. Lealtad; C.....	794	Corbett, Percy E.
Buchanan, John		Papering for a settlement between the Kuomintang and the Communists; E.....	61	Can the UN keep the peace? S.....	336
Russia and Iran; C.....	582	Chrysler corporation, the		Corbett, J. Agee; MP.....	205
Budapest quartet, the. B. H. Haggins; M.....	25	Concludes wage negotiations with the United automobile workers; E.....	115	Council of relief agencies licensed for operation in Germany
Budget, public. See Finance, public		Church, Roman catholic. See Roman Catholic church		New organization is authorized to make relief shipments to Germany; EP.....	302
Business		Churchill, Winston		Workers call general strike in effort to force postponement of the Greek elections; EP.....	358
British loan, the; E.....155; see also 169; EP.....181; 316; EP.....451; E.....560; 590		His speech at Fulton, Missouri; E.....303; see also 306; 316; 317; C.....490; C.....	491	Critic, the. J. W. Krutch; D.....	700
Fair distribution of income. K. Hutchison; S.....	261	Ciano, Galeazzo, his diaries. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	74	Crossword puzzles. See Barrett, J.
Federal reserve board raises margin requirements for security purchases to 100 per cent; EP.....88; see also.....	73	City and country school		Comments on the exchange of letters between K. Martin and M. Lerner; C.....355; see also.....	251
Free enterprise in Tacoma. L. H. Gorett; C.....	411	New York police break up annual fair in gambling raid; EP.....	644	Czechoslovakia
French loan, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....169; see also 289; EP.....385; EP.....	677	Close clan, the. M. Van Doren; P.....	290	Benes, Eduard, national leader. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	129
Great Britain seeks to increase its export market. A. Vallance; S.....	69			Political and economic recovery. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....129, 529, 570, 600
N.A.M. launches an advertising campaign for public economy. K. Hutchison; S.....	345			Slovak problem, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	600
Prices:
And the shortage of consumers' goods. K. Hutchison; S.....	43
Bowles, C. A., given wider powers to enforce controls. P. Stone; S.....186,	214
Department of agriculture proposes a price increase for butter; EP.....	59

- D
- D.A.R. See Daughters of the American revolution
- Dalton, Georgia. A. Stevens; S. 687
- Dance. (the articles by B. H. Haggin)
Balanchine, George, choreographies. 138,
297, 409
- Ballet russe de Monte Carlo. 138, 297, 409, 673
- Ballet theater. 673, 728
- Dance index. 728
- School of American ballet. 138
- Daniell, Raymond; reveals in dispatches to the New York Times that Nazis retain their grip in Bavaria; EP. 521
- Daughters of the American revolution
Annual convention, the J. M. Morse; S. 661
- Luce, C. B., leads fight against organization's "white-artists-only" policy; EP. 522;
see also 661
- Days and nights, J. Agee; MP. 580
- Deadline at dawn, J. Agee; MP. 516
- Dean, Vire Michéles
Four Germans, the; S. 281;
see also EP. 359
- Wanted: a plan for Germany; S. 402
- Dean of the gods, the, R. Jarrell; P. 402
- De Gaulle, Charles. See France
- Del Vayo, Julio Alvarez. See Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
- Democratic party
- Haganian versus the southern bloc; E. 417
- De Niro, Robert, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. 610
- Denmark, Arnold
Comments on "Germany: political battle-ground" by F. Sternberg; C. 674;
see also 504
- Denver Post bought by E. P. Hoyt. R. Fleming; S. 780
- Devotion, J. Agee; MP. 516
- Diamond, David
Comments on the General Motors reply to the U.A.W. brief; C. 271
- Dirce and Hippocrene. R. Humphries; P. 378
- Dodd, William E., Jr.; his discharge from government service invalidated by the Supreme court; EP. 706
- Dominican republic
Proposal of R. Trujillo to change the name of Dajabón to Franklin D. Roosevelt is rejected by the State department. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 101
- Downes, Bruce
Comments on C. Greenberg's review of the Weston exhibition; C. 518; see also 294
- Downes, Donald
Cynicism wins in Italy; S. 12;
see also 10
- Italian elections, the; S. 598
- Draft, the. See United States—Army
- Drama. See Haggin, B. H., Krutch, J. W., Marshall, M. W., and Krutch; D. 54;
see also C. 140
- Dublin, Louis I.
National health council initiates program to help health societies; C. 271
- Duncan, Ethel M.
Comments on M. Marshall's articles on de Toqueville; C. 355; see also 130, 170
- Dunnigan's daughter. J. W. Krutch; D. 81
- E
- East, far, middle, near. See names of countries
- Education
Bias in the New York colleges; E. 116
- Horace Mann-Lincoln School in New York city may close; EP. 247
- Race relations and taxation: the case of Washington university. C. McWilliams; S. 593
- Students support the campaign for world government. S. Smart; C. 411
- Egypt
Britain to withdraw all troops; EP. 587;
see also 682
- Fulcrum of the new pan-Arab movement. R. Baxter; S. 125
- Einstein, Albert
Comments on I. F. Stone's "Atomic pie in the sky"; C. 582; see also 390
- Eisenhower, General Dwight D. See United States—Army
- Elections. See Congress; names of states
- Employment. See Labor—Employment
- Encampment for citizenship. A. D. Black; C. 519
- England. See Great Britain
- Epstein, Eliahu
Hussein, I., returns to Palestine; S. 287;
see also C. 410; C. 554; 526
- Espionage
Case of "The Six" comes to a close; EP. 211
- Europe, votes; E. 709
- Event, Richard M.
Comments on "The myth of world government" by R. Niebuhr; C. 446;
see also 312; C. 447; 457;
C. 490; C. 491; C. 638
- Everybody's business (articles by K. Hutchison). 43, 73; 100, 128, 168, 196, 225, 261, 289, 316, 345, 374, 400, 427, 462, 543, 573, 601, 628, 663, 693, 721, 749, 785
- Evjue, William T.; supports R. M. La Follette's candidacy for the senate. M. McMillin; S. 367
- Exile's return, the, R. Lowell; P. 318
- F
- FCC. See Federal communications commission
- FEA. See Foreign economic administration
- FEPC. See Fair employment practices committee
- Fair employment practices committee
Senate filibuster, the; E. 89;
see also EP. 115; 158
- Supported by Truman in his state-of-the-union speech. I. F. Stone; S. 118
- Far east. See names of countries
- Fay, Frank. See Friends of Frank Fay
- Fay, Frederic A.
Comments on "These men block housing" by N. Straus; C. 139; see also 6
- Federal communications commission
Issues report on public service responsibility of broadcast licensees. J. Spingarn; S. 368
- Federal reserve board
Raises margin requirements for security purchases to 100 per cent; EP. 88;
see also 73
- Films. See Agee, J., for reviews
- Finance, public
Manufacturers hold back on production pending changes in the excess-profits tax law. K. Hutchison; S. 43
- N.A.M. launches an advertising campaign for government economy. K. Hutchison; S. 345
- Race relations and taxation. C. McWilliams; S. 593
- Should cooperatives be taxed? P. Greer; S. 40
- Snyder, J. E., named Secretary of the treasury. EP. 705
- Truman's budget message. K. Hutchison; S. 128; see also 118
- World bank and monetary fund, the. K. Hutchison; S. 331, 374; see also EP. 707
- Fischer, Ben
Wages, prices, and production; S. 223
- Fleisher, Leon. B. H. Haggin; M. 354
- Fleming, Roscoe
Revolution in Denver: E. P. Hoyt makes some changes in the Post; S. 780
- Florida
Primary elections; EP. 585;
see also 648
- Food
America must act to prevent world famine; EP. 414; see also EP. 451;
EP. 493; E. 589; E. 772
- Haunted queue, the, Low; C. 365
- Meeting of the UNRRA council. I. F. Stone; S. 335, 361;
see also EP. 181; EP. 273; E. 359
- Truman restricts the use of wheat in order to increase shipments to Europe and Asia. K. Hutchison; S. 196;
see also EP. 181; EP. 273; EP. 359
- See also United Nations relief and rehabilitation administration
- Ford motor company
Concludes wage negotiations with the United automobile workers; E. 115
- Foreign economic administration
Reports on hidden German assets at home. I. F. Stone; S. 278
- Foreign ministers
Moscow conference:
Decisions on the far east. A. Roth; S. 8
- France asks some questions; EP. 29;
see also 5
- What it achieved. F. Kirchwey; S. 5;
see also C. 179
- Paris conference:
Agreement on the Italian colonies; E. 773
- Byrnes's report; E. 644
- Information please, Mr. Molotov. H. J. Laski; S. 710
- Meetings are resumed in an effort to break the deadlock; E. 735
- Must stop the division of the world into two blocs; E. 524
- New Soviet diplomacy, the. G. Slocombe; S. 619; see also EP. 613
- No basis for agreement exists. F. Kirchwey; S. 557; see also EP. 613
- Problem of Germany, the; E. 589;
see also 557; 619
- France
And the decisions of the foreign ministers at Moscow; EP. 29;
see also 5
- And the mufti of Jerusalem. I. F. Stone; S. 526; see also 287; C. 410; C. 554
- Battle for coal, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 262
- Congress of the C.G.T. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 509
- Congress of the Socialist party. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 423;
see also E. 415; C. 730
- Constitutional debate over freedom of the press, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 262
- Controversy over the size of the army; EP. 29; see also EP. 113
- De Gaulle resigns as interim president; EP. 86; see also C. 167; 174
- Dinner with Herriot. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 461
- Economic balance sheet of war, the. J. Gascul; S. 594
- Elections for a new constituent assembly, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 384;
see also E. 709; 712
- Existentialism. H. Arendt; S. 226
- Franc is devaluated, the; EP. 2
- Franco-Spanish relations:
America and Britain reject France's request that Spain be discussed by the United Nations. F. Kirchwey; S. 388;
see also E. 331; EP. 357
- Constituent assembly adopts a resolution calling for a brief with the Franco regime; EP. 86; see also EP. 113
- France protests the execution of Christino Garcia; EP. 245
- Three-power statement on the Franco regime; E. 275;
see also EP. 626
- Interview with François Billoux. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 509
- M.R.P. and the western Catholic bloc. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 775
- Moves to nationalize the electric and gas industries. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 334
- Need for understanding between Socialists and Communists. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 423; see also E. 415; C. 730
- New government headed by F. Gouin, a Socialist; EP. 113
- One year after victory. F. Kirchwey; S. 647
- Proposes international control of the Ruhr. V. M. Dean; S. 93;
see also 317; 357; 588; 619
- Prospects for Anglo-French alliance; E. 413
- Reaction to Churchill's speech at Fulton. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 317
- Recognizes the Viet Nam republic of Indo-China; EP. 358
- Referendum on the constitution, the. G. Slocombe; S. 591;
see also 557; C. 794
- Réveillon in Paris. I. Treat; S. 71
- Under the occupation and since the liberation. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 370
- Who's who in the press. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 745
- Franco, Francisco. See Spain
- Frederic, Harold
Material about, sought. A. Kellner; C. 520
- French loan, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 169; see also 289; EP. 385; EP. 677
- Friendly, Alfred
Industry's grand strategy on wages and prices; S. 62
- What does John L. Lewis want? S. 528
- What will your dollar buy in 1946? S. 13
- Friends of Frank Fay
Hold a mass meeting in Fay's honor; EP. 59
- From this day forward. J. Agee; MP. 616
- Fuchs, Joseph. B. H. Haggin; M. 354
- G
- Gale, Toni
Associated American artists and C. Greenberg; C. 327; see also 241
- Garcia Grande, Cristino. See Spain
- Gascul, Jacques
France's balance sheet of war; S. 594
- Gauguin, Paul, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. 552
- Gaulle, Charles de. See France
- General motors corporation
Recommendation of the President's fact-finding board; EP. 58; see also 62; E. 115
- Refuses to cooperate with the fact-finding board appointed by the government; EP. 115; see also EP. 85
- U.A.W. strike is your fight! W. P. Reuther; S. 35; see also C. 271; C. 299; E. 333
- Georgia
Dalton—picture of a small American town. A. Stevens; S. 687
- Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S. 643
- Germany
AMG officer rebuts "AMG—innocents abroad" by S. K. Padover; C. 27
- AMG order: nazi inspired book to be burned; EP. 614
- Allied raids reveal widespread nazi plot; EP. 413
- American policy must be clarified. V. M. Dean; S. 93
- American proposal on disarmament. E. 588; see also 357; 619
- Dispatches by R. Daniell reveal that Nazis retain their grip in Bavaria; EP. 521

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Hitler's testament. J. Alvarez del Vayo;	45	Communist party seeks affiliation with the Labor party; EP	451;	Ballet russe de Monte Carlo	138,
How can democracy be rebuilt? EP. 494;	674	see also EP	643	Ballet theater	297, 409, 673
Issue of Socialist-Communist merger, the; EP. 359; see also EP. 494;	781	Imperial interests in the Middle east. R. Baxter; S	125	Dance index	673, 728
C. 674; 683;	597	Investment control bill, the. A. Vallance; S	258	School of American ballet, the	138
Nazis' biological warfare, the. M. Gumpert; S	597	Keynes, Lord, death; EP	496	Music recorded; S	110, 177, 242,
Nullification of Potsdam, the. K. Hutchison; S	693	Labor government's first annual budget. K. Hutchison; S	462	324, 382, 517, 553, 609, 636, 700, 765, 793
Political trends and alignments. S. K. Padover; S	688	Must increase his exports. A. Vallance; S	69	Haiti
Problem of the Ruhr. V. M. Dean; S. 93; see also 317; 557; E. 674; 588;	619	National health insurance bill, the. A. Vallance; S. 258; see also EP. 386;	387	Why the Lesot government was overthrown, R. P. Alexander; S	534
Problems of zonal administration, the. V. M. Dean; S	281;	Nationalization of the coal mines. A. Vallance; S. 69; see also	258	Hall, Edwin Arthur
Propaganda against the thesis of German war guilt. H. S. Commager; S	463	Greece		Asks ban on grain and flour exports; EP	181
Russians break up the junker estates and move toward nationalization of industry. E. Sternberg; S	504;	Bevin versus Vishinsky on Britain's role; EP. 153; see also	311	Hanneberg, Robert E. See Democratic party
see also EP. 494; C. 674	674	Elections, the. H. Lehman; S. 421; see also EP	413	Hare, David, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. 176
Steel production set by the Allied control council. K. Hutchison; S	100	Left seeks postponement of elections as monarchists spread terror; EP. 358; see also EP	413	Hastie, William H., nominated as governor of the Virgin Islands; EP	29
Still has enormous hidden economic assets. I. F. Stone; S	278	Green years, the. J. Agee; MP	516	Hayek, F. A.
Truman authorizes relief shipments to, through the CRALOG; EP	302	Greenbaum, Edward	516	Comments on "Calling all social scientists" by S. Chase; C. 638; see also	538
War casualties: new evidence. S. K. Padover; S	255	Cause for army justice, the; S. 658; see also 501; EP. 495; EP. 522; 660		He who gets slapped. J. W. Krutch; D. 409
War crimes commission		Greenberg, Clement		Health, public. See Medicine
Gilliam, Florence		Paintings brought here from German museums will not be exhibited; S. 24		Hearst, James
American relief for France seeks clothes contributions; C	27	Reviews of art exhibitions:		Farmer's job, the; S	508
Giral, José. See Spain		American abstract artists	444	Heffey, Ted
Goering, Hermann, his testimony at the Nuremberg trials; EP	330	Beckmann, Max	610	Comments on "A plan for Germany" by S. K. Padover; C. 111
Gold, and bread. K. Hutchison; S	543	Bloom, Hyman	109	Henry IV. J. W. Krutch; D. 609
Gordis, Robert		Chagall, Marc	610	Her kind of man. J. Agee; MP	701
Comments on "The sins of American liberals"; C. 410; see also 250; 251; C. 355		Gauguin, Paul	552	Hill, Dorothy P.
Gordon, King		Gorky, Arshile	552	Summer institute for social progress to hold a conference; C	492
Iranian question before the United Nations; the; S	387	Hare, David	176	Hiller, Walter B.
Sun shines in Pittsburgh, the; S	121	Lipchitz, Jacques	109	Comments on "Poverty follows the crops" by C. McWilliams; C. 582; see also	343
Goett, Lella H.		O'Keeffe, Georgia	727	Hilfer, Adolph. See Germany
Free enterprise in Tacoma; C. 411		Pollock, Jackson	444	Hogan, F. H.
Gorky, Arshile, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. 552		School of Paris, the	792	Comments on "Clerical offensive in Mexico" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C. 55
Gouin, Félix. See France		Smith, David	109	Holland. See Netherlands
Government agencies. See United States; names of agencies		Weston, Edward; photography. 294; see also C. 674	518	Hollingshead, George G.
Government finance. See Finance, public		Whitney annual, the	241;	Asks aid for the Longo defense committee; C	326
Great Britain		see also C. 674	327	Home thoughts from Spain. Sagittarius; P. 657
And the Iranian problem; EP. 85; see also EP. 153; E. 211;	211;	Greer, Paul		Hopkins, Harry, death; E. 183
EP. 273; E. 331; 387;	494	What's behind the attack on the cooperatives; S	40	Horse Mann-Lincoln School
Anglo-American relations		Groves, Major General Leslie; leads fight for the military control of atomic energy; T. Coffin; S	187	Progressive school may close; EP. 247
American liberals and British labor. R. Niebuhr; S	682	Groz, Petru. See Rumania		Horthy, Admiral Nicolas. See Hungary
Anti-American feeling in Britain today. N. Mitchison; C. 327		Guérard, Albert		House of Seagram
British loan, the. E. 155; see also 169; EP. 181; 316; EP. 451 E. 560; 590		Comments on G. Slocombe's "Is France swinging to the right?" C. 794; see also	591	Congratulates R. Milland on his performance in "The lost weekend"; EP. 59
Churchill's speech at Fulton, Missouri; E. 303; see also 316; 317; C. 490		Comments on "Reunion in Moscow" by F. Kirchwey; C. 179; see also	5	Building industry's scarcity economics versus the low-cost housing program, the. M. Rosenblatt; S	161;
Anglo-Egyptian relations		World comes of age, the; S. 457; see also 312; C. 446; C. 447; C. 490; C. 491; C. 582; C. 638		see also C. 139; 161; C. 179; 340
Arabia Britannica. R. Baxter; S. 125		Gumpert, Martin	166	Wyatt program, the. I. F. Stone; S. 186; see also	372
British to withdraw all troops from Egypt; EP. 587; see also	682	Adventures in medicine; S. 398		Who is responsible for the housing shortage? N. Straus; S. 6; see also	340
Anglo-French relations:		Bogomolts in America; S. 15		Hoyde, Byrn J., becomes head of the New school for social research. M. Lerner; S	16
Prospects for Anglo-French alliance; E. 415		Man around fifty, a; S. 286		Howells, Dorothy
Anglo-Greek relations:		Menace of rheumatic fever, the; S. 286		Comments on "Leftism in the atomic age" by N. Angell; C. 702; see also 564; E. 561
Bevin defends Britain's role in Greece before the UN; EP. 311		Nazis' biological warfare, the; S. 597		Hoyt, E. Palmer; takes over the Denver Post. R. Fleming; S	780
see also	311	Political psychotherapy; S. 719		Hukbalahap, the. See Philippine islands
Bevin refuses to postpone the election; EP. 358; see also EP. 413		Gutheim, Frederick		Humphries, Rolf
Anglo-Indian relations:		Choosing a site for the United Nations; S	506	Dirce and Hippocrene; P. 378
Attlee's statement on Indian independence; EP	329	Hadfield, H. R.		Hungary
How the Indian soldiers feel about Britain. D. Martin; S. 284		Atomic parables; C. 272		Horthy, Admiral N., released from protective custody in Nuremberg; E. 31
Mission of the British cabinet ministers; E. 248; see also 253; 459; EP. 613; 621; 682		Haganah, the. See Palestine		Hussein, Haj Amin. See Palestine
Anglo-Palestinian relations:		Haggin, B. H.		Hussini, Jamal. See Palestine
Bevin's speech at Bournemouth. F. Kirchwey; S. 737; see also EP. 769		Articles on music:	25, 270, 354	Hutchison, Keith
British reaction to the Anglo-American commission's report; EP. 33; see also	562	Artken, Webster	25	Air transport's growing pains; S. 749
Anglo-Soviet relations:		Albeneri trio, the	354	Bermuda air-transport conference, the; S	209
Churchill's speech at Fulton; E. 303; see also 306; 316; 317; C. 490; C. 491		Bethlehem Bach choir	354	Big steel reports; S	462
Information please, Mr. Molotov. H. J. Laski; S	710	Budapest quartet, the	82	Britain's budgets; S	128;
Anglo-Spanish relations:		Chinese music	636	see also	118
Three-power declaration; E. 275; see also EP. 301; 388;	626	Commercial sponsorship of concert broadcasts	138	Chester Bowles: evangelist of plenty; S. 663
Why Britain wants Franco. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S	656	Concert of works by C. Ives	636	Churchill and the British loan; S. 261
See also United Nations		Fauré festival, the	54	Distributive justice; S. 721; see also EP	733
Bevin's foreign policy. A. Vallance; S. 258; see also	710	Fleisher, Leon	354	Feast and famine; S. 196; see also EP	181
Bournemouth convention of the Labor party. A. Vallance; S. 711; see also	737	Fuchs, Joseph	580	Germany's steel ration; S. 543
		Jonas, Maryl	488	Gold strike in South Africa; S. 543
		Landau, Siegfried	488	Human needs and human nature; S. 43
		Lehmann, Lotte	242, 354	N.A.M. launches an advertising campaign against public economy; S. 345
		New friends of music concerts	354	Nullification of Potsdam, the; S. 693
		Phonograph needles	177	Parity price and inflation; S. 427
		Princeton university chapel choir performs Beethoven's Mass in C major, opus 86	636	Post-war planning in Sweden; S. 225
		Rupp, Franz	354, 488	Rub in rubber, the; S. 785
		Schnabel, Arthur	270, 354	Something for silver; S. 573
		Schubert's duty	270, 354	Trade policies and subsidies	601
		"Show boat"	354	Wall street fireworks: the stock-market boom; S. 73; see also EP. 88
		Teyte, Maggie	354
		Walter, Bruno	82
		Articles on the dance:
		Balanchine, George, choreographies	138, 297, 409

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Why France needs help; S.....	289	Jews		Oedipus Rex. See Marshall, M., for review
World ban and monetary fund, the; S. 331, 374; see also EP.....	307	Bias in the New York colleges; E.....	116	Oedipus the king.....	700
Hymn of the nations. J. Agee; MP.....	580	Committee on un-American activities attacks the National committee to combat anti-Semitism; EP.....	114	Pymgallon.....	176
		See also Palestine		Show boat. See Haggin, B. H., for review
I		Jinnah, Mohammed Ali. See India		Truckline cafe.....	324
Ickes, Harold L.		Johnson, Alvin, retires as head of the New school for social research. M. Lerner; S.....	112	Uncle Vanya.....	671
Is succeeded by J. A. Krug as Secretary of the interior; EP.....	273	Johnson, Charles S.		Winter's tale, the.....	137, 176
Opposes the nomination of E. W. Pauley as under-secretary of navy; EP.....	213	Institute of race relations of the American missionary association to convene; C.....	674	Would-be gentleman, the.....	108
Resigns as secretary of the interior; E.....	213	Johnson, Lee F.
Idaho		Comments on "These men block housing" by N. Straus; C.....	139; see also.....	L
Primary elections, the; EP.....	734	Joint anti-fascist refugee committee		Labor
Illinois		Barsky, E. K., chairman, cited for contempt by the Committee on un-American activities; EP.....	209	And President Truman's program; E.....	32
Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S.....	648	Committee on un-American activities votes contempt charges against H. R. Bryan, executive secretary; EP.....	114	Case of the seasonal farm laborer, the. C. McWilliams; S.....	343
In the wind.....	17, 68, 127, 219, 283, 399, 465, 542, 599, 655, 720, 783	Investigated by the Committee on un-American activities; EP.....	58; see also EP.....	Baseball players may form a union; EP.....	523
India		Jonas, Maryla. B. H. Haggin; M.....	580	CIO launches "Operation Dixie" to organize the south; EP.....	450
Attlee's statement on independence; EP.....	329	Jones, Edward		Employment:
British cabinet mission, the. S. Rao; S. 459; see also E.....	248; 253; EP.....	Why the steel workers strike; S.....	119	House passes compromise full-employment bill; EP.....	181
Famine spreads; EP.....	209; see also.....	Journalism. See names of newspapers		Jurisdictional disputes between the C.I.O. and the A. F. of L. By R. Bendiner; S.....	391
How the Indian soldiers feel about Britain. P. Martin.....	248	Juan, Prince of Spain. See Spain		Strikes:
Jinnah and Pakistan; E.....	284	Jugoslavia. See Yugoslavia		American industry's grand strategy. A. Friendly; S.....	62
Nehru explains the Congress party's program for independence. A. Thorne; S.....	253; see also E.....	Junger, Robert S.		American tobacco company workers. K. Korstad; C.....	384
Rioting flares as nationalists celebrate the birthday of S. C. Bose; EP.....	249	Comments on "Crossfire in Korea" by A. Roth; C.....	674; see also.....	Case bill, the; E.....	184; see also E.....
Indiana		K		E.....	89; EP.....
Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S.....	648	Katz, Corinne		E.....	641; 645; E.....
Indo-China		Comments on Guérard-Niebuhr articles on world government; C.....	446, 638; see also 312; C. 447; 457; C. 490; C.....	Coal; EP.....	495; see also.....
French recognize the Viet Nam republic; EP.....	358	Kellner, Armin		EP.....	559; EP.....
Industry. See Business		Seeks material on H. Frederic; C.....	520	First round to labor; E.....	333; 391
Inflation. See Business—Prices		Kelly, Edward J. See Chicago		General motors. A. Friendly; S.....	62; see also EP.....
Injury, the. W. C. Williams; P.....	751	Kenny, Robert W. See California		EP.....	1; 35; EP.....
International bank for reconstruction and development		Kerr, Lord, death; E.....	496	E.P.....	115; C.....
Inaugural meeting at Savannah. K. Hutchinson; S.....	331, 374	Kidder from Brooklyn, the. J. Agee; MP.....	636	C.....	299; E.....
Meyer, Eugene, named as head; EP.....	707	Kidder, Lois		Maritime workers. K. Hutchinson; S.....	721; see also EP.....
International rescue and relief committee		Comments on "Notes by the way" by M. Marshall; C.....	300; see also.....	Meat packinghouse workers. W. Shelton; S.....	159
Receives authorization to make relief shipments to Germany; EP.....	302	Hearings on the elimination of German resources for war. I. F. Stone; S.....	278	New York faces a subway strike as the Transport workers' union demands sole bargaining rights; EP.....	247
Sends relief to Spanish republicans in France. L. H. Wood; C.....	271	Isolationist senators seek to kill its appropriation; EP.....	414	Railroads. T. Coffin; S.....	645; see also E.....
Iran		Kirchway, Freda		Rochester's general strike; EP.....	678
Lodges a complaint with the UN against Soviet interference in its internal affairs; EP.....	85; see also EP.....	America and Britain refuses France's request that Spain be discussed by the United Nations; S.....	388; see also E.....	Steel. A. Friendly; S.....	62; see also EP.....
EP.....	211; E.....	Foreign ministers' meeting at Moscow, the. S.....	5; see also C.....	Truman calls for legislation to stop stoppages. T. Coffin; S.....	645; see also E.....
EP.....	413; EP.....	France—a year after victory; S.....	647	Yale and Towne lock company. J. M. Morse; S.....	37
Russian troops to stay in northwestern Iran past the date agreed on for their evacuation EP.....	273	Goes to Argentina to report the election results; EP.....	211	United automobile workers' convention; E. 333; see also EP.....	301; EP.....
It happened at the inn. J. Agee; MP.....	205	Intervention for democracy; S.....	156; see also E.....	Wages:
Italy		La Guardia, F. H., becomes head of UNRRA; S.....	388	Hold the wage-price line; E.....	304
Boom in journalism and publishing, the. A. Moravia; S.....	74	Largo Caballero, Francisco, death; S.....	388	Prices and production. B. Fischer; S.....	223
Ciano dairies, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	74	No peace in Paris: the foreign ministers' conference; S.....	557	United automobile workers reach agreement with the Ford and Chrysler companies; E.....	115
Food and prices. S. Downes; S.....	598; see also.....	Palestine and Bevin; S.....	33; see also 562; EP.....	World federation of trade unions, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	401
Foreign ministers' conference reaches agreement on the Italian colonies; E.....	773	Palestine inquiry, the; S.....	33; see also 562; EP.....	La Pollette, Albert M.
Municipal elections, the. G. Salvemini; S.....	598	Perón nationalizes the Central bank of Argentina; S.....	249, 277, 362; see also EP.....	Seeks reelection as senator from Wisconsin. M. McMillin; S.....	367
Political apathy of the leaders and the people. D. Downes; S.....	12; see also.....	Referendum on the French constitution, the; S.....	557	La Guardia, Fiorello H.
Post memoriam: Italian socialism in the last pro-war period. I. Silone; S.....	342	Report on Argentina; S.....	249, 277, 362; see also EP.....	As private citizen; EP.....	30
Referendum on the monarchy, the. G. Salvemini; S.....	709	Spain is still the topic; S.....	452	Reunites head of UNRRA. F. Kirchway; S.....	388
Trieste issue, the. G. Slocombe; S.....	619; see also 557; EP.....	USA and UNO; S.....	452	Lancaster, Stephen
Umberto departs into exile; EP.....	735	Kirschchen, Ernest		Comments on "Socialism and Europe's fate" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C. 730; see also EP.....	423
Ives, Charles. B. H. Haggin; M.....	636	How Missourians feel about Truman; S.....	455	Landau, Siegfried. B. H. Haggin; M.....	488
		Knights of Columbus		Landon, Alfred M.
J		Campaign in behalf of "Christian Spain"; E.....	416; see also EP.....	Criticizes Truman's plan for feeding Europe and Asia; EP.....	181
Jackson, Robert H. See Supreme court, United States		Konikow, Robert B.		La Plana, George
Japan		Segregation, navy style; C.....	179	Vatican and Soviet Russia, the; S.....	531
Decisions of the Moscow conference of foreign ministers. A. Roth; S.....	8	Korea		Largo Caballero, Francisco, death. F. Kirchway; S.....	388
Directive for a political purge of the Shinhara government may result in a left swing in the Diet elections; EP.....	57	American occupation, the. A. Roth; S.....	220; see also C.....	Lasch, Robert
Elections, the; EP.....	449	Under the Japanese occupation. A. Roth; S.....	122	Houses from the assembly line; S.....	372; see also.....
Hirohito denies his divinity; EP.....	29	Korstad, Karl		Laski, Harold J.
Military-fascist societies flourish in the rural districts; EP.....	87	Urges aid for strikers of the American tobacco company; C.....	384	If Roosevelt had lived; S.....	419
Proposed revolution, the. A. Roth; S.....	313	Krug, J. A.; succeeds H. Ickes as Secretary of the interior; EP.....	273	Information please, Mr. Molotov; S.....	710
Proposed constitution, the. EP.....	615	Krutch, Joseph Wood		Latin America
Yoshida, S., becomes premier; EP.....	615	Reviews of plays:		Argentina rushes an "austral bloc." V. Prewett; S.....	685
Jarrell, Randall		Antigone.....	269	Uruguay's proposal of collective intervention by the American republics against regimes which threaten hemisphere security. F. Kirchway; S.....	156; see also E.....
Camp in the Prussian forest, a; P.....	756	Born yesterday.....	205	Laurel, José. See Philippine islands	212; 215
Death of the gods, the; P.....	403	Candida.....	487	Laws. Henry; Negro householder in Los Angeles contests restrictive covenants. C. McWilliams; S.....	690
New Georgia; P.....	263	Critique, the.....	700	Lealtad, Catharine D.
Oh, my name is Sam Hall; P.....	76	Dream girl.....	140	Starvation in China; maladministration of UNRRA relief; C.....	794
Sacred wood, the; P.....	472	Dunneigan's daughter.....	81
Subway from New Britain to the Bronx, the; P.....	472	He who gets slapped.....	409
		Henry IV.....	609
		Lute song.....	240

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Lebourdais, D. M.		Massachusetts		Murray, Philip. See Congress of industrial organizations
Far north, the international frontier; S.....	42; see also C.....	Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S.....	648; see also C.....	Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill. See Social security
Lehmann, Lotie, recital. B. H. Haggin; M.....	242, 354	McGregor, Patricia		Music (articles by B. H. Haggin)
Lehrman, Hal		Comments on Guérard-Niebuhr articles on world government; C.....	638; see also 312; C.....	Aiken, Webster.....	25, 270, 354
Greek elections, the; S.....	421	C.....	446; C.....	Alleneri, the.....	25
see also EP.....	413	C.....	490; C.....	Bethlehem Bach choir.....	354
Rumanian rhapsody in a minor key; S.....	540	McMahon, Brian. See Atomic energy		Budapest quartet, the.....	25; 82
Yugoslavia revisited; S.....	713, 747	McMillin, Miles		Chinese music.....	636
Lerner, Max			Commercial sponsorship of concert broad-casts.....	82, 138
Homage to Alvin Johnson; S.....	16		Concert of works by C. Ives.....	54
correction.....	112		Fauré festival, the.....	354
Replies to K. Martin's letter, "The sins of American liberals"; S.....	251; see also 250; C.....		Fleischer, Leon.....	354
Lesage, Edie. See Haiti			Fuchs, Joseph.....	580
Levy, Anton			Landau, Siegfried.....	242, 354
Veterans' league of America, the; C.....	299		Lehman, Lotte.....	242, 354
Lewis, Hanson			New friends of music concerts.....	354
Comments on "Leftism in the atomic age" by N. Angell;.....	702; see also 564; E.....		Beethoven's Mass in C major.....	636
Lewis, John L.			Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
And the coal strike; EP.....	495; see also 528; P.....		Rupp, Franz.....	354; 488
EP.....	559; 677		Schnabel, Artur.....	445
Pushes jurisdictional warfare against other unions. R. Bendiner; S.....	391		Schubert's duality.....	270, 354
Lichfield, See United States-Army			"Show boat".....	138
Lillenthal, David E. See Atomic energy			Steele, Maggie.....	354
Lipchitz, Jacques. Exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....	444		Walter, Bruno.....	82
Lippmann, Walter			Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
Sees Germany as pivot in east-west antagonisms; E.....	588		Muste, A. J.
Literature			Announces the formation of a committee for amnesty for conscientious objectors; C.....	326
Book list for the returning soldier. M. Marshall; S.....	75		N
French existentialism. H. Arendt; S.....	226		N.A.M. See National association of manu-facturers
Hamlet: the existential madness. W. Sypher; S.....	756		NC-IAC. See National citizens' political action committee
In Canada. R. L. Weaver; S.....	198		Nation associates, the
Notes by the way. M. Marshall; S.....	48; 75, 130, 170, 263; see also C.....		Addresses a memorandum to the UN requesting suspension of Argentina; E.....	88; S.....
Longo, John R. committee seeks aid for his further defense. G. G. Hollingshead; C.....	326		Issues a memorandum calling for a break of relations with Franco Spain; E.....	275
Lord, Howard B.			Memorandum to the United Nations on Spain.....	428
Comments on I. F. Stone's articles on the Lillenthal report on atomic energy; C.....	556; see also.....		National association of manufacturers
Louis, Joe, defeats Conn for the heavyweight boxing championship; EP.....	771		Its publicity campaign on wages, prices, and production. B. Fischer; S.....	233; see also EP.....
Lovett, Robert Morris; his discharge from government service invalidated by the Supreme court; EP.....	706		Launches an advertising campaign for public economy. K. Hutchison; S.....	345
Low, cartoons			National association of real estate boards
Delegates arrive, the.....	91		Nelson, H. U., executive secretary, spurs lobby against the low-cost housing program. T. Coffin; S.....	161
Haunted queue, the.....	365		National citizens' political action committee
He prefers sandcastles.....	9		Branch formed in Rhode Island. M. Paisner; C.....	384
Pictures from the UN gallery.....	260		National committee to combat anti-Semitism
Resolutions for 1946.....	70		Becomes a target of the Cointel program on un-American activities; EP.....	114
Sleepless beauty.....	314		National maritime union
Sticks and stones may break my bones".....	338		Facts about the shipping dispute. K. Hutchison; S.....	721; see also EP.....
Temporary Elysia.....	167		National retail lumber dealers' association
Lowell, Robert			Its representative, C. Northrup, lobbies against the low-cost housing program. T. Coffin; S.....	340
At the Indian killer's grave; P.....	752		Near east. See names of countries
Blind leading the halt, the; P.....	694		Nebraska
Exile's return, the; P.....	318		Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S.....	648; see also EP.....
North sea undertaker's complaint, the; P.....	228	734; 777
Rebellion; P.....	545		Negrin, Juan. See Spain
Shako, the; P.....	319		Neuroes
To Peter Taylor on the feast of the Epiphany.....	228		Anti-Jim Crow committee formed in Columbia, South Carolina. P. B. Newman; S.....	356
Where the rainbow ends; P.....	228		D.A.R.'s "white-artists-only" policy. J. M. Steiner; S.....	520
Lubin, Isador; resigns from the Department of labor; EP.....	183		Los Angeles householders contest restrictive covenants. C. McWilliams; S.....	692
Luce, Clare Boothe; leads fight against D.A.R.'s "white-artists-only" policy; EP.....	522; see also.....		Navy investigates case of the carrier Croatan's barring high-point veterans at Le Havre for lack of segregation facilities; EP.....	59
Lute song. J. W. Krutch; D.....	240		Race relations and taxation: the case of Washington university. C. McWilliams; S.....	593
M			Supreme court has set the Cointel program state bus lines; EP.....	706
Mackenzie, DeWitt			Todd, T. D., condemns discrimination by Negroes against white men; EP.....	59
AP correspondent interviews Franco; EP.....	113, 155		See also Fair employment practices committee
MacNeice, Louis			Nehru, Jawaharlal. See India
Aftermath; P.....	756		Neilson, William Allan, death; EP.....	210
Magazines. See names of magazines			Nelson, Herbert U. See National association of real estate boards
Make mine music. J. Agee; MP.....	516		Nemetz, N. T.
Mamhoney, M. E.			Comments on Canadian atom-spy case; C.....	554; see also E.....
Comments on "The myth of world government" by R. Niebuhr; C.....	447; see also 312; C.....	546; 360
C.....	490; C.....		Netherlands
Markova, Alicia. B. H. Haggin; S.....	728		Liberation of Tiel. J. G. Ter Braak; C.....	207
Marshall, General George C. See United States—And China			Neuberger, Richard L.
Marshall, Margaret			Northwest liberals in Congress; S.....	309
Notes by the way. S.....	48, 75, 130, 170, 263; see also C.....
Reviews of plays:
Oedipus Rex.....	48
Martin, David
Deadline in India; S.....	284
Martin, Kingsley
Sins of American liberals; a letter to Max Lerner; S.....	250; see also 251; C.....
Martolf, Arthur J.
Comments on "These men block housing" by N. Straus; C.....	179; see also.....
	6

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
What do the people think of Truman? S.....63; see also C.....271		Pauly, Herta		Who fights price controls? A. Friendly; S.....13
New friends of music. B. H. Haggin; M.....354		Comments on "The myth of world government"; C.....582; see also.....312; C.....446; C.....447; 457; C.....490; C.....491; C.....638		Prices. See Business
New Georgia. R. Jarrell; P.....263		Pearson, Lester B. See United nations organization		Prieto, Indalecio. See Spain
New Jersey		Pegler, Westbrook		Primary elections. See Congress; names of states
Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S.....648		Attacks the American veterans' committee; EP.....246		Profits. See Business
New Mexico		People's front, the (articles by J. Alvarez del Vayo).....138, 45, 74, 101, 129, 169, 197, 262, 317, 346, 401, 509		Public finance. See Finance, public
Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S.....648		Pepper, Claude		Progressive party. See Wisconsin
New school for social research		And the Florida primaries; EP.....585; see also.....648		Protestant churches
Johnson, A., retires as head; B. J. Hovde replaces him. M. Lerner; S.....16; correction.....112		And the Senate fight against anti-air legislation. T. Coffin; S.....617; see also.....681		Attack political maneuvering of the Roman catholic church; E.....416
New York city		Peron, A. H.		Leaders of seven denominations demand the recall of M. Licenses; J. Spingarn; S.....705
Police break up fair at City and country school in gambling raid; EP.....644		Comments on "Leftism in the atomic age" by N. Angell; C.....702; see also 564; E.....561		World council of churches holds conference in Geneva; EP.....303
Subway strike threatens as transport workers' union demands recognition as sole bargaining agent; EP.....247		Peron, Juan Domingo. See Argentina		Puerto Rico
New York state		Petrillo, James Caesar. See American federation of musicians		Shall it remain an American colony? L. Muñoz Marin; S.....571
Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S.....648		Philippine islands		Pulitzer prizes, the; E.....588
Newman, Paul B.		Philipino collaborators, the; case of M. Roxas, J. Laurel, and J. Vargas. M. Adams; S.....95		Pymgallon. J. W. Krutch; D.....176
Columbia, South Carolina, anti-Jim Crow committee; C.....356		Its economic and political crisis. M. Adams, Roxas, M., elected president; EP.....521
Next, R. Armour; P.....16		Roxas, M., forces democratic opposition papers out of business; EP.....182		R
Niebuhr, Reinhold		Roxas mops up the Hukbalahap guerrillas; EP.....643		Radio
American liberals and British labor; S.....682		Photograph records. See Haggin, B. H.—Music, recorded		Commercial sponsorship of concert broadcasts. B. H. Haggin; M.....82, 138
Myth of world government, the; S.....312; see also C.....446; C.....447; 457; C.....490; C.....491; C.....582; C.....638		Plays. See Haggin, B. H.; Krutch, J. W.; Marshall, M.; for reviews		F. C. report on public service responsibility of broadcast; S.....368
Night in Casablanca, a. J. Agee. MP.....636		Poems		Scophonic corporation charged with blocking the development of television techniques; EP.....30
North Dakota		Aftermath. L. MacNeice.....756		What is wrong with radio writing? M. Adams; S.....544
Nye, G. P., defeated at Republican convention as senatorial candidate; EP.....429		At the Indian killer's grave. R. Lowell.....752		Railroads
Primary elections. R. Bendiner; S.....648		Blind leading the halt, the. R. Lowell.....694		Railroad strike, the; T. Coffin; S.....645; see also E.....641; 681
North sea undertaker's complaint, the. R. Lowell; P.....228		Camp in the Prussian forest, a. R. Jarrell.....290		Rao, Shiva
Northrup, Cotton. See National retail lumber dealers' association		Close clan, the. M. Van Doren.....402		British cabinet mission to India; S.....459; see also E.....248; 253
Notes by the way. M. Marshall; S.....48, 75, 130, 170, 263; see also C.....300; C.....355		Death of the gods. R. Jarrell.....378		Jinnah and Indian unity; S.....621; see also EP.....613
Nuremberg trials. See United nations war crimes commission		Dirce and Hippocrene. R. Humphries.....318		Rebellion. R. Lowell.....228
Nye, Gerald P. See North Dakota		Exile's return, the. R. Lowell.....318		Reconversion. See War mobilization and reconversion, office of
		Home thoughts from Spain. Sagittarius.....751		Recorded music. See Haggin, B. H.—Music, recorded
		Inquiry, the. W. C. Williams.....290		Reece, B. Carroll. See Republican party
		Moonsire limited. M. Van Doren.....263		Reed, Solon Chadwick
		New Georgia. R. Jarrell.....16		Comments on "The myth of world government" by R. Niebuhr; C.....446; see also.....312
		Next, R. Armour.....228		Refugees
		North sea undertaker's complaint, the. R. Lowell.....746		Bevin proposes the creation of a U.N. refugee commission to handle the problem of displaced persons; EP.....87
		Oh, my name is Sam Hall. R. Jarrell.....74		See also Palestine
		Poor but honest. R. Armour.....228		Remember? R. Armour; P.....344
		Rebellion. R. Lowell.....228		Republican party
		Remember? R. Armour.....344		Names B. C. Reece as national committee chairman; E.....417
		Sacred wood, the. R. Jarrell.....545		Stassen's chances for the 1948 presidential nomination. M. P. Akers; S.....777
		Shako, the. R. Lowell.....290		Reuther, Walter P.
		Sometimes I believe. M. Van Doren.....472		General motors strike, the; S.....35
		Subway from New Britain to the Bronx, the. R. Jarrell.....319		Seeks the presidency of the United automobile workers' union; EP.....301; see also EP.....333; EP.....385; 391
		To Peter Taylor on the feast of the Epiphany. R. Lowell.....228		Ridenour, Louis P.
		Where the rainbow ends. R. Lowell.....330		Atoms won't wait; S.....256; see also EP.....587
		Poland		Riker, Thad W.
		Army in exile to disband; EP.....330		Comments on "The myth of world government" by R. Niebuhr; C.....447; see also 312; C.....446; 457; C.....490; C.....491; C.....582; C.....638
		Brings the question of Spain before United nations security council. F. Kirchwey; S.....452; see also EP.....495; 498; E.....679; EP.....705; EP.....735; EP.....769		Roman catholic church
		Political action committee. See Congress of industrial organizations; National citizens' political action committee		Cardinal Spellman visits the Franco embassy at Rome; EP.....245
		Pollock, Jackson, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....444		New cardinalate, the. EP.....210
		Poor but honest. R. Armour; P.....744		see also EP.....210
		Porter, Paul. See Price administration, office of		Pope Pius appeals for world aid to combat famine; EP.....414
		Portrait of a woman. J. Agee; MP.....580		Pope's statement on the eve of the French and Italian elections, the. E.....709
		Portugal		M. C. Taylor from the Vatican; EP.....705
		Anti-fascist committee works for the overthrow of the Salazar dictatorship. J. L. Teller; S.....339		Sheen, Monsignor F. J., speaks on politics; E.....416
		Postman always rings twice, the. J. Agee; MP.....580		Vatican and Soviet Russia, the. G. Piana; S.....531
		Poulos, Constantine		Vatican and the western Catholic bloc, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....775
		Notes. S.....394		Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
		Pound, E. E.		First anniversary of his death. H. J. Laski; S.....419
		Adjudged insane and unfit to stand trial for treason; EP.....3		Rosenberg, James N.
		Press. See names of newspapers under names of cities		Comments on "Plan or perish" by H. J. Laski; C.....111
		Prewett, Virginia		Rosenblatt, Maurice
		Colonel Peron's new order; S.....685		Hauteville housing; S.....161; see also C.....299
		Price, William		Need for reform of the army court-martial system; S.....601; see also EP.....495; EP.....522; 658; 660
		Survey of veterans' organizations; S.....623		Rosen, Stanley
		Price administration, office of		Peron's South American Hitler; S.....189; see also EP.....183
		Porter, F. named administrator; Fowles, C. A., becomes economic stabilization director. I. F. Stone; S.....214; see also.....186		Roth, Andrew
		Price control, and on the shortage of consumers' goods. K. Hutchison; S.....43		Cross-fire in Korea; S.....220; see also C.....674
		Should be continued after June 30; EP 301; see also E.....304; EP.....449; EP.....529; 530; EP.....587; EP.....613; EP.....643; E.....708; E.....736; 741; 774		Decision of the Moscow conference on the Far east; S.....8

- His clearance brings the "case of the six" to a close; EP..... 211
- Japan's press revolution; S..... 315
- Korea's heritage; S..... 122
- Roxas, Manuel. See Philippine islands
- Rubber
- Future relationship between the natural and the synthetic product. K. Hutchison; S..... 785
- Ruhr, the. See Germany
- Rumania
- Groza government maintained in power by Russia. H. Lehman; S..... 540
- Rupp, Franz. B. H. Haggin; M..... 354, 488
- Rupp. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- S
- Sacred wood, the. R. Jarrell; P..... 472
- Sagittarius
- Home thoughts from Spain; P..... 657
- Saillant, Louis. See World federation of trade unions
- St. Martinville, Louisiana. A. Stevens; S..... 718
- Salaries. See Labor—Wages
- Salazar, Antonio de Oliveira. See Portugal
- Salvemini, Gaetano
- Italy against the monarchy; S..... 653; see also E..... 598
- Sanchez Sarto, Manuel
- Spain—a nazi colony; S..... 307; see also EP..... 303
- Sandwell, B. K.
- Canadian spy case, the; S..... 536; see also E..... 247, 360; C..... 554
- Sartre, Jean-Paul, and the existentialist movement. H. Arendt; S..... 226
- Schacht, Hjalmar. See United nations war crimes commission
- Schnabel, Artur. B. H. Haggin; M..... 445
- School of American ballet, the. B. H. Haggin; S..... 138
- Science
- Atomic energy. See Atomic energy
- To the moon by radar; EP..... 114
- Scophonic corporation of America. See Radio
- Selective service. See United States—Army
- Shako, the. R. Lowell; P..... 545
- Sheen, Monsignor Fulton J. See Roman catholic church
- Shelton, Willard
- Strike in the meat packinghouses; S..... 159
- Sherman anti-trust act. See Monopolies
- Shipping
- Facts about the pending maritime strike. K. Hutchison; S..... 721
- Strike averted by last-minute settlement; EP..... 733
- Shiptstead, Henrik. See Minnesota
- Show boat. B. H. Haggin; M..... 138
- Siegel, Eli
- Private industry, tour of; C..... 327
- Silberstein, Murray L.
- Comments on "The myth of world government" by R. Niebuhr; C..... 446; see also 312; C..... 447; 457; C..... 490; C..... 491; C..... 582; C..... 638
- Silone, Ignazio
- Pro memoria; S..... 342
- Silver bloc; facts for increased protection. K. Hutchison; S..... 573
- Sinclair, Upton
- City planning anticipated in "Roadtown" by E. Chambliss; C..... 140
- Slocombe, George
- Is France swinging to the right? S..... 591; see also C..... 794
- New Soviet diplomacy, the; S..... 619; see also 557; C..... 794
- Small-town America. A. Stevens; S..... 687, 718, 784
- Smart, Sybil
- Students support the campaign for world government; C..... 411
- Smith, David, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A..... 109
- Smith, Gerald L. K.
- Testifies before the committee on un-American activities; EP..... 155; see also EP..... 209
- Snyder, John W.
- Named Secretary of the treasury; EP..... 705
- See also War mobilization and reconversion, office of
- Social security
- Coal miners seek a welfare fund, the; E..... 616
- House ways and means committee is preparing to liberalize the provisions; EP..... 182
- Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, the. J. E. Murray; S..... 396; see also EP..... 450; E..... 616
- Soldiers. See United States—Army
- Sometimes I believe. M. Van Doren; P..... 290
- South
- Columbia, South Carolina, today. J. M. Morse; S..... 99
- Dalton, Georgia. A. Stevens; S..... 687
- Monteagle, Tennessee. A. Stevens; S..... 784
- St. Martinville, Louisiana. A. Stevens; S..... 718
- South Africa
- Gold strike and food shortage. K. Hutchison; S..... 543
- South America. See Latin America; names of countries
- Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Spain
- Buys planes from the United States; EP..... 113
- Buys trucks from Britain; EP..... 113
- Caceres, D., visits the United States. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 45
- Cardinal Spellman visits the Franco embassy at Rome; EP..... 245
- Don Juan arrives in Portugal for conversations with Franco representatives; EP..... 197
- Execute. C. Garcia Grande and nine other Republican leaders; EP..... 245
- France regime defended by the Knights of Columbus; E..... 416; see also EP..... 705
- Franco-Spanish relations
- French constituent assembly adopts a resolution calling for a break with Spain; EP..... 86; see also EP..... 113
- Franco's interview with DeW. Mackenzie; EP..... 113
- Franco's zero hour. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 279; see also E..... 275
- Giral, J., proposes to enlarge the government-in-exile. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 18; see also 346; EP..... 357
- Home thoughts from Spain. Sagittarius; P..... 657
- Largo Caballero, Francisco, death. F. Kirchwey; S..... 388
- Nazi agents active. S. Wise; S..... 626
- Nazi economic penetration. M. Sanchez Sarto; S..... 378; see also EP..... 303
- Negrin, J., and the government in exile. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 18; see also 279; 346; EP..... 357
- Portrait of the pretender. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 197
- Prieto's proposal for a plebiscite. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 18
- Question for the U.N. EP..... 57; see also E..... 331; EP..... 388; 429
- Question of, raised in the United nations security council by Poland. F. Kirchwey; S..... 452; see also 498; EP..... 495; E..... 525; E..... 679; EP..... 705 EP..... 735; EP..... 769
- Since V-E day. S. Wise; S..... 391, 398; "Sticks and stones may break my bones." Low; C..... 338
- Three-power declaration on the Franco regime. E..... 275; see also EP..... 626
- W.F.T.U. launches a campaign in behalf of the republic. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 401
- Why Britain wants Franco. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 656
- Specter of the rose. J. Agee; MP..... 765
- Spellman, Francis, Cardinal
- Visits the Franco embassy at Rome; EP..... 245
- Spingarn, Jerry
- Johnston, the; S..... 368
- Spiral staircase, the. J. Agee; MP..... 354
- Sports
- Baseball players may form a union; EP..... 523
- Louis-Cohn fight, the; EP..... 771
- Stalin, Joseph. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Stassen, Harold E.
- Decides not to run for the Senate; EP..... 329
- His chances for the 1948 Republican presidential nomination; EP..... 777
- State department, United States. See United States—State department
- Steel
- Allied control council's plan for German production. K. Hutchison; S..... 100
- Annual report of the United States steel corporation. K. Hutchison; S..... 400
- Industry's profits, the. E. Jones; S..... 119
- Strikes. See Labor—Strikes
- Stelle, John. See American legion
- Sternberg, Fritz
- Germany: political battleground; S..... 504; see also EP..... 494; C..... 674
- Stettinius, Edward R., resigns as U. S. representative to the United nations security council; EP..... 707
- Stevens, Alden
- Small-town America; Dalton, Georgia; S..... 687
- Monteagle, Tennessee; S..... 784
- St. Martinville, Louisiana; S..... 718
- Stocks. See Business
- Stone, Harlan Fiske, death; EP..... 521
- Stone, I. F.
- Case of the mutti, the; S..... 526; see also 287
- Filibuster against the FEPC, the; S..... 158
- Fumbling with famine; S..... 335, 361; see also E..... 359
- Germany's hidden assets; S..... 278
- Line-up on the British loan; S..... 590
- McAlister hill of atomic energy, the; S..... 454; see also EP..... 677; 741
- Palestine report, the; S..... 562
- Palestinian gangsters or patriots? S..... 34
- Snyder in eclipse as reconversion director; S..... 214
- Spain's via dolorosa; S..... 498
- State department report on atomic energy; S..... 390, 418; see also C..... 556; C..... 582
- Symington's victory over Alcoa. I. F. Stone; S..... 90
- Truman wavers on the anti-inflation fight; S..... 214
- Truman's speech on the state of the union; S..... 118; see also S..... 306; 276
- Wyatt's housing program; S..... 186
- Stranger, the. J. Agee; MP..... 765
- Straus, Nathan
- These men block housing; S..... 6; see also C..... 139; 161; C..... 179; 340
- Street, Clarence K.
- Comments on R. Niebuhr's article "The myth of world government"; C..... 490; see also 312; E..... 303; C..... 446; C..... 447; 457; C..... 491; C..... 582; C..... 638
- Strikes. See Labor
- Study in choreography for camera, a. J. Agee; MP..... 269
- Subway from New Britain to the Bronx, the. R. Jarrell; P..... 472
- Sugar, and trade policies. K. Hutchison; S..... 601, 628
- Summer institute for social progress
- To hold conference. D. P. Hill; C..... 492
- Supreme court of the United States
- Bar segregation of Negroes on interstate bus lines; EP..... 706
- Invaliddates discharge from government service of Lovett, Dodd, and Watson; EP..... 706
- Jackson-Black feed, the; EP..... 733
- Stone, H. F., death; EP..... 521
- Vinson, F. M., named chief justice; EP..... 705
- Surplus property board
- Symington's victory over Alcoa. I. F. Stone; S..... 90
- Sweden
- Post-war economic planning. K. Hutchison; S..... 225
- Symington, W. Stuart. See Surplus property board
- Sypher, Wylie
- Hamlet: the existential madness; S..... 750
- T
- Tariffs
- And sugar. K. Hutchison; S..... 601, 628
- Taxation. See Finance, public
- Taylor, Myron C.
- Protestant leaders demand his recall from the Vatican; EP..... 705
- Television. See Radio
- Teller, J. L.
- Salazar is next; S..... 339
- Tier Braak, J. G.
- Report from Holland; C..... 207
- Texas
- Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S..... 648
- McClellan, H. H. Haggin; M..... 354
- Theater. See Haggin, B. H., Krutch, J. W., Marshall, M., for reviews
- They were expendable. J. Agee; MP..... 24
- Thomas, R. J. See United automobile workers' union
- Thornier, Alice
- India's passage to freedom; S..... 253; see also E..... 248
- Three strangers. J. Agee; MP..... 354
- Tilly, Mrs. M. E.
- Appeals for funds to help the General Motors strikers; C..... 299
- To Peter Taylor on the feast of the Epiphany. R. Lowell; P..... 319
- Todd, Tomlinson D. See Negroes
- Totah, Khalil
- Comments on "Middle eastern Munich" by E. Epstein; C..... 410; see also 287; C..... 554
- Trade. See Business
- Transport workers' union
- Threatens to tie up New York subways unless it is recognized as sole bargaining agent; EP..... 247
- Treat, Ida
- General de Gaulle steps down; S..... 194
- Ravelin in Paris; S..... 71
- Trieste
- Deadlock at the foreign ministers' Paris conference. G. Slocombe; S..... 619; see also 557; EP..... 613; E..... 773
- Truckline cafe. J. W. Krutch; D..... 324
- Trujillo, Rafael. See Dominican republic
- Truman, Harry S.
- Administration
- Appeals to the "plain people" for support of his program; E..... 32
- Calls for an inter-American military cooperation act; EP..... 586
- Calls for legislation curb strikes. T. Coffin; S..... 645; see also E..... 641; E..... 680; 681
- Favors civilian control of atomic energy. T. Coffin; S..... 187
- Ickes, H. L., resigns as secretary of the interior; E..... 213
- Missourians' opinion of the President. E. Kirchsten; S..... 455
- Nominate E. W. Pauley as under-secretary of navy; EP..... 154; see also E..... 213

- President's proposal for settling the steel strike; EP.....85;
see also 62; E.....115;
State-of-the-union and budget message;
I. F. Stone; S.....118; see also.....128
Vetoes the Case bill; EP.....733
What do the people think of him?
R. L. Neuberger; S.....63;
see also.....271
- Trusts. See Monopolies
- Trustships
- American position on colonialism, the. F. Kirchwey; S.....116
- Turkey
- Russo-Turkish dispute over the Dardanelles and Soviet Armenia; E.....61;
see also E.....331; EP.....587
- U
- U.A.W. See United automobile workers' union
- U.M.W. See United mine workers' union
- U.N. See United nations
- UNRRA. See United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
- USSR. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Uncle Vanya. J. W. Krutch; D.....671
- Unemployment. See Labor—Employment
- Unemployment insurance. See Social security
- Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
- And Argentina:
Argentine-Soviet rapprochement; EP.....734
And Austria:
Russia seizes control of industrial enterprises in eastern Austria; EP.....275
And China:
Question of Manchuria, the; EP.....245;
see also E.....331
And Germany. See Germany
- And Iran:
Iranian complaint to the UN charges Russia with interference in its internal affairs; EP.....85; see also EP.....153; E.....211; E.....331; 387; EP.....413; EP.....494; C.....582
Russian troops to stay in northwestern Iran past the date agreed on for their evacuation; EP.....273
- And Rumania:
Red army maintains the Groza government in power, the. H. Lehrman; S.....540
- And the United States:
Principles of American-Soviet friendship. I. F. Stone; S.....306;
see also E.....276
And the Vatican. G. La Piana; S.....531
- And Turkey:
Dispute over the Dardanelles and Soviet Armenia; E.....61;
see also E.....331; EP.....587
- Brings the question of Britain's role in Greece before the UN; EP.....153;
see also.....258; 311
- Canada arrests Canadian citizens for revealing atomic information to Soviet agents; E.....247;
Churchill's ultimatum; S.....303; see also.....306; 317; E.....490; C.....491
- Leftism in the atomic age. N. Angell; S.....564; see also E.....561; C.....702
- New Soviet diplomacy, the. G. Slocombe; S.....619; see also EP.....613
- Soviet veto of the UN security council's resolution on Spain; EP.....769;
see also EP.....735
- Stalin's election speech; EP.....185
- Submits its plan for United nations control of atomic energy; opposes the American plan; E.....771; see also E.....735
- Unions, labor. See Labor
- United automobile workers' union
- And the G.M. strike. A. Friendly; S.....62;
see also EP.....1; 35; EP.....58;
C.....271; C.....299; E.....333
- Reiter and Thomas vie for the presidency; E.....301; see also E.....333; EP.....391
- United mine workers' union
- Coal strike, the. A. Friendly; S.....528;
see also EP.....495; EP.....559;
EP.....585; E.....616;
Settlement of the soft coal strike; EP.....677
- United nations
- Agenda for the Security council; E.....331;
see also EP.....357
- Anglo-Russian dispute over Greece; EP.....53;
see also.....258
- Assembly meeting in retrospect, the. A. Vallance; S.....311
- Atomic-power commission, the. F. Kirchwey; S.....116; see also E.....360; 390; E.....735; E.....771
- Bevin proposes the creation of a refugee commission; EP.....87
- Choosing a permanent site. F. Gutheim; S.....506
- Ghosts of Geneva, the. A. Vallance; S.....92
- Iranian problem, the; EP.....211;
see also EP.....153; E.....211;
EP.....273; E.....331; 387;
EP.....413; EP.....494 C.....582
- Leftism in the atomic age. N. Angell; S.....564; see also E.....561; C.....702
- Makes a good start; EP.....57;
see also C.....91
- Myth of world government, the. R. Niebuhr; S.....312; see also C.....446; C.....447; 452; C.....490; C.....491; C.....583; C.....584
- Pearson, L. B. appears best fitted to serve as secretary general; EP.....1;
see also.....101
- Prospects for keeping the peace. P. E. Corbett; S.....336
- Receives memorandum from The Nation associates requesting suspension of Argentina; S.....141; see also EP.....57; E.....88; 156; E.....331
- Report by A. H. Vandenberg; E.....276;
see also.....306
- Russian-British antagonisms; E.....211
- Secretariat, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....101
- Security council: members; EP.....57
- Spanish issue, the; EP.....57;
see also EP.....183; E.....381; E.....388; 428; 429; 452; EP.....495; 498; E.....525; E.....679;
EP.....705; EP.....735; EP.....769
- Stettinius, E. R., resigns as U. S. representative on the Security Council; A. Tamm, W. R., named as his successor; EP.....707
- United States should provide strong leadership. F. Kirchwey; S.....116
- United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
- Allow the distribution of relief in China to be administered by the Nationalist government. C. D. Lealad; C.....794
- Famine stalks Europe and Asia. K. Hutchison; S.....196;
see also EP.....273
- Fumbling with I. F. Stone; S.....335, 361; see also E.....359; EP.....493
- LaGuardia, F. H., becomes director. F. Kirchwey; S.....388
- See also Food
- United nations war crimes commission
- Crimes of Admiral N. Horthy, the. E. Goering, H., testifies at Nuremberg; EP.....31
- Schacht, H., testifies; EP.....560
- United States
- And Argentina:
American blue book, the; E.....212;
see also EP.....495
- FEA reports hidden German assets. I. F. Stone; S.....278
- And China:
Work of General G. C. Marshall, the; E.....61; see also EP.....113; EP.....154; EP.....245; EP.....274; E.....496; EP.....559; EP.....769
- And France. See French loan.
- And Great Britain:
American liberals and British labor. R. Niebuhr; S.....155;
British loan, the; E.....181; 316; EP.....451; E.....560
- Churchill's speech at Fulton, Missouri; E.....317; see also.....316
- And Latin America:
Braden, S., calls for multilateral American action against regimes that threaten hemisphere security; E.....88;
see also.....116
- Truman calls for an inter-American military cooperation act; EP.....586
- And Spain:
Carceller, D., visits the United States. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....45
- FEA reports on hidden German assets. I. F. Stone; S.....278
- Franco purchases planes and other equipment; EP.....113
- Three-power conference on the Franco regime, the; E.....275;
see also EP.....301; 388; 626
- And the U.N. F. Kirchwey; S.....116
- And the Soviet Union:
Principles of American-Soviet friendship. I. F. Stone; S.....306;
see also E.....276
- Speeches of Vandenberg and Byrnes, the; E.....276
- Arrives
- Eisenhower, General D. D., clarifies the demobilization program; EP.....87
- Investigates the caste system; EP.....415
- Lichfield trials, the; EP.....415; 715
- Senate-House conference reach a compromise on extension of selective service; EP.....770; see also E.....497
- Service merger, the; E.....4;
see also.....643
- Soldiers demonstrate against slow mobilization; E.....60;
see also C.....207; EP.....246
- Truman calls for an inter-American military cooperation act; EP.....85
- What is wrong with the court-martial system. M. Rosenblatt; S.....501;
see also EP.....495; EP.....522; 658; 660
- Congress. See Congress
- Navy:
- Investigates case of the carrier Croatan's barring Negro veterans for lack of segregation facilities; EP.....59
- Segregation, navy style. R. B. Konikow; C.....179
- Service merger, the; E.....4;
see also EP.....643
- Truman nominates E. W. Pauley as under-secretary of navy; EP.....154
- State department
- Associated Press refuses to make its service available to the Office of international information and cultural affairs; EP.....88
- Braden, Spruille, assistant secretary. R. Bendiner; S.....215
- Byrnes reports on the foreign ministers' conference at Paris; E.....644
- Byrnes speaks on American foreign policy; E.....276; see also 306; E.....331
- Refuses a visitor's visa to T. Wintringham; EP.....274
- Report on international control of atomic energy. I. F. Stone; S.....390, 418
- Treasury department:
- Snyder, J. W., becomes new secretary; EP.....705
- Turning point in foreign policy: the speeches of Vandenberg and Byrnes; E.....276; see also E.....331
- United States steel corporation
- Annual report. K. Hutchison; S.....400
- Steel strike, the. A. Friendly; S.....62;
see also EP.....85; E.....115; 119; 121; 214
- Uruguay
- Argentina applies pressure. V. Prewett; S.....685
- Its proposal of collective intervention by the American republics against regimes which threaten hemisphere security. F. Kirchwey; S.....156;
see also E.....88; 116; E.....212; 215
- Utah
- Memo on the Mormons. C. McWilliams; S.....97
- V
- Vacation from marriage. J. Agee; MP.....354
- Vallance, Aylmer
- Bread, bills, and Bevinism; S.....258
- Britain and empire planning; S.....69
- Bournemouth convention of the British labor party; S.....711
- Ersatz orchids for UN; S.....311
- Ghosts of Geneva, the; S.....92
- Van Doren, Mark
- Close claim, the; P.....290
- Moonrise limited; P.....290
- Sometimes I believe; P.....290
- Vandenberg, Arthur H.
- Reports on the United nations; E.....276;
see also.....306
- Vargas, Jorge. See Philippine islands
- Vatican, the. See Roman catholic church
- Veterans, war
- A. V. C. sets the pace. J. S. Atlee; S.....740
- American legion charges a breakdown in the Veterans administration and demands the removal of General O. Bradley; EP.....155
- Group of artificial limb manufacturers indicted for conspiracy to fix prices; EP.....2
- Pegler, W., attacks the American veterans' committee; EP.....246
- Survey of veterans' organizations. W. Price; S.....623
- Veterans' league of America, the. A. Levy; C.....299
- Veterans of foreign wars; its program and structure. W. Price; S.....623
- Viet Nam. See Indo-China
- Vinson, Fred M. See Supreme court, United States
- Virgin islands
- Hastie, W. H., nominated as governor; S.....29
- Volk, William
- Comments on "Haunted Housing" by M. Rosenblatt; C.....299; see also.....161
- W
- W. F. T. U. See World federation of trade unions
- Wages. See Labor
- Wagner-Murray-Dingell health bill. See Social security
- Walter, Bruno. B. H. Haggin; M.....82
- Walk in the sun. A. J. Agee; MP.....24
- War crimes. See United nations war crimes commission
- War department, United States. See United States—Army
- War mobilization and reconversion, office of
- Report on reconversion by Snyder; EP.....415
- Snyder, J. W., in eclipse. I. F. Stone; S.....186; 214
- Warren, Earl. See California

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Washington		Williams, John D.		World council of churches
Primary elections. R. Bendiner; S.....	648	Comments on "The two Nurembergs" by		Conference in Geneva; EP.....	303
Washington letter (articles by I. F. Stone)		P. de Mendelssohn; C.....	55	World federation of trade unions
34, 90, 118, 158, 186, 214, 278, 306,		Williams, William Carlos	751	Interview with L. Saillant, an. J. Alvarez
335, 361, 390, 418, 454, 498, 526, 562, 590		Injury, the; P.....	176	del Vayo; S.....	401
Washington university; taxation and race re-		Winter's tale, the. J. W. Krutch; W.....	137	Its campaign in behalf of the Spanish lations. C. McWilliams; S.....	593	Wintringham, Tom; refused a visitor's visa		republic. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	401
Watson, Goodwin B.; his discharge from gov-		by the United States Department of		Worley, Henry E.
ernment service invalidated by the Su-		state; EP.....	274	Comments on "These men block housing"
preme court; EP.....	706	Wisconsin		by N. Straus; C.....	139; see also.....	6
Weaver, Robert Leigh		Exit the Progressive party. M. McMillin;		Would-be gentleman, the. J. W. Krutch; D..	108
Notes on Canadian literature; S.....	198	S.....	367	Wyatt, Wilson. See Housing
Weissgal, Mendy		Primary elections, the. R. Bendiner; S....	648	Wynn, Sproesser
Soldier protest in Manila; C.....	207	Wise, Sidney		Comments on "Terror in Bolivia" by J. A.
Weitling, Wilhelm; his letters and manu-		Spain: postwar model; S.....	626	Arze; C.....	27
scripts sought. C. Wittke; C.....	674	Without reservations. J. Agee; MP.....	701	Yale and Towne lock company
Weston, Edward, photography exhibit. C.		Wittke, Carl		Why its workers are on strike. J. M.
Greenberg; A.....	294; see also C.....	Seeks letters and manuscripts by W.		Morse; S.....	37
Wheeler, A. Basil		Weitling; C.....	674	Yoshida, Shigeru. See Japan
Comments on "Calling all social scientists"		Wood, L. Hollingsworth		Yugoslavia
by S. Chase; C.....	674; see.....	Spanish republicans receive relief from the		Macedonia under Tito. H. Lehrman; S....	713
Where the rainbow ends. R. Lowell; P....	228	International rescue and relief commit-		Mihailovich, D., on trial; E.....	615
Wilk, Jacob		tee; C.....	271	Revisited. H. Lehrman; S.....	713, 747
Comments on J. W. Krutch's review of		World bank and fund. See International		Trieste issue, the. G. Slocombe; S....	619;
"Dream girl"; C.....	140; see also....	bank for reconstruction and development		see also 557; EP.....	613; E.....

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.
The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

PAGE

- Abrams, Charles; R. 511
Adams, Mildred; R. 319, 544, 603
Adventure in diplomacy. K. Pendar; B. 52
Adventures of Wesley Jackson, the. W. Saro-yan; B. 788
Age of assassins. P. Soupault; B. 787
Agriculture in an unstable economy. T. W.
Schultz; B. 576
Alinsky, Saul D.
 Reveille for radicals; B. 481
Altrivia. L. P. Smith; B. 48
Alsop, Stewart, and T. Braden
 Sub rosa: The OSS and American espionage; B. 348
Alvarez del Vayo, Julio; R. 74
America's Germany. An account of the occupation. J. Bach, Jr.; B. 546 American-Russian rivalry in the far east.
 E. H. Zabriskey; B. 403
And he hid himself. A play in four acts.
 I. Silone; B. 756
Andrews, Roy Chapman
 Meet your ancestors; AN. 325
Angustia. G. Ramos; B. 482
Arab island. The. F. Stucke; B. 479
Arch of triumph. E. M. Remarque; B. 203
Arendt, Hannah; R. 22, 50
Arms and policy. H. Nickerson; B. 22
Armstrong lift, the diary of a glider pilot.
 L. E. Hagen; B. 174
Art of building cities. J. Sittler. Translated by C. T. Stewart; B. 697
Artists on art: from the XIV to the XX century. Compiled and edited by R. Goldwater and M. Treve; B. 481
Augur, Helen
 Passage to glory; B. 323
Azcarate, P. de
 League of nations and national minorities;
 B. 83

B

- Bach, Julian, Jr.
 America's Germany. An account of the occupation; B. 546
Bach reader, the. Edited by H. T. David and A. Mendel; B. 206
Baker, John R.
 Science and the planned state; B. 76
Balance of tomorrow, the: Power and foreign policy in the United States. R.
 Strauss-Hupé; B. 102
Barnes, Leo; R. 320
Barrett, William; R. 132
Barzun, Jacques; R. 787
Bates, Ralph; R. 174, 293, 379, 440, 481, 513, 549, 694
Battle report, the Atlantic war. W. Karig;
 B. 613
Beard, Mary R.
 Woman as a force in history; B. 577
Bendiner, Robert; R. 725
Benedict, Agnes E.; R. 725
Benedict, Ruth
 Patterns of culture; B. 722
Benjamin Franklin's autobiographical writings
 Selected and edited by C. Van
 Doren; B. 83
Bernard Clare, J. T. Farrell; B. 668
Bernstein, Walter; R. 65
Bitter box, the. B. 514
Blanchard, B., and others Philosophy in American education. Its tasks and opportunities; B. 375
Blood, sweat, and lipstick. E. Danenberg; B. 132
Bolté, Charles
 New veteran, the; B. 65
 see also C. 299
Booth, Edward Townsend
 God made the country; B. 322
Boulding, K. E. R. 22
Bowers, Elizabeth
 Ivy gripped the steps; B. 483
Bowles, Chester A.
 Tomorrow without fear; B. 663
Brabin, Thomas, and S. Alsop
 Sub rosa: The OSS and American espionage;
 B. 348
Brazile: People and institutions. T. L. Smith;
 B. 550
Breaking the building blockade. R. Lasch; B.
 Brehner, John Bartlett 511
 North Atlantic triangle; B. 50
Bridgeshead revisited. E. Waugh; B. 19
Bridge, the. R. Pitter; B. 632

Brinton, Crane

- United States and Britain, the; B. 694
Britain, partner for peace. P. E. Corbett; B. 694
Brown, Ralph Adams; R. 323
Brown, Sterling A.; R. 574
Bryn Jones, David
 Toward a democratic new order; B. 21
Brynes, Asher
 Government against the people; B. 787
Bullock, Helen Duprey
 My head and my heart: A little history of Thomas Jefferson and Maria Cosway; B. 320
Bulwark, the. T. Dreiser; B. 466
Burning-glass, the. W. de la Mare; B. 134
Butcher, Harry C.
 My three years with Eisenhower; B. 629

C

- Cant, Gilbert
 Great Pacific victory, the; B. 321
Casey, Robert Pierce
 Religion in Russia; B. 602
Challenge to musical tradition. A. T. Katz;
 B. 173
Chas. Stewart; R. 264, 538;
 see also C. 638; C. 674
Chiaramonte, Nicola; R. 20
Chicago Tribune, the: Its first hundred years.
 Volume 20, 1865-1880. P. Kinsley; B. 292
Chief Justice Stone and the supreme court.
 S. J. Konefsky; B. 200
Ciano diaries, 1939-1943, the; B. 74
Clark, Eleanor
 Bitter box, the; B. 514
Cloak and dagger: The secret story of the
 OSS. C. Ford and A. MacBain; B. 348
Cohn, Alfred E.
 Minerva's progress; B. 666
Collier, John; R. 351
Comager, Henry Stiel; R. 723
Complete writings of Thomas Paine. Collected and edited by P. S. Foner. Two volumes; B. 228
Confessions of a European intellectual. F.
 Schönbrenner; B. 604
Cook, Fannie
 Mrs. Palmer's Honey; B. 290
Corbett, Jim
 Man-eaters of Kumaon; B. 576
Corbett, Percy E.
 Britain, partner for peace; B. 694
Courts and cabinets. G. P. Gooch; B. 291
Cranston, Ruth
 Story of Woodrow Wilson, the; B. 293
Creamer, Daniel. R. R. Nathan, and O. Gass
 Palestine, problem and promise; B. 549
Cross-section. Edited by E. Seaver; B. 77

D

- Danenberg, Elsie
 Blood, sweat, and lipstick; B. 132
David, Henry; R. 293
David the king. G. Schmitt; B. 352
De la Mare, Charles A. R. 786
De la Mare, Walter
 Burning-glass, the; B. 134
Dean, Vera Micheles
 Four cornerstones of peace, the; B. 267
Deering, Ferdi
 USDA, manager of American agriculture;
 B. 293
Delta wedding. E. Welty; B. 578
Democratic education in practice. R. Schneiderman; B. 725
Democracy in America. A. de Tocqueville;
 B. 130
Dennen, Leon
 Trouble zone: Brewing point of world war
 II; B. 202
Diaries of Tchaikovsky, the. Translated from the Russian with notes by W. Lakond;
 B. 206
Dickens, Dall, and others. G. Orwell; B. 630
Dismissing the signs of the times. R.
 Niebuhr; B. 753
Dreiser, Theodore
 Bulwark, the; B. 466
Drums under the windows. S. O'Casey; B. 577
Dryden, John. A study of his poetry. M. Van
 Doren; B. 266
Dunn, Esther Clouman
 Pursuit of understanding; B. 52

E

- East India company and the British empire in the far east, the. M. E. Wilbur; B. 83
Ebeling, Hermann; R. 546
Eclipse. A. Moorehead; B. 694
Economic progress and social security. A. G.
 B. Fisher; B. 439
Edman, Irwin; R. 476
Education for modern man. S. Hook; B. 476
Eldridge, Fred
 Wrath in Burma; B. 788
Epstein, Israel; R. 172
Ernst, Morris L.
 First freedom, the; B. 723
Experiment in Germany. The story of an American intelligence officer. S. K.
 Padover; B. 546

PAGE

F

- Farrell, Charles B.; R. 173
Farrell, James T.
 Bernard Clare; B. 668
Faulkner, Edward H.
 Uneasy money; B. 378
Fenichel, Otto
 Psychoanalytical theory of neurosis, the;
 B. 490
Filler, Louis; R. 292
Finer, Herman
 Road to reaction; B. 22
First freedom, the. M. L. Ernst; B. 723
Fisher, Allan G. B. 439
Economic progress and social security; B.
Florence Ayscough and Amy Lowell: Correspondence of B. 441
Focus. A. Miller; B. 203
Food or famine: The challenge of erosion.
 W. Shephard; B. 351
Ford, Corey, and A. MacBain
 Cloak and dagger: The secret story of the OSS; B. 348
Ford, Harvey S.; R. 22, 321
Forever China. R. Payne; B. 172
Four cornerstones of peace, the. V. Micheles
 Dean; B. 267
France—a short history. A. Guérard; B. 548
Franklin, Benjamin; autobiographical writings.
 Selected and edited by C. Van
 Doren; B. 83
Frazz, E. Franklin; R. 201;
 see also C. 326
French literature and its masters. G. Saints-bury. Edited by H. Cairns; B. 292
Friendly persuasion, the. J. West; B. 203

G

- Gass, Oscar, D. Creamer, and R. R. Nathan
 Palestine, problem and promise; B. 549
Gerard Manley Hopkins. Kenyon critics; B. 347
Gide, André
 Thésée; B. 576
Gilbert, Robert
 Meine reime deine reime; B. 350
Glazer, Nathan; R. 722
Glover, T. R.
 Springs of Hellas and other essays; B. 378
God made the country. E. T. Booth; B. 322
Goldberg, Arthur J.; R. 348
Good, G. P.
 Courts and cabinets; B. 291
Gordon, J. King; R. 50
Government against the people. A. Brynes;
 B. 787
Government and labor in early America.
 R. B. Morris; B. 512
Great Britain in the world economy. A. E.
 Kahn; B. 405
Great Pacific victory, the. G. Cant; B. 321
Great retreat, the: The growth and decline of communism in Russia. N. S. Timasheff;
 B. 602
Greenberg, Clement; R. 377, 481
Grooves of change. Viscount Samuel; B. 404
Guérard, Albert
 France—a short history; B. 548
Guérard, Albert; R. 202, 267, 291, 379, 438, 510, 550, 576, 666, 697
Guggenheim, Peggy
 Out of this century; B. 405

H

- Hagen, Louis E.
 Armstrong lift, the diary of a glider pilot;
 B. 174
Haggin, B. H.; R. 206
Hannum, Alberta
 Spin a silver dollar; B. 78
Hardwick, Elizabeth; B. 404
Harris, Aurelia Brooks
 Owen Meredith: A critical biography of
 Robert, first Earl of Lytton; B. 605
Harlow, Alvin F.
 Steelwales of New England; AN. 325
Harris, Herbert, and S. T. Williamson
 Trends in collective bargaining; B. 78
Harris, Seymour E.
 Inflation and the American economy; B. 350
Harrow, Benjamin; R. 756
Hartley, Marsden
 Selected poems; B. 237
Hayek, F. A.
 Comments on S. Chase's review of "The social problems of an industrial civilization" by E. Mayo; C. 638; see also R. 538
Hexter, Ervin
 International careers; AN. 325
Hook, Sidney
 Education for modern man; B. 476
Hook, Sidney; R. 375
Hopkins, Gerard Manley. Kenyon critics; B. 347
Horizon stories. Edited by C. Connolly; B. 483
House of Europe, the. P. S. Mowrer; B. 80
Huserman, Leo
 Truth about unions, the; B. 322
Hucksters, the. F. Wakeman; B. 762
Humphries, Rolf; R. 292, 322, 378, 440, 478, 577, 605

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Hungary—to be or not to be. R. Vamberg;	786	Maugham, W. Somerset	788	Palestine, problem and promise. R. R. Nathan,	549
Hutchison, Keith		Then and now; B.	754	O. Gass, and D. Creamer; B.	549
Rival partners: America and Britain in		Mauldin, Bill; R.		Passage from home. I. Rosenfeld; B.	606
the post-war world; B.	264	Mayo, Elton		Passage to glory. H. Augur; B.	323
Hutchison, Keith; R.83, 132, 404, 479, 663		Social problems of an industrial civilization,		Patterns of culture. R. Benedict; B.	722
Huxley, Aldous		the; B.538; see also C.638; C.674		Payne, Robert
Science, liberty, and peace; B.	402	McCuller, Carson		Forever China; B.	172
I		Members of the wedding, the; B.	406	Torments of spring; B.	634
I accuse de Gaulle. H. de Kerillis; B.	438	McMahon, A. Philip		Peace, security, and the United Nations.
I chose freedom. V. Kravchenko; B.	602	Preface to an American philosophy of art;		Editor by H. J. Morgenthau; B.	202
In youth is pleasure. D. Welch; B.	406	B.	377	Pendar, Kenneth
Industry in Latin America. G. Wythe; B.	379	McWilliams, Carey		Adventure in diplomacy; B.	52
Inflation and the American economy. S. E.		Southern California country; B.	697	Perilous balance. A. Stein; B.	632
Harris; B.	350	Meet your ancestors. R. C. Andrews; AN.	325	Perry, Ralph Barton
Ingersoll, Ralph		Meine reime deine reime. R. Gilbert; B.	350	One world in the making; B.	548
Top secret; B.	694	Members of the wedding, the. C. McCuller;		Petry, Ann
Inquiry into "the nature of peace" and the		B.	406	Street, the; B.	290 terms of its perpetuation, an. T. Veblen;		Memoirs of Hecate county. E. Wilson; B.	379	Petty, Mary
B.	510	Menander, two plays of. B.	292	This petty pace. With a preface by J.
International cartels. E. Hexner; AN.	325	Mendelssohn's letters. Edited by G. Selden;		Thurber; B.	20
International law of the future, the: Postu-		Goth; B.	202	Philosophy in American education. Its tasks lates, principles, and proposals. Prepared		Meredith, Owen: A critical biography of		and opportunities. B. Blanshard and under the auspices of the Carnegie endow-		Robert, first Earl of Lytton. A. B.		others; B.	375
ment for international peace; B.	406	Harlan; B.	605	Pitter, Ruth
Italian democracy in the making: The political		Milano, Paolo; R.	548	Bridge, the; B.	632
scene in the Gliottista era, 1900-1914.		Miller, Arthur	104	Pler
A. W. Salomone. Introductory essay by		Focus; B.	203	Wind in the olive trees: Spain from the
G. Salvemini; B.	104	Miller, Merle; R.	67	inside; B.	664
Italy and the coming world. L. Sturzo; B.	20	Miller, Perry; R.	228	Plimmer, Denis; R.	403
Ivy gripped the steps. E. Bowen; B.	483	Miller, Walter		Pesony, Stefan T.; R.	102
J		Last phase, the; B.	694	Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr.
Jarrell, Randall; R.134, 237, 632		Minerva's progress. A. E. Cohn; B.	666	Marching blacks; B.	201;
John Dryden: A study of his poetry. M.		Mrs. Palmer's Honey. F. Cook; B.	290	see also C.	326
Van Doren; B.	266	Modell, Merriam		Powell, Dawn; R.	20
John Henry Newman. J. Moody; B.	132	Sound of years, the; B.	697	Preface to an American philosophy of art.
Johnson, Harry M.; R.	788	Modern German literature, 1870-1940. V.		A. McMahon; B.	377
Jordan, Virgil		Lange; B.	22	Psychoanalytical theory of neurosis, the.
Manifesto for the atomic age; B.	577	Modern women poets of Spanish America.		O. Fenichel; B.	440
Justement, Louis		S. C. Rosenbaum; B.	310	Psychological frontiers of society, the. A.
New cities for old; B.	291	Monroe, James, biography. A. Styron; B.	174	Kardiner, with the collaboration of R.
K		Moody, John		Linton, C. Du Bois, and J. West; B.	46
Kahn, Alfred Edward		John Henry Newman; B.	132	Pursuit of understanding. E. C. Dunn; B.	52
Great Britain in the world economy; B.	405	Moore, Harriet L.		Last chapter; B.	754
Kardiner, Abram		Soviet far eastern policy, 1931-1945; B.	403
Psychological frontiers of society, the. With		Morehead, Alan
the collaboration of R. Linton, C. Du		Eclipse; B.	694
Bois, and J. West; B.	46	Morris, Charles
Karig, Walter		Signs, language, and behavior; B.	760
Battle report, the Atlantic war; B.	513	Morris, Richard B.
Kerillis, Henri de		Government and labor in early America; B.	512
I accuse de Gaulle; B.	438	Mower, Paul Scott
Kesten, Hermann; R.	604	House of Europe, the; B.	80
Kinsley, Philip		Mumford, Lewis
Chicago Tribune, the: Its first hundred		Values for survival: Essays, addresses, and years. Volume two, 1865-1880; B.	292	letters on politics and education; B.	472
Konefsky, Samuel J.		Murray, Gilbert
Chief Justice Stone and the supreme court;		Two plays of Menander: The rape of the
B.	200	locks and The arbitration. The fragments
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R.267, 291, 320, 402, 513, 576		translated and the gaps conjecturally
Kuczynski, Jurgen		filled in; B.	292
Labor conditions in Great Britain, 1750		Music makers, the: An anthology of recent to the present; B.	665	American poetry. Compiled by S. A.
L		Colobret; B.	632
Labor conditions in Great Britain, 1750 to		My country, school diary. J. Welter; B.	668 the present. J. Kuczynski; B.	665	My head and my heart: A little history of Lampell, Millard		Thomas Jefferson and Maria Cosway.
Long way home, the; B.	544	H. D. Bullock; B.	320
Lange, Victor		My three years with Eisenhower. H. C.
Modern German literature, 1870-1940; B.	22	Butcher; B.	629
Breaking the building blockade; B.	511	N
Last chapter. E. Pyle; B.	754	Nathan, Robert R., O. Gass, and D. Creamer
Last of the cocked hats, the: James Monroe		Palestine, problem and promise; B.	549 and the Virginia dynasty. A. Styron; B.	174	Ned Ward of Grub street. H. W. Troyer;
Last phase, the. W. Willis; B.	694	B.	511
Lay my burden down. A folk history of		New cities for old. L. Justement; B.	291 slavery. Edited by B. A. Botkin; B.	574	New veteran, the. C. C. Bolt; B.	65
League of nations and national minorities.		see also C.	299
R. de Azcarate; B.	83	Newman, John Henry, biography. J. Moody;
Lebowitz, Martin; R.	548	B.	132
Ledyard, John, biography. H. Augur; B.	323	Nickerson, Hoffman
Lincoln and the south. J. G. Randall; B.	725	Arms and policy; B.	22
Lincoln the president: Springfield to Gettys-		Niebuhr, Reinhold
burg. J. G. Randall. Two volumes; B.	544	Discerning the signs of the times; B.	753
Long way home, the. M. Lampell; B.	544	Niebuhr, Reinhold; R.21, 232;
Lost landscape, the. W. Welles; B.	440	Cin. C.	683; 602
M		This hunger; B.	105
MacBain, Alastair, and C. Ford		North Atlantic triangle. J. B. Brebner; B.	105
Clock and dagger: The secret story of the		Noyes, Charles E.; R.	378, 439
OSS; B.	348	O
Man-eaters of Kumaon. J. Corbett; B.	576	O'Brien, Justin; R.	292
Manifesto for the atomic age. V. Jordan; B.	577	O'Casey, Sean
Marching blacks. A. C. Powell, Jr.; B.	201;	Drums under the windows; B.	577
see also C.	326	One world in the making. R. B. Perry; B.	548
Marshall, Margaret; R.48, 130, 170		Orwell, George
		Dickens, Dali, and others; B.	630
		Out of this century. P. Guggenheim; B.	405
		Owen Meredith: A critical biography of
		Robert, first Earl of Lytton. A. B.
		Harlan; B.	605
		P
		Padover, Saul K.
		Experiment in Germany. The story of an
		American intelligence officer; B.	546
		Paine, Thomas, complete writings. Collected and edited by P. S. Foner; B.	228

[illegible]

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 5, 1946

NUMBER 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

The Congressional Record
A Unified Defense Policy
Reunion in Moscow

ARTICLES

These Men Block Housing by Nathan Straus
Far Eastern Impact by Andrew Roth
Letter from Rome by Alberto Moravia
Cynicism Wins in Italy by Donald Downes
What Will Your Dollar Buy in 1946?
by Alfred Friendly
A Man Around Fifty by Martin Gumpert
Next. A Poem by Richard Armour
Homage to Alvin Johnson by Max Lerner
In the Wind
The People's Front by Del Vayo

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Piety of Evelyn Waugh by Diana Trilling
Mary Petty Presents— by Dawn Powell
Italy and the Church by Nicola Chiaromonte
Briefer Comment
Films by James Agee
Art by Clement Greenberg
Music by B. H. Haggin

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 142 by Jack Barrett

The Shape of Things

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT OF BIG-THREE UNITY WAS almost more than a shattered world had believed possible. Yet without it the first meeting of the United Nations Organization next week would have had little meaning. The focus of world attention on Moscow tended to obscure the important achievements of the Preparatory Commission of the UNO in London. As a matter of fact, the broad area of agreement gained by the delegates there on matters of procedure and organization presaged the more fundamental unity on matters of policy. In the two important issues yet to be decided the margin of decision was narrowed. The key post of secretary general has to be filled, and several candidates from among the middle powers of Europe and the New World have been suggested. After studying the list The Nation has come to the conclusion that Canada's ambassador to Washington, Lester B. (Mike) Pearson, carries the best credentials. He has served his country with distinction in many important posts and in several United Nations bodies has displayed rare administrative ability, conciliatory patience, and resilient humor. In the matter of the site for the United Nations Organization, The Nation frankly favors Hyde Park. Nothing could be more fitting than that the new organization for world peace should select the birthplace and home of the man most responsible for its inception. For Hyde Park has taken on symbolic significance not only for the great mass of the American people but for the peace-seeking peoples of the world.

✱

DEFYING THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, public opinion, common sense, precedent, and logic, General Motors has refused to cooperate with the Fact-Finding Board investigating the strike of its employees which began some five weeks ago. Its justification is that any discussion of ability to pay—a factor the board had ruled relevant to the issue—would mean surrender of managerial responsibility. More than that, the corporation's attorney claimed, the automobile workers' union, by insisting on tying its wage demands to questions of prices and profits, was making a broad attack on American free enterprise as an institution. These arguments have a ring as familiar as it is hollow, and Walter Reuther did well to recall how frequently they have been used in the past to resist the right to organize trade unions. For in this dispute the right of collective bargaining is again at stake. In a statement issued on December 29 General Motors declared: "All business questions are inter-related. Costs, prices, wages, profits, schedules, investments

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

European Editor: J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor
J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL
CARBY MCWILLIAMS

JONATHAN DANIELS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1919, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

must be the responsibility of management" (our italics). In other words, it admits the relevance of prices and profits to wages but insists that it is up to the management alone to decide what wages it is right and proper to pay. Granted this premise, any kind of arbitration procedure must be futile, and every labor dispute must become a trial of sheer economic strength. This is not a position likely to prove acceptable to the public, which, however disturbed it may be by the frequency of strikes, is not disposed to back corporation claims to act as judges in their own cause. We are glad, therefore, that the Fact-Finding Board in the General Motors case is carrying on its examination of all relevant material, including whatever financial data it can obtain. In no other way could it perform the task assigned to it, and General Motors' sulky refusal to recognize this fact puts the corporation out of court in a double sense.

✱

DEVALUATION OF THE FRANC HAS LONG BEEN inevitable. The exchange rates of 50 francs to the dollar and 200 to the pound sterling which have ruled since the liberation were fixed low with the intention of discouraging purchases in an almost empty market by American and British soldiers. Moreover, as long as France had little to export and was forced to buy heavily from abroad, the advantages of an overvalued currency were greater than its disadvantages. But if, in terms of relative purchasing power, the franc exchange rates were unrealistic at the time of the liberation, they were still more so before devaluation was decided upon by the French government. The wholesale price index now stands at 460 against 280 a year ago and 100 in 1939, while retail prices have risen even more steeply. The new rate of about 119 francs to the dollar compares with the pre-war rate of between 37 and 38 francs. But while there was a rough equivalence in 1939 between the purchasing power of 37 francs and that of a dollar, 119 francs certainly has less command over goods than today's dollar. This raises the question of whether the devaluation has been sufficiently drastic. If the new rate is to stick—and as a signatory of the Bretton Woods agreement France is restricted in making further alterations in its exchange rates—strong deflationary measures will be necessary. This was recognized by General de Gaulle, who, urging the National Constituent Assembly to vote for the law revaluing the Bank of France's gold reserves, said: "To make this operation effective we must export. To regain a balanced budget, we must renounce new expenditures and not suppress any receipts; and, over and above all, we must produce." France is beginning to show signs of economic recovery, but there, as in England and other countries which unlike the United States have suffered a loss in real wealth during the war, austerity must for long be the order of the day.

✱

THE VATICAN'S MARCH ON THE AMERICAS IS proceeding according to plan. The Catholic church has scored impressive gains in its effort to recoup its European losses in the Western Hemisphere. In Mexico the clerical wave "has swept away thirty-five years of state atheism," and the church is now campaigning vigorously for the election of Ezequiel Padilla as President. In Argentina the entire hierarchy, with the single exception of Monsignor de Andrea, is supporting the candidacy of Perón. And the failure of Cuba to sever relations with Franco Spain has been largely attributed to the influence of the Archbishop of Havana. But the United States still remains the major objective. Five United States bishops have just been elevated to the cardinalate, and the total of North and South American cardinals increased from three to fourteen. The next step may well be the naming of Cardinal Spellman as Papal Secretary of State, an appointment that has been "in the wind" for several months. It is always gratifying to have an American of distinction honored abroad. Unfortunately the political motives that would dictate this choice must temper our enthusiasm. The clerical offensive in this country coincides with reactionary attacks from within, and every move by Rome should be scrutinized with unusual care.

✱

THE PROFITEER IN ANY LINE IS NOT AN attractive character, but the profiteer who exploits the needs of the disabled cuts a peculiarly ugly figure. The Association of Limb Manufacturers, forty-five corporations and thirty-four individuals, were recently indicted by a federal grand jury for conspiracy to fix "high, artificial, unreasonable, and non-competitive prices" for artificial limbs. This group, according to the indictment, makes 75 per cent of the limbs and 90 per cent of the parts and accessories used in the artificial-limb business—which is a nice business amounting to $10,000,000 annually. As a result of the alleged conspiracy to fix prices, said Attorney General Clark, war veterans are forced to pay high and non-competitive prices when they buy direct from manufacturers, and the Veterans' Administration is not permitted to make artificial legs and arms. The Veterans' Administration, as well as state agencies, are forced to pay non-competitive prices; charitable institutions are prevented from making limbs for indigent persons free of charge; and the development and improvement of artificial limbs are impeded. In The Nation of March 10 Edward Maisel discussed at length the industry's sabotage of improved mechanical appliances, and we have reason to think that this article played a part in bringing about the indictment. We hope the case will be vigorously prosecuted to the

Atomic Bomb Supplement

We have on hand a limited number of 24-page supplements containing the addresses delivered at the recent Annual Nation Associates Forum.

The price per copy is 10 cents. A lower rate on larger quantities is offered to schools, organizations and special groups.

THE Nation

Twenty Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

end that the disabled veterans of the war—and we have in mind the casualties of the production line as well as of the battle front—may have the best possible artificial limbs at little or no cost. That is the least we can offer them.

✱

WE HAD HOPED THAT ONE OF THE FRUITS OF peace would, be greater cultural interchange between the nations, but James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, seems to have other ideas. During the war, he explains in a letter to the radio companies, the federation waived its objections to network broadcasts of radio programs, including music from foreign stations, with a view to promoting "good-will and good relations with other countries." But now the war is over Mr. Petrillo believes that "we should get back to normal as rapidly as possible," and he therefore requests the immediate discontinuance of such programs. We don't suppose Mr. Petrillo means there is no further need for good relations with other countries, though his words imply just that. He is concerned only with protecting his members from all possible forms of competition. But like other protectionists he is likely to create a lot of ill will and to invoke retaliation. Among the most important American exports are films, many of them musicals. Suppose the Musicians' Union in Britain—a very powerful body too—placed a ban on the showing of any American films using music on the ground that this importation of foreign labor via the sound-track was taking jobs from their members. In that case, we suggest, American musicians would stand to lose far more than they can gain from barring a few foreign broadcasts. Apart from all calculations of profit and loss, any attempt to create a national cultural monopoly sets a deplorable precedent. As members of the writing profession we ourselves have to meet far more "foreign competition" than do the musicians. We not only welcome it but would fight to the bitter end any attempt to bar it.

✱

WE ARE A LITTLE TORN IN OUR RESPONSE TO the news that Ezra Pound has been adjudged insane and unfit to stand trial on the charge of treason for having made pro-Fascist broadcasts from Italy. Not being bloodthirsty, we can't regret that Ezra is not to be hanged—after all he really isn't in a class with Göring. On the other hand, it seems to us an unwarranted slur on the poet to maintain that he is less responsible for his actions than other men—and we can't help begrudging to various and sundry philistines the satisfaction of having one of the most famous of modern poets declared insane. Reading of Pound's defense—"he insists that his broadcasts were not treasonable, that all of his radio activities stemmed from a self-appointed mission to 'save the constitution'"—we are reminded of a lot of non-poets in the United States who have gone almost as far as Pound because they too were concerned to "save the constitution" but have confined their broadcasts to their own elegant living-rooms or to the columns of certain well-known newspapers. Our own private theory is that Pound's unquestionably treasonable activities had little to do with his character either as a political man or a poet. We have always suspected that one of his self-appointed missions was to find the cultural antithesis of Idaho. He chose Italy—and it is altogether possible that he really believed that Mussolini was the inheritor of the Caesars and would restore the grandeur that was Rome. Which, again, seems to us no more wacky an argument for admiring Mussolini than the one put forward by all sorts of respectable people who couldn't write a line of poetry to save their lives—we mean the one about making the trains run on time.

The Congressional Record

THE SEVENTY-NINTH Congress concluded its first session on December 21 feeling thoroughly satisfied with its labors in the past year. "We have a right to be proud of ourselves," said Speaker Rayburn, while Senator Taft declared: "We are fairly well pleased with the record made by the session both in what was and what was not passed by Congress." Contact with constituents during the vacation will, we hope, deflate this complacency. Despite some rather feverish indications of prosperity, the mood of the country is anxious and its morale low. People are worrying about homes, about job security, about the cost of living, about racial discrimination, not to mention such shadows on the future as the atomic bomb. They are hoping for reduced tension at home and abroad, seeking stability both on the home and the international front and they would like to see greater evidence of active cooperation toward these ends between the executive and legislative arms of the government than has been apparent in recent months.

If Congress measures these aspirations against its achievements, humility rather than self-congratulation should be the keynote at its reassembly on January 14. Indeed it might do worse than open the session with the confessional prayer: "We have left undone those things which we ought to have done, and we have done those things which we ought not to have done." This would serve as a reminder that while it spent a great deal of time in the last year harrying the OPA and bickering over Pearl Harbor, its unfinished business includes a great mass of important social legislation.

We do not suggest, however, that the record of the past session has been wholly negative. On international affairs Congress made a fairly impressive score. It voted the United States into the United Nations Organization by an overwhelming majority; it ratified the Bretton Woods agreement; it renewed the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, giving the Administration increased scope for negotiating the reduction of trade barriers. Finally, at the eleventh hour, after an unpleasant display of chauvinism, Congress authorized urgently required appropriations for UNRRA.

But if Congress proved commendably responsive to Administration leadership in the international field, it failed miserably to carry out the President's domestic program. On September 6, when Congress hastily reconvened after V-J Day, Mr. Truman urged swift action on a series of measures designed to ease the human strains of the reconversion period, pointing out that Congress had already made provision to assist business in the transition by voting tax rebates.

Among other things, he asked for more adequate assistance for the unemployed, with maximum compensation payments of $25 for a period of twenty-six weeks, as well as the extension and strengthening of the United States Employment Service. With a view of securing a firm basis for the economy, he advocated passage of minimum-wage legislation, enactment of the Murray-Wagner Full Employment bill, creation of a Federal Research Agency, and a long-range public-works program including authorization of new regional developments on TVA lines. He also requested the creation of a permanent FEPC and a national health program for which detailed specifications were given in a later message.

The President proposed a very heavy agenda for Congress, and it would have been unreasonable to expect its completion within a few months. Nevertheless the country can rightly complain about the marked lack of progress. The one enterprise on which Congress embarked after September with celerity and enthusiasm was the reduction of taxes. In this matter it went well beyond Treasury recommendations, particularly in the relief given to corporations. On the other hand, we find the Kilgore bill for increasing unemployment compensation stalled by the House Ways and Means Committee after being passed by the Senate in a diluted form. The record on the Full Employment bill is still worse. After the Senate had emasculated it, the House Expenditures Committee slaughtered it and proceeded to write a new measure which does not even pretend to aim at full employment. Minimum-wage legislation is also bogged down, while the bill for a permanent FEPC, although favorably reported by the House Labor Committee, has been blocked by the reactionary Southern Democrats who control the Rules Committee.

There is no point in going over the whole barren record. Typical of the recent attitude of Congress was its action on the United States Employment Service. Not only did it ignore Mr. Truman's request for more money for this bureau, but it sought to turn the service back to the states by the devious method of attaching a rider to a bill disposing of unused war appropriations. The sharply worded message in which the President vetoed this measure, condemning both the attempt to destroy the USES and the manner in which it was done, is a sign that relations between the White House and Capitol Hill are approaching a crisis. When he succeeded to office, Mr. Truman wooed Congress in the most flattering terms, but his cosy intimacies with the Old Guard have failed to bring results. On October 30, broadcasting on wage and price policies, he changed his tactics and administered a spanking to dilatory legislators. But while this attempted discipline produced a yelp from Capitol Hill, it did not effect any noticeable improvement in conduct. So far Mr. Truman has been unable to make his influence felt or to establish a position of leadership. Roosevelt often made Congress furious, but usually it attended to his wishes. If his successor provokes less rage, he also commands less attention.

Whether Mr. Truman has it in him to overcome present Congressional indifference to his recommendations remains to be seen. The veto message previously mentioned suggested an increased vigor, and now we are promised a broadcast address on January 3 which will review the whole legislative program. It has been reported that in this speech the President will tell "the inside story" of his troubles with Congress and will emphasize the work it has left undone. We can only hope he will not pull his punches. In putting his case to the people Mr. Truman is adopting the one strategy by which he can gain his ends. May he rise to the occasion and succeed in combining clarity in exposition with appeal to the public imagination—the combination that won Mr. Roosevelt so many victories.

A Unified Defense Policy

WHEN Congress reconvenes, one of its first tasks will be to achieve a final decision in the long controversy over the merging of the armed services. It will not be an easy decision to reach. Seldom has a question of public policy aroused such bitterness. What should be strictly a technical question has been allowed to degenerate into a dogfight between the brass hats of the army and the gold braid of the navy. Obviously the issue cannot be settled satisfactorily unless Congress can ignore these service rivalries and concentrate on the essential problem of organizing our national defense to meet (1) the special requirements created by such weapons as long range rockets and atomic bombs, and (2) our new responsibilities under the United Nations Charter.

President Truman has presented the case for unification so effectively that there is not very much we can add. With the character of warfare changing rapidly and drastically, we can no longer rely on the kind of coordination that sufficed in World War II. A unified system of national defense is essential for integrated strategic planning. A single supply and procurement agency would save the country many hundreds of millions of dollars by eliminating duplication in effort, unnecessary stockpiling, and wasteful bidding of one service against another for scarce materials. And a single Department of Defense should bring better teamwork within the government wherever defense policies must be coordinated with the activities of other departments.

But unification, as the President well realizes, will not automatically provide the kind of defense coordination which everyone wants. Cooperation cannot be assured by a monolithic organizational chart. It is dependent on elusive psychological factors, and cannot be achieved where there is a feeling of injustice or resentment. Nor can it thrive in an atmosphere of bureaucracy. For example, the Japanese, failed miserably in their efforts to attain effective teamwork in amphibious operations even though they had a highly centralized organizational blueprint. Our Army and Navy, on the other hand, worked fairly successfully together in the Pacific despite a dual command. If we are to have better teamwork in the future, particularly at the strategic levels, it is important that the navy and air forces be satisfied that they will not be swallowed by a dominant army bureaucracy. At first sight it might seem that this problem is met by Mr. Truman's proposal to set up semi-autonomous branches within the Department of Defense for Army, Navy, and Air. Actually, the problem is considerably more complex than it appears on the surface. In many instances the navy specialists are outranked by their counterparts in the army, and the navy is probably justified in fearing that an amalgamation may weaken essential navy operations. Care must be taken, in merging duplicating services, such as intelligence and supply, to safeguard the navy's special interests. To this extent, public opinion will undoubtedly back the House and Senate Naval Affairs Committees in insisting on revision of Mr. Truman's unification plan, which in its present form predominately reflects the army point of view.

It is to be hoped also that Congress will take advantage of the needed reorganization of our national-defense structure to strengthen civilian influence within the armed forces. Mr. Truman has declared that unification will facilitate civilian control by simplifying the structure. But critics of the unification plan fear that an amalgamation of the services will strengthen military influence in Congress and in the civilian departments of the governments. The truth probably is that unification will have very little direct effect either way. The divergence between the military and civilian points of view on vital public issues will in all likelihood remain as long as the services are organized on a fundamentally non-democratic basis. Perhaps it is impossible to have a completely democratic army and navy: military discipline is in itself essentially undemocratic. But every effort should be made to keep the armed services an integral part of American life and tradition. To this end the morale and educational phases of army and navy training should be kept under direct civilian control. Supply, scientific, and technical activities should be freed from exclusive domination by the brass hats. And ways should be worked out to enable competent young men without West Point or Annapolis training to rise to high positions as readily as if they had attended the service schools. At this point the military and democratic objectives merge. For anything that can be done to rid the new unified service of domination by a bureaucracy of the élite will not only make it a more suitable instrument of democratic policy but will enhance its military efficiency.

Reunion in Moscow

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE agreement reached at Moscow gave us less than we wanted and more than we expected. Modest as its accomplishments seem in the light of what must be done to create a society relatively safe from suicide, they were essential to that larger aim. For the foreign secretaries of the three biggest powers reassembled the underpinning without which the United Nations Organization could not stand and the meeting of the Assembly this month could provide only a meaningless stage-play. This is not an insignificant achievement. The tragedy is that seven months after the end of the war and the conference at San Francisco, the foundation alliance should have come so close to falling apart.

It is to be hoped that this minimum of agreement will not be too strongly assailed by groups or nations whose interests have not been fully consulted. Chief among these is France. One can understand the resentment with which the Quai d'Orsay views a plan to write the peace terms for Bulgaria, Rumania, and Hungary without French advice. Although France was not at war with those states, its predominant influence before the war, particularly in Rumania and Hungary, would have indicated a primary share in the settlement. And France is no better pleased with its exclusion from discussion of the Far East and, above all, of atomic control. China, whose role as a "big" power is still nominal and will be until its civil struggle is settled, may question certain points in the agreement—the four-power control of Korea, for example—but it is not likely to do more than grumble. France can cause trouble. But its best friends must hope that expediency will prevail over pride, for in this case expediency represents the price of further international cooperation. France has every right to give notice that it will fight for the sort of settlement it wants; as a member both of the Security Council and the full Council of Foreign Ministers it will have plenty of opportunity to do so. To oppose or delay the application of the Moscow agreement would be politically irresponsible.

The fact is, every nation might as well accept Big Three dominance as the basis of post-war relations. Constant obstruction or outright hostility are useless—purely nihilistic devices. We need agreement between Russia and the West; the job of UNO is to build upon that agreement a democratic structure. While the monopoly of power vested in the Security Council makes the job a tough one, it won't be rendered easier by attacks upon the all-too-fragile understandings that hold the major nations together.

The firm hold of that monopoly was demonstrated in the Foreign Ministers' recommendation that the UNO Assembly establish an atomic-control commission which will report—as far as atomic weapons are concerned—directly to the Security Council. The commission will be made up of one representative from each nation on the Council and will deal with the problems outlined in the original Truman-Attlee-King proposal: the exchange of basic scientific information, the outlawing of atomic bombs and other means of mass destruction, and the creation of international safeguards, including inspection. But the veto rule puts the entire attempt to control atomic weapons at the mercy of any single great power. The United States, as an immediate example, would be able to say no if the commission ordered inspection of existing plants equipped to make bombs or products related to the making of bombs. In other words, the effectiveness of the Moscow plan will be wholly dependent upon the goodwill of each major nation subjected to it—a dangerous arrangement however you look at it.

My conviction is that no secure international control can be established until the atomic commission is made responsible to the UNO as a whole, for not until then will lesser nations regard the decisions of the commission as possessing any of the attributes of law. But this change cannot come immediately, and meanwhile I am aware of certain factors which reconcile me to delay. As long as fascist dictatorships like Argentina, in accord and in constant communication with Spain's fascist regime and with Nazi elements in and out of their own territories, remain members of the UNO, I am willing to postpone full United Nations control of the most dangerous power ever made available to man.

Everybody's Business, a regular Nation feature is omitted this week. In the next issue Mr. Hutchison will discuss the reasons for the current scarcity in consumers goods.

The decision at Moscow on the administration of Japan was moderate and sensible. The machinery for joint control sounds complicated, but it avoids the pitfalls of geographical division and allows MacArthur ample latitude for independent action under broad directives. Given honest intentions, the plan ought to work. If it does it may provide a yardstick for the use of occupation authorities in Europe. This agreement and the ones covering China and Korea are discussed more fully on another page.

The "compromise" on the Balkan issue was in fact a surrender, embellished by certain face-saving clauses. It was a necessary surrender. As this journal has often pointed out, the Western powers can never succeed in naturalizing their own political methods in areas subjected to a tough process of social change under conditions of famine and economic collapse. Nor can they exorcise by diplomatic maneuvers the fact of Russian influence. The best they can do is to accept the basic situation and, in concert with Russia, bring about some modification of revolutionary control. This has been accomplished through the Moscow agreement; it could have been done months ago without provoking ill-will or entailing defeat. Now, perhaps, we can get ahead with the establishment of normal relations; peace can at last be made and the occupation armies withdrawn.

Much anxiety has resulted from the failure of the conference to reach a decision on Iran or on other Near East problems. Nor was anything said about Spain, which clamors for action. Since these matters require Big Three agreement before they can be submitted to the UNO or otherwise disposed of, their postponement is disturbing; but it is not as dangerous as a new deadlock would be. The Foreign Ministers could not afford a repetition of the London fiasco.

These Men Block Housing

BY NATHAN STRAUS

(Administrator of the United States Housing Authority from 1937 to 1942;
now president of Radio Station WMCA)

A RECENT statement of mine that the housing shortage had been deliberately planned by reactionary real-estate interests has been violently contradicted. However, there is ample evidence that the real-estate interests have consistently opposed all new housing which could offer competition with their ancient and insanitary slums. Present conditions were foreseen by many persons two years ago, and the need for action was urged at that time in my book, "The Seven Myths of Housing." Those who, during the war years, obstructed legislation to prepare for a low-rent housing program at the war's end bear a large share of the blame for the shortage today. Who are they?

THE REAL-ESTATE INTERESTS

Skyscraper Management, organ of the National Association of Building Owners and Managers, printed the following item in March, 1941, under the heading, Manhattan Has No Need for New Housing:

A jump in the percentage of vacant old-law tenement dwelling units in Manhattan during 1940, following a substantial increase of such vacancies during 1939, is revealed through the third successive annual survey of eleven typical old-law tenement areas just completed by the Real Estate Board of New York, which shows an average vacancy of 8.6 per cent at the end of January, 1941, as against an average of 7.1 per cent for the same time in 1940, and 6.1 per cent for 1939. Jones W. Mercereau, executive vice-president of the board, in an open letter sent to all members of the legislature from New York County, pointed out that the increased vacancy percentage, "substantiating as it does the high percentage of vacant dwelling units in Manhattan shown by the 1940 census report, proves, if proof were needed, the absence of any probability of a local housing emergency."

On November 13, 1942, according to the New York World-Telegram, James Felt, specialist in old-law tenements, who usually speaks for the organized real-estate interests, said: "Vacancies in old-law tenements continue to rise. Unheated buildings and those without toilets are suffering most." Attributing the "suffering" to the buildings rather than to the unfortunate tenants is itself significant.

The real-estate boards, the apartment-house-owners' associations, the building-and-loan groups have conducted a campaign to discredit public housing. A hundred examples of their methods could be quoted, but the following typical statements will suffice. The Confidential Weekly Letter of the National Association of Real Estate Boards said on December 26, 1939: "USHA public-housing projects now under way are undiluted socialism. . . . Opinion is growing that any plan of operation which puts housing and building permanently into private hands is preferable to the present program of local and federal ownership of housing projects." On January 27, 1943, Rufus S. Lusk, Washington representative of the National Home Builders' Association, as quoted by the New York Times, told a conference of the association, "Public housing is 'nothing but socialism.'"

To ask us to believe that this barrage on many fronts, this constant repetition of the same misstatements, was not the result of a deliberate campaign, is to ask us to stretch our credulity to the breaking-point.

The lobby of the National Home Builders' Association is powerfully abetted by that of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, represented by Herbert U. Nelson, and that of the United States Savings and Loans League, represented by Morton Bodfish. The activities of all three are directed to blocking any legislation which would provide good low-rent housing and thereby interfere with the fat profits gained by keeping unsanitary slum shacks and dark slum rookeries crowded with tenants. Mr. Nelson and Mr. Bodfish maintain close personal contacts with key members of the Congressional committees and seem to have almost unlimited funds at their disposal for printing, arranging conventions, and entertaining lavishly.

THE LINE-UP IN CONGRESS

The cause of better housing has strong champions in Congress. Senators Wagner of New York, Ellender of Louisiana, Taft of Ohio, and Pepper of Florida are leaders of the fight in the upper house. In the lower house Majority Leader McCormack of Massachusetts, Representative Brent Spence (D) of Kentucky, chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, which considers housing legislation, Representative Estes Kefauver (D) of Tennessee, and others have consistently battled for legislation to wipe out slums and provide adequate housing at rents that a family of moderate means can afford to pay.

Aligned against such legislation are a number of Congressmen united not by party ties but by pocket-book interests. Representative Albert Gore (D) of Tennessee is perhaps the ablest of the group. He is an influential member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, where he has been spokesman for the point of view of the slum landlords. Gore is rightly credited with having been chiefly responsible for killing public housing. After failing to smother in committee a bill providing for additional funds for the program, he made his fight on the floor of the House. The speech he delivered on August 3, 1939, when the bill came up for final passage, has always seemed to me to be an outstanding example of the extremes to which men will go in garbling facts and misquoting figures to protect the interests of those they serve. Representative Gore had the satisfaction of bringing about the defeat of the bill in a close vote. In the six years since then he has been equally successful in preventing all legislation to provide decent housing for returning veterans.

The point of view of the reactionary real-estate interests was represented on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which handled all war-housing legislation, by the chairman, Fritz Lanham (D) of Texas. The notorious Section IV of the Lanham act of 1941 provided that war housing should not be designed or ever used after the war to provide good housing for American families. It read as follows: "... said housing or any part thereof shall not, unless specifically authorized by Congress, be conveyed to any public or private agency organized for slum clearance or to provide subsidized housing for persons of low income."

Let it be thought that I am misrepresenting what the Congressman had in mind in writing this section of his act,

Courtesy the Federal Art Project

Drawing by Saul

it may be well to quote his own words. In a speech before the United States Savings and Loans League, as reported in the Washington Star of November 28, 1942, Mr. Lanham said:

The federal government doesn't belong permanently in the housing business, except in very rare instances. You can't find anything in the Constitution that says the government has to build houses for the citizens. . . .

The real-estate business naturally and properly belongs to the real-estate men. . . .

There is nothing in it [the Lanham act] to do with slum clearance or low-cost housing for low-income groups.

Should any bill to provide decent housing for those who live in the slums be enacted into law, the real-estate interests have other means to block the program. The Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives allots money to the various government agencies to carry on their work. In practice, subcommittees of this large committee hear the applications. On the subcommittee which considers and acts upon requests from the housing agencies the slum landlords have two watch-dogs. The function of Wigglesworth (R) of Massachusetts seems to be not only to lend respectability to the cause of the slum owners but to make certain that, if any low-rent housing bill does pass, the government agency charged with carrying out the program shall be harassed by lack of funds for administrative and technical personnel. Wigglesworth's coworker on the committee is Taber (R) of New York. The hatchet man of the so-called "economy bloc," Taber works quietly behind the scenes and seems to have mysterious connections with reactionary and isolationist groups.

These are the men who have successfully led the fight to kill low-cost housing and to bring about the shortage of homes by which slum owners are profiteering today.

SIDESTEPPING THE ISSUE

New evidence of the power of the reactionary real-estate interests was provided recently when the federal government adopted a so-called emergency-housing program which is a betrayal of the veterans even less excusable than the lack of action during the war years. We read in the papers of the appointment of "expeditors" and of government regulations granting priorities to "homes costing less than $10,000." Such action is mere shadow-boxing, a pretense of doing something while carefully sidestepping the real issue. A family must have an income of about $5,000 a year to be able to afford a $10,000 home. How many returning veterans have that income?

The need today is for at least two million new dwellings for families with earnings of from $20 to $50 a week. Such families can afford to pay from $20 to $50 a month in rent. Only public housing can provide healthful, livable homes within their means. History and arithmetic alike confirm this fact.

The United States Housing Act, tested in the courts and proved in use, is an instrument at hand for this purpose. Under the leadership of the United States Housing Authority, local housing authorities in the years 1938 to 1941 built more than 170,000 homes which set new records in excellence of design and economy of construction. President Truman, then a United States Senator heading a committee charged with investigating federal-government agencies, said on October 29, 1941: "There is absolutely nothing to criticize in the United States Housing Authority. It is a highly competent organization working through local authorities."

WHAT CONGRESS SHOULD DO

Congress should immediately enact legislation to authorize the United States Housing Authority to make loans to local authorities sufficient to build two million new homes. Probably less than 10 per cent of the loan funds will be used, since experience proves that local housing authorities can obtain money more cheaply by the sale of their bonds to private and institutional investors—but the loan funds should be available if needed.

The sum of $100,000,000 should be provided by Congress for annual subsidies so that rents in the new housing built may be adjusted by local authorities to fit the family incomes of the veterans most in need of housing. The subsidy required will range from about $100 a year to zero. It will probably average about $50 per annum per family.

Congress should appropriate $200,000,000 immediately for grants to communities for the purchase of housing sites. The appropriation should include a provision by which any unexpended balance will lapse on June 30, 1946. This will insure prompt action by the localities.

There should be a further provision that no part of this land-purchase fund may be used to acquire sites which cost more than $2 a square foot in communities of more than 100,000 population, or $1 a square foot in smaller communities. Unless this provision is included, the real-estate boards will exert pressure upon local governments to take their decaying and obsolete properties off their hands—under the guise of "slum clearance." The federal grant is not to be for buying slums but for buying tracts of land on which new, livable, low-rent homes will be built. The limitation suggested will confine purchases largely to vacant land, and thus no families will be dispossessed from housing which they now occupy. Moreover, the effect of building on vacant land will be to decentralize urban populations. This process, called in England "decongestion of the central mass," is one of the cardinal principles of a sound housing program.

The federal government should grant an absolute priority to local housing authorities for both labor and materials to get the two million dwellings built as quickly as possible. Because of a temporary shortage of critical materials, it may be wise to prohibit all private residential construction for the first six months of this year. All available material and labor would thereby be channeled into the construction of homes for those whose need is greatest. Announcement of such a policy would signalize in an appropriate way an about-face by our government and a new determination to act swiftly and decisively. Of course, the public housing would be built, as in the past, by private contractors employing building labor at prevailing wages.

The amendments to the United States Housing Act outlined above could be written on one sheet of paper. If enacted into law during the month of January, most of the vacant land required could be bought and available for the erection of housing by April 1. By fall several hundred thousand new, livable, low-rent homes could be ready for occupancy.

I believe that those who treat the problem of the homeless veteran lightly are gravely endangering the country. I believe that they do not appreciate how men feel who discover that while they were risking their lives to protect us, we were doing nothing to protect them and their families. Millions of ex-service men are bitterly resentful that we have provided no place for them to live but a miserable slum dwelling.

The government appropriated the funds to build weapons for a victorious war. The veterans expect their government to provide the funds to build them homes for lives of peace.

Far Eastern Impact

BY ANDREW ROTH

(Author of "Dilemma in Japan")

THE RESULTS of the Moscow conference have spread consternation among those elements in Tokyo, Seoul, and Chungking whose hope for survival was based on the deepening of hostility between the United States and Russia. But people elsewhere who yearn for a lasting peace and democratic progress have been able to derive considerable satisfaction from the decisions concerning the Far East taken by the Big Three. While there's many a slip 'twixt the communique and its realization, these decisions have narrowed the Soviet-American rift and enhanced the possibility of developing popular regimes in Japan, Korea, and China without destructive civil wars. Northeastern Asia is the touchstone of relations between the United States and the Soviet Union because it is the only area in the world where the two countries have comparatively equal political, economic, and military interests. Any development that cements Soviet-American accord in that region will contribute to peaceful international relations throughout the world.

Despite the indignation of the MacArthur sect in this country and the wailing of Japanese conservatives, the transition to a four-power supervisory Allied Council in Tokyo with MacArthur as permanent chairman and chief executive is likely to be fairly smooth. China, Britain, and Australia have already indicated substantial agreement with American policies in Japan. And the liberal Washington-born policy directives which MacArthur has been carrying out—and for which he has been getting the lion's share of the credit—are not very far from Russian ideas on how to eliminate the sources of Japanese aggression. There will be no dispute about the necessity of ridding Japan of its semi-feudal land system, the monopolistic hold of the giant Zaibatsu trusts, the jingoist Tenno (emperor-worship) system, and the considerable number of war criminals.

The Russians may differ with us on the speed of Japan's political and economic delousing and on the best methods for achieving the objectives already blocked out. They may criticize us for tolerating the Shidehara government's sabotage of the Potsdam terms and American directives. They may object to our generosity to big business during the reconversion period at a time when millions of Japanese are living in the direst poverty. They are likely to recommend extending the war-crime list on the basis of their long and very thorough investigation into Japanese military-fascist organizations and their superior opportunities for observation during the period of their neutrality, when they could watch Japanese events from the inside. But these are differences in emphasis rather than in approach.

In Korea, however, there is a yawning gap to be bridged. As a result of poor and inadequate State Department preparation, Korean policy bears the heavy imprint of military expediency and conservatism. American occupation officers were informed that one of their major objectives was to build southern Korea into a "bulkhead against communism," and they have frequently acted as if this were their chief or virtually their only purpose. They have reviled and harassed the leftist People's Republic movement which grew out of the Korean underground and embraced extreme conservatives who derived their wealth from collaborating with the Japanese in the spoliation of their own people. The American military commander, Lieutenant General John R. Hodge, has supported the old Korean Russophobe, Syngman Rhee, and crowded the airfields adjoining the Russian-held sector with war planes.

The Moscow agreement calls for the early establishment of a democratic provisional government sponsored by the United States and the Soviet Union and indorsed by China and the United Kingdom. But the achievement of unity and democracy in Korea will require understanding and skill plus a strong desire on the part of the occupying administration. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the American delegates to the preliminary conference in Korea scheduled for next week will not only read the words but breathe of the spirit of the Big Three communiqué.

HE PREFERS SAND-CASTLES

The agreement on China hardly goes beyond recognizing "the need for a unified and democratic China." The crux of the present dispute is that the Communists will not give up their arms until they have democratic guaranties, while the Kuomintang promises it will give China democracy after the Communists have submitted. Few impartial and informed observers believe that the reactionaries in control of the Kuomintang—conscious of their unpopularity—will submit willingly to democratic processes. Consequently if that democracy which must be the foundation stone of unity is to be attained, international pressure will have to be exerted to edge the extreme reactionaries out of their control of the Kuomintang. Success here will help to remove the greatest remaining danger spot in international relations.

Letter from Rome

BY ALBERTO MORAVIA

(Mr. Moravia is a well-known Italian novelist and journalist. He is a cousin of the anti-Fascist Carlo Rosselli, who was murdered on Mussolini's order two years before the war.)

Rome, December 1

FOREIGN visitors to Rome frequently remark that the city seems more prosperous and less dismal than other European capitals. But foreigners, one must realize, do not come in contact with the middle and lower classes, which suffered the most from the war. And, then, Rome, with its unclouded blue skies, its fountains, gardens, and monuments, has always given the impression of serenity, even, perhaps, of opulence. The Romans know, however, that sunshine and fountains, gardens and monuments don't increase the amount of food they are able to get by one gram, or the wages of workers by one cent.

The aristocracy and the rich bourgeoisie have kept their old palaces or their hill-top villas, and in them American and English travelers meet charming ladies and distinguished men who bemoan in good English the activities of the left-wing parties and sigh for the restoration of the monarchy. It was because of their exclusive association with this high society that English diplomats were convinced of the monarchy's popularity among the Italian people. Of course it was not so. Hostility to the monarchy is one of the few things about which Italians are practically unanimous. In the words of an old Italian proverb, the diplomats "went to the innkeeper to ask if the wine was good."

Perhaps more accurate information about conditions in Italy might be obtained from the English and American soldiers who stayed there for two years. They did not frequent palaces or meet the wives and daughters of big business men. Their knowledge of how the people lived and what they thought was gained by chance, in the streets or in public places. They might tell about the great number of prostitutes—very few of whom are professionals—the crowds of beggars, the misery and hopelessness they saw on every hand. Many of them became acquainted with Italian workers' or tradesmen's families, and they found no prosperity or sighing for the return of the monarchy there. Unfortunately it is not soldiers who report to governments or big newspapers, but journalists and diplomats.

At present the problem that occupies the mind of the laborer and white-collar worker in Rome—both these classes are large there, especially the second—is the terrific disparity between wages and the cost of living. I have been in America, and I believe that if such a disparity existed in the United States, laborers and white-collar workers would be so depressed by the utter absurdity and hopelessness of the situation that they would be almost incapable of going on. Italians, however, continue to work.

The American public should know under what conditions men work in Italy. Briefly, it's like this. With wages at their present level a white-collar or manual worker can provide for his needs up to the tenth or perhaps the twelfth of the month. After that he either starves to death or is obliged to "take measures"—arrangiarsi is the Italian word, borrowed from the French. I will speak later of what the word implies. First I want to cite some figures. With a salary that ranges around 300 lire a day—for a white-collar worker it is often as low as 200 lire—a married man with two children in Rome has to spend more than 600 lire a day for food. Buying other essentials, such as shoes or clothing, is of course out of the question. To arrangiarsi is the only solution. Some refuse to try, and live on green vegetables and a little bread. For the others two roads are open—to sell their belongings, if they still possess any, or to engage in some business outside their daily work.

The sale of belongings is carried on all over. The first things to go are the superfluous things, the best dishes, the few pieces of jewelry—not wedding rings, those Mussolini took at the time of the Ethiopian war—articles purchased in times of prosperity, such as gramophones, ice-boxes, dancing shoes, radios, poker chips. After the superfluous things have disappeared, the furniture goes—the parlor sets, since company is no longer received; the dining-room furniture, since one can always eat in the kitchen; and finally beds and mattresses.

The other course, to engage in some outside business, means in general to operate on the black market—unless one of the illicit trades, like prostitution, is practiced. Today the black market means the normal market, for the supplies furnished by government authorities or by the Allies are too few to be worth speaking about. The black market trades chiefly in foodstuffs, but enormous amounts of money are also made in medicines, clothing, and luxuries. A phial of penicillin costs 12,000 lire, a man's suit 30,000 lire, a pack of Camels 250 lire, and the price of an automobile trip to Milan is 10,000 lire. Of course to do business on the black market one must be willing to take chances, have a knack for trading, and be unhampered by the fetish of respectability. Concierges in particular, with their opportunities for getting acquainted in both the upper and lower strata of society, have shown themselves to be clever operators. As a result of this general practice an entire group of the poorest people has become well-off or even in some cases rich, while inflation and the cost of living are rapidly forcing the middle classes down the few steps that still separate them from complete indigence.

This impoverishment of the petty bourgeoisie merits a more detailed examination than can be given it in a brief letter. It should be remembered that this class is politically and socially the most powerful one in Italy—the workers are less numerous and the peasants are inarticulate—and that the future of the country depends on its moods and desires. For example, fascism was probably supported by the big industrialists and landowners and opposed by the workers and farm laborers; it was the petty bourgeoisie that furnished the men, the style, the ideas, and the sentiments. Every political party in Italy knows that to succeed it must win the favor of the petty bourgeoisie. Curiously enough, however, nearly all the parties try to appeal to the workers, and in consequence the middle classes have maintained a rather neutral attitude toward politics. None of the parties really satisfy their requirements.

These requirements can be deduced from the very character of the middle classes. They are, first of all, patriotic. They are formalistic in social relations, cherishing academic titles, honorific distinctions, respectability and decorum, and clinging to their inherited prejudices. On the other hand, Italian culture is in their hands, not in those of the high bourgeoisie or the nobility. From this class come the teachers, journalists, writers, politicians, doctors, lawyers, judges, and engineers. The petty bourgeoisie are faithful to tradition, even to the recent and regretted traditions installed by fascism. But while they are conservative in whatever concerns the social and cultural order, their frustrated, unhappy, and explosive vitality makes them also, in a certain sense, revolutionary. Without question they are the most ambitious and the most discontented class. They don't want to sink back into the masses, and they cannot, as they might perhaps like to do, climb up to the upper classes.

During the German occupation the petty bourgeoisie eagerly awaited the arrival of the Allies and in politics were strongly inclined toward the left-wing parties. An election held soon after the Allies arrived would certainly have shown a great swing to the Socialists and Communists. But subsequently this sympathy declined. Too much was expected of the new democratic governments, which were rendered impotent by material conditions and, it must be said, by the inexperience of the new bureaucracy. Middle-class Italians have little imagination and cannot realize that their present sufferings are not due to the parties in power today but to the Fascists, who unleashed the war. They know only that under fascism they managed to eat, to clothe themselves, take vacations, marry off their daughters, and send their sons to college and that now all these things are impossible or possible only in a very reduced degree. In addition, fascism seemed to have a strong foreign policy. Most people do not understand that Italy's present inferior role in world affairs is due to fascism and not to the democratic parties. The Trieste question has been the cause of much bitterness, and the Communist Party lost many of its petty-bourgeois members because it did not support Italian claims energetically enough. This does not mean that the middle classes are leaning to the right or actually desire the return of fascism. It only means that present conditions are not to their liking, and that a political formula corresponding to their interests has not been found.

One might think that with the Italian middle class in such a depressed condition, intellectual and cultural life would also be on the down grade. But that is not the case. On the contrary, an extraordinary boom in journalistic and publishing enterprises has taken place, owing in part to a natural reaction to fascism's twenty-year-long suppression of free expression and in part to the desire to exploit this reaction. Not all the newspaper editors and publishers seeking to profit from the situation are well qualified for their profession, and at least for the time being the phenomenal growth of book-selling and journalism is a matter of quantity rather than quality.

Under fascism Rome had about ten newspapers; today it has almost double that number. There are the party papers—the Liberal Risorgimento Liberale, the Communist Unità, the Socialist Avanti, the Action Party's Italia Libera, the Christian Democrats' Il Popolo and Il Quotidiano, the Republican Voce Repubblicana, and the Labor Democrats' Democrazia del Lavoro; the independent papers—Il Tempo, Il Giornale del Mattino, Il Momento, Libera Stampa, L'Indipendente, La Capitale, and L'Epoca; the old Osservatore Romano, an English and an American daily, and finally the financial and sport papers. Political, literary, and popular magazines are not less numerous, and there are humorous papers and other ephemera. All these publications are printed and sold almost exclusively in Rome. Northern Italy has its own newspapers and periodicals.

Tendencies noted in the press may give a fairly accurate idea of the changing mood of the people. In the first days of the liberation the party papers had a very high circulation; today this is much lower. L'Avanti has dropped from 120,000 copies to 20,000, Il Risorgimento Liberale from 60,000 to 30,000. L'Italia Nuova, the organ of the monarchists, has a fixed circulation among the nobility and the rich bourgeoisie, but its sale too has fallen off. On the other hand, the circulation of the independent papers, which do not carry on party politics, has greatly increased. The Voce Repubblicana is an exception among the party papers, which proves, if proof be needed, the popularity of republican and anti-monarchical ideas in Italy. In general, the success of the independent press as compared to the party press is due to two factors—the large amount of space devoted to news, features, entertainment, and crime; and the middle classes' waning interest in party politics. The negative attitude of some groups toward the parties has become so pronounced that the more pessimistic members are calling it fascist.

The publishing business was formerly centered in Milan, with branches in Florence, Turin, and Bari. But in the past year nearly a hundred publishing firms have sprung up in Rome. Like the newspapers, they may be merely another sign of the current reaction, which may or may not last. The publishers have gone overboard on translations from the English and French, and it often happens that a foreign book is published by two different firms at the same time. Chief among the English and American authors published are those that were prohibited by fascism—Hemingway, Lawrence, Caldwell, and the like. The books are carefully printed, sometimes even elegantly, but the translations often leave a good deal to be desired. The high cost of paper does not permit books to be sold for less than 200 to 300 lire, and the booksellers are already beginning to notice a falling-off in demand.

I don't think it is hard to understand the political and moral apathy of the present moment. It is the apathy of a people who put forth an enormous effort, only to perceive that it was a mistaken effort which must be paid for with even more superhuman efforts. Small wonder that while accepting this destiny Italians feel now a pervading anxiety which prevents them from being greatly concerned about anything except the material means of living.

Cynicism Wins in Italy

BY DONALD DOWNES

(Correspondent for The Nation and the Overseas News Agency in Italy)

Rome, December 15

IN RETURNING his mandate of power to the six parties of the Committee of National Liberation the retiring Prime Minister, Ferruccio Parri, made two stinging accusations against the political leaders who had brought about the fall of the government and, by inference, against the Italian people. The first drew a deadly parallel between the years leading up to fascism, with their useless political flounderings and bickerings, and the situation today. The second pointed out that the capricious actions of politicians, jockeying for power at the outset of probably the coldest, hungriest, and most critical winter in Italy's history, must demonstrate to the rest of the world how feeble and disunited was Italy's vaunted union of anti-Fascist movements.

To an American it is shocking that the Italian political parties and most of their leaders, at a moment when millions of citizens may be unable to obtain a minimum of bread and clothing and shelter, can regard national issues almost exclusively from the point of view of party success or of an individual's rise to power. Something of the same selfishness, it is true, was shown by certain American industrialists and at least one American labor leader when President Roosevelt was undertaking to mobilize the American economy for war, but in America public opinion was strongly behind the government, and opposition was easily overridden. Tragically for 45,000,000 Italians, they seem unable to muster public indignation or even public concern.

Why are they so apathetic? I think because for generations before the rise of fascism politics was a game for aristocrats, reserved to them as a class more competent than the people to make decisions for the nation. There is nothing in Italy's history between the Risorgimento and Mussolini to indicate that democracy was ever more than a word. The people, like the politicians, were left or right, socialist or liberal or reactionary, as one might belong to one club or another, seldom from any deep conviction. Men did not try to carry out political theories. They were content to be ideologically this or that and forget the application of their ideas.

Fascism added dishonesty and cynicism to incapacity and superficiality. For twenty-two years the Fascists talked socialism and reform, perhaps did a little good work here and there, but all the while they were plundering the country and catering to the worst elements in Italian society and the worst shortcomings in Italian character. As a result the professional governing classes became morally and politically bankrupt. The democratic spirit survived only in the white-collar workers, the northern peasants, and a section of the industrial workers.

The professional politicians, from Communist agitators to aristocratic monarchists and liberals, look on the people as something to be used, to be directed, to be bought and sold in Roman political deals much as the ancient Romans bought and sold their slaves. No one fears the people or their indignation; no one believes that the worm will turn. So confident of this are the new breed of Fascists that Guglielmo Gianini has named his movement, the very cornerstone of which is contempt for the people and privilege for the few, "L'Uomo qualunque," the Man in the Street.

This cynicism is expressed in many ways. No politician has thought it important to discuss before the people in detail the vital decisions which Italy must take in the Constitutional Convention to be held early in the spring. No one asks the people: Shall the new government have an elected executive or one responsible to a parliament? Shall there be a supreme court to guard the new constitution? Shall there be one or two houses of parliament? Shall the code of laws be changed? Shall judges be elected or appointed? Shall the parliament control the army? Shall there be "referendum and recall"? Shall there be a greater or less degree of local autonomy? Shall the jury system be introduced? What social security shall be constitutionally guaranteed? Shall the church be constitutionally forbidden to mix in Italian politics? Shall a socializing tax system like England's and America's be written into the constitution? Shall a series of regional legislatures be created? Shall education be made a state monopoly? What degree of nationalization of industry and finance shall be included in the constitution?

"Shall we have a king or a republic?" is about as far as the Italians have gone in public debate. They seem to think that a decision on the one issue, monarchy versus republic, would settle everything, when of course it would settle nothing. For if any lesson can be learned from the history of the struggle for democracy, it is that political democracy without social and economic democracy is a useless toy. This truth has not yet been discovered in Italy.

Even the labor unions, through which popular opinion should be able to dictate to politicians, are the creatures of the various parties; each party has its own preserve in the labor field.

Nor do the press and radio express the people's feelings. The press, composed in general of party-controlled papers, reflects even in its news columns a narrow party view. The so-called independent papers, such as the Giornale del Mattino of Rome, when examined closely, turn out to be serving a party. And this service often goes as far as the suppression of news. In short, most newspapers are political pamphlets filled with the polemics of one small group, understood only by the party leaders, and unread by the average man or woman.

The radio has perhaps even less influence, since its technique is so primitive and the number of functioning sets is so small that comparatively few persons actually listen. Reception is poor, and the news programs are a bore. The different parties are given short periods of time to present their points of view. So far as I have been able to find out, no party has tried to dress up or dramatize its program. What one gets is a sort of rehash of the political essays which one carefully skipped in the morning papers in the vain search for solid information.

With the public so uninformed and apathetic, except for regimented party demonstrations, the politicians can govern Italy with little reference to popular demands. Most of them are naturally uninterested in building up a public opinion which would control governmental policy. A few men in the Socialist Party, some in the Action Party, and a handful of Christian Democrats have tried to alter this situation. A vastly larger group in all the party leaderships resent any interference by the people. Certainly one of the basic reasons for the fall of the Parri government was its encouragement of the rank and file. Cynicism toward the little fellow, contempt for the "ignorant masses" mark those who are coming into the saddle in Italy. The old-time politicians and ex-Fascists, the royalists and landowners, the greedy industrialists and big financiers, who believe that they are chosen to hand down "democracy" to the people, are pretty close to being in power. Such a grouping is a fair definition of fascism.

There was a moment after Salerno and the fall of Naples, and another after the north was liberated last spring, when Italy was temporarily awake. And those were the times that the Allies chose to back wealth and privilege and royalty and old-time discredited politicians. Allied officials have always favored "the good old reliable and established people" as against the forces of reform. The Allied administration has always made exceptions for the automobiles of the rich and the houses of the aristocrats, has allowed the former to be licensed and the latter to be spared requisition. Fascist sympathy and Fascist profits have never been a liability under the Allied administration; to be a leftist has been to be suspect, to be discriminated against.

In this climate of opinion a purge of Fascists has become impossible; even preference for non-Fascists is often futile. The ex-Fascists and the three pre-Fascist Prime Ministers—Bonomi, Orlando, and Nitti—egged on by Allied officials and such visitors as Amadeo Giannini of California (who in a press conference at Naples said plainly that until Italy had a rightist government of the three pre-Fascist old men it could expect no help from America), have made their alliances with the monarchist nobility and the leaders of industry, and are trying to take over Italy. If they succeed there may be civil war in Italy.

What Will Your Dollar Buy in 1946?

BY ALFRED FRIENDLY

(Staff reporter for the Washington Post covering labor and economic subjects)

SHORTLY after World War I the proprietor of a small men's-wear shop in Kansas City stocked his shelves with high-cost goods which he had bought during the roaring inflation. Before he could sell his wares, deflation hit with a vengeance; the storekeeper went broke, and it was years before he could pay off his debts.

The OPA, trying to prevent a repetition of the inflation-deflation pattern after World War II, wonders how lasting an impression that experience made on the Middle Western haberdasher who today is President of the United States. Though an economic situation is developing which is infinitely more dangerous than that of the early '20's, the agency is getting little really effective support. Mr. Truman has uttered the right words, but the OPA must have something more if it is to survive. Chester Bowles is putting up a gallant fight, but he needs solid help from the White House.

The seriousness of the danger ahead is hard to describe in sufficiently impressive terms. Unfortunately, the OPA has itself wasted much valuable verbal ammunition; "catastrophic," "terrifying," "paralyzing," and even "atomically devastating" have been expended on situations of less gravity than the one the nation now faces. The facts, however, speak for themselves.

Inflation, of course, is the natural result of an abundance of buying power combined with a scarcity of things to be bought. As for our buying power: Individual savings have increased during the war years by $145 billion, an amount far above the 1939 national income. Bank deposits have risen from $27 billion to $72 billion. This is for the most part "hot" money. Even since the end of the war money paid out in wages and profits has remained about as high as 1944, or almost double the 1929 figure. Unemployment has been about one-third less than was anticipated. Consumer spending has been maintained at the highest level in history. All this is excellent news, except for its effect on the problem of preventing inflation. As for the scarcities: Simple arithmetic shows that it will be impossible to satisfy the demand for houses—the demand backed by real money—for the next ten years. The demand for automobiles will not be met for two or three years. Acute shortages in the textile industry for many months are foreseen as the result of man-power difficulties. It will probably be half a year before consumers' smaller durable goods, such as radios, refrigerators, washing machines, irons, and the like, are produced in the volume necessary to fill the need. Inventories of all goods are at record low levels. Only food seems to be in reasonably abundant future supply, and even here there are problems. For example, the OPA removed the price controls on coconuts some weeks ago as an experiment, and within a month the price quadrupled. When citrus fruits were freed from controls just as the crop was coming in, prices went up from 50 to 100 per cent in a few days, although they are coming down again now. There was no scarcity; the dealers simply found that the traffic would bear the higher charges.

The facts, it is clear, are bad enough. In addition, in recent weeks there has been a bumper crop of rumors to the effect that price controls are about to be removed, either generally or on specific items. These rumors spur the alarmed public to hurry up and spend its hot money before prices sail up into the blue. If such a trend really gets under way, then of course controls will come off; no power on earth could hold the lid on prices against fifty or seventy-five million rich and frightened buyers running amok in an almost barren market.

With the prospects so menacing, why do not Bowles and the OPA enjoy the full support of the people, the Congress, and the Administration? Why should there be any fight over the maintenance of price controls? The answer is that while the majority of the people are solidly behind Bowles, a tremendously powerful minority made up of various pressure groups have got the ear of Congress and seem to have the entrée to the White House. (Some three hundred Congressmen turned out at a committee hearing a month ago at which the National Automobile Dealers' Association appeared to protest against the proposal to make them absorb the higher car costs.)

Opposing Bowles are the National Association of Manufacturers; most of the industrial and commercial trade associations, in particular the National Retail Dry Goods Association and the National Association of Real Estate Boards; and several labor leaders who learned their economics at good old Neanderthal U. The case of the N. A. M. was handled, and beautifully handled, by Bowles himself in a speech before that organization on December 6. It is perfectly obvious, although he did not mention it, that the N. A. M. is fighting not merely for the removal of price ceilings—which would enable its members to make a temporary killing—but to be rid of all government controls.

The wrath of the National Retail Dry Goods Association stems from the OPA policy of forcing retailers and wholesalers to absorb part of the war-time cost increases. In the beginning the OPA insisted that these be absorbed by the manufacturers, who were benefiting from the greater volume of production. Later it made some of the middlemen and sellers, who were also enjoying the huge volume increase, bear part of the burden. Their profits for the war years scarcely suggest that they are ruined men—the department and specialty stores' profits before taxes in 1944 were 1,100 to 1,200 per cent above pre-war levels. And the association's recent exhibit in Congress of the horrible consequences of OPA regulations proved largely phony. Although it refused three times to give the names, Bowles was able to run down seven or eight of the two hundred cases it cited. In some instances he found clear OPA price violations; in others he found the manufacturers who were said to have been forced out of business by the OPA still happily producing. Yet industry and middlemen are busy trying to put across the proposition that without higher prices they have no incentive to produce or sell.

The National Association of Real Estate Boards fights the OPA on a clean-cut issue. Realtors and builders make more money selling a high-priced than a low-priced house. And regardless of costs, they want to sell houses for as much as they can get—which at present is plenty, since there are not enough building materials or facilities to make even a small dent in the gigantic housing demand. The association won its fight to remove Limitation Order 41, the OPA's only control, Congress having forbidden actual price limits on houses. Order L-41 gave priorities to builders of houses costing less than $8,000, and therefore during the war and immediately afterward these were almost the only ones built. When the order was lifted, houses originally built to sell for $8,000 jumped instantly to $10,000 or even higher. The N. A. R. E. B. seems hell-bent on pricing itself out of a market and thus destroying the one industry on which are based our hopes for prosperity in the next few years.

Some labor leaders frankly admit to OPA officials that when their union needs a wage increase they mean to get it—if they have to help the employer get a higher price for his product. John L. Lewis has come out for such action, possibly because he is trying to endear himself to industry as the labor champion of "free enterprise."

The mass of consumers are supporting Bowles for obvious reasons. For a time, annoyed by rationing, they underestimated the OPA's anti-inflation work, but when rationing was discontinued, when the housewife saw not the "fourteen points" for a pound of beef but the "54 cents," the real problem was recognized. Even small business men whisper to OPA officials after a speech or meeting, "We can't speak out loud because of the association, but we're for you; keep it up." And support is growing among farmers, who realize that with food becoming abundant, high prices for their products are a thing of the past, whereas they are likely to be the fall guys in industry's price-raising plans.

However large the pro-OPA forces may be, they are not strong enough at the moment to force the extension of rent and price controls after June 30, 1946, when the present authorization for the agency expires. If the OPA is not to be wiped out when it is most needed, the Administration will have to act. Bowles received his first real aid from the White House a month ago when the President set up a housing priorities plan and indorsed the Patman bill for housing price controls. This was in effect an admission of error in lifting L-41 and a roundabout way of restoring some of its provisions. But one swallow does not make a summer, and the Administration has yet to espouse and really work for the economically sound theory which Bowles expounds with respect to the OPA's continued existence. When the consumer, he says, stops screaming to keep price controls on and the seller stops screaming to take them off, that will be the sign that products are abundant and are being disposed of in a freely competitive market. At that point, but not before, price controls will no longer be necessary.

A Man Around Fifty

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

(A New York physician, author of the recently published book "Habnemann, the Adventurous Career of a Medical Rebel" and of "Berlin: a Necrology," which appeared in The Nation of May 12, 1945)

BEING a man around fifty, a physician, a writer, a father, an American, a Jew of German extraction, gives one a rather definite if somewhat bewildered concept of life. The best approach to existence will always be a descriptive, not to say an autobiographical, one. A well-conceived case history is the basis for diagnosis, and diagnosis is the basis for treatment—if there is any hope in treatment.

I, or rather we—since mine is a typical case—we are the opposite of a lost generation. We seem to be somehow permanent, indestructible, with roots spreading everywhere like a prolific weed, adaptable to almost every climate, professional survivors. Owing to some mysterious faculty for resistance we have conquered an assortment of the most violent germs that ever invaded the human organism. Death has eliminated the less vital breeds of our generation, but we, the remaining few, have developed a strange and completely undeserved immunity to the continuous uproar around us. Time and again I have tried to become an active participant in current events, to be a soldier, to assume responsibilities, to do something dangerous. By a chain of ridiculous interferences I have always been prevented. I have been rejected, excluded, for no visible reason; if everything else seemed to be all right, the State Department, at the last minute, would deny me a visa. On the other hand, things always happened most opportunely, and without any particular effort on my part, if I had to be saved or protected. There would be friends to help me, chances to grasp; a mysterious series of events would come to my aid.

As I say, all these things have happened to me as a typical member of a small group. We were apparently too unimportant to be destroyed by our enemies and sufficiently useful or well-liked for our friends not to let us perish. Our rescue seems to be due to a general contempt of, and affection for, intellectuals. We are in a sense the playboys of history: it may be amusing or even profitable to have us around as long as we do not attempt to mix into serious business.

Having survived two world wars under very different external circumstances—once as an adolescent and a citizen of defeated Germany, once as an adult and a citizen of victorious America—I have a horrifying awareness of the identity of the two disasters. As one grows older, pleasure and pride in survival increase, but a painful sense of frustration and despair also develops. We have not been tortured, we have not been starved, we have not been soiled by indignities. We still enjoy all the delightful small pleasures of being alive, are still full of curiosity, and our knowledge and experience add up to some degree of wisdom. But at the same time it has been our lonely and unenviable function to witness bestiality and mass murder, the slaughter of the innocent, the extinction of laughter, beauty, and nobility, the exploitation and deception of the poor, the growth of madness, disease, and hunger—a mythical and unbelievable explosion of unhappiness, blood, and tears. The most disgusting and cynical show has been performed before our eyes, but we keep our places in the safe darkness of the spectators' seats: graying, wiser, less hopeful, more tired, and always aware of the emergency exit.

If we look at our children, we see the same touching, confused, and helpless urge to do better, the same treacherous doctrines promising salvation, the same age-old ideals leading straight into havoc. Hardly recovered from the tremendous sacrifices of warfare, we seem headed for greater and probably ultimate disaster. There must be some reason why we were spared to live through two catastrophes of mankind, and to observe in guilty comfort the physical slaughter and moral decline of our society. There must be some reason why, in a wave of blood and crime, our individual health has been improving, our life span expanding, our knowledge miraculously enlarging. And there must be some reason why at the end of this holocaust a new power emerges which a stunned world tries to understand.

In Germany the complete servitude of the men of knowledge to the scoundrels of action became the essence of doom. But all over the world knowledge and power were—and still are—completely severed. Wars and revolutions, cyclic depressions, mass movements, and political crises are but the secondary symptoms of a new fact or a new truth, born in some quiet laboratory, conceived by some creative brain, and transformed into forceful aggressions as inescapable as the will of God. The state of this earth depends entirely on our understanding of the structure and process of life, and no human activity, no justice, no freedom, no faith, no happiness can be maintained without such understanding. The misfortunes of our generation have been caused by the tyranny of ignorance at a time when the management of mankind required profound knowledge.

Here we are, men around fifty, born in the twilight of the nineteenth century, spoiled by a childhood filled with the illusion of progress and lasting peace, awakened from our sleepy pleasures by the firebrand of World War I, living through the "no more war" era, many of us without work, thrown around like rubbish, chased by gangsters into the fatal adventure of a second world war, surviving on into another chaos, and still intrusting our fate to the command of people who know nothing and have learned nothing. Have we been spared to witness the gruesome finale, to be passengers up to the last stop of civilization's glorious journey, or are we to be the aged agitators for a better and wiser way of life?

In our unhappiness, the power to destroy ourselves has often seemed the only symbol of our individual freedom. Who of our generation can say that he has never contemplated suicide? The thought of this last refuge has, indeed, again and again encouraged us to remain alive; and whoever chooses life instead of voluntary death becomes a witness to the goodness and the value of existence.

We have now reached the point where this godly power of self-destruction is at the disposal of our whole human species. This overwhelming gift requires a new structure of life on earth, new nerves, new philosophies, new patterns of social behavior. We are desperately looking to see who of our leaders are aware of this gigantic revolution. The only hopeful sign is the courageous and wise solidarity of those scientists who have helped to unchain the atomic force for potential happiness or potential tragedy.

It is fortunate that the scientists of today, in this country, are willing and eager to take political action. America, which came into existence after the Dark Ages, has always shown an almost religious respect for human inventiveness. It has been maligned for its technological enthusiasm, but it has discovered and proclaimed the power and joy of engines, skyscrapers, planes, electricity, of cleanliness and health, of harnessed energy and cheap production and distribution of goods. America needs leadership which is equal to our present standards of scientific knowledge and progress. Perhaps it needs us, the veterans of lifelong defeat, to apply the wisdom we have so hardly won to the problem of linking knowledge and direction—to the creation, in short, of that new structure of society upon which human survival depends.

Next

Halsey Sees Short Next War.—Newspaper headline.

The next war will, according to
The Admiral, be quickly through,
And may no more than be begun
Before it's either lost or won.
A single blast may well suffice
To do the job up, neat and nice.

So be it. Let the war be brief.
Less than the wearing, waiting grief.
If next war there must be, and next,
Men still benighted, still perplexed,
If there is, then, no other answer,
Let it be stroke instead of cancer.

RICHARD ARMOUR

Homage to Alvin Johnson

BY MAX LERNER

(Chief editorial writer of PM; author of "The Mind and Faith of Justice Holmes" and "Public Journal")

ON MY select list of Americans of first-rate stature I cherish the name of Alvin Johnson. His retirement as head of the New School at the age of seventy-one is—if I know him at all—not the end of the line for him but a caesura from which one can measure the cadences that have gone before and that are to follow.

If T. S. Eliot is right—that "between the Idea and the Reality" in the lives of all of us there "falls the shadow"—Johnson is one of the few I know for whom that shadow is very thin. I first met him back in 1927, when I was just out of graduate school and he was gathering a staff for the newly projected "Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences." A whole galaxy of the scholarly societies had come together to dream up that project: there were big names aplenty, and resolutions, and prolegomena; all that they lacked was someone who knew enough about everything to edit an encyclopedia of Allerleiwissenschaften but didn't know too much about any one science to get stuck in it beyond extrication.

They found that man in Alvin Johnson, and he quickly set about making their dream a reality, imprisoning in fifteen big shiny yellow volumes the best that was being thought in the social sciences the world over. A group of us—about a dozen or more young sub-editors—worked with him day after day for five years. Johnson had the big bearlike capacity for taking a litter of cubs and licking them into shape as an editorial staff. He had a divining-rod judgment that told him what was true metal in a man, what dross or just shirt-stuffing. He knew everything and he carried his learning lightly. As a result, I don't suppose there has ever been an encyclopedia venture since Diderot's in the eighteenth century which generated more excitement among those involved, or which will prove a greater landmark in the history of ideas.

Johnson had landed in New York as a New Republic editor in 1917, after one of those fabulous migratory careers in which he had moved from college to college, a little like his teacher, Thorstein Veblen, a little like Matthew Arnold's "Scholar Gypsy." Of Danish stock, he had grown up on a Nebraska farm, written a thesis on rent theory at Columbia, and taught college economics all the way west from Bryn Mawr and Cornell to Chicago, Nebraska, Texas, and Stanford. But he had been restless in college teaching, and he was restless during his six-year spell as a liberal editor. At Texas he had been the sort of maverick professor who writes a novel called "The Professor and the Petticoat." In New York liberal circles it was curious to see this big, hulking Scandinavian farmer from Nebraska, who told caustic irreverent stories, and who preferred writing semi-fictional ironic sketches to finger-pointing editorials.

In 1923 he found his métier and his real life work, and he has stuck to it with massive tenacity ever since. The New School for Social Research had been started a few years earlier as a gesture of protest and freedom in the dreary wastes of academic tyranny. Some of the best minds of the day were behind it—Veblen and Beard and Harvey Robinson. But it was Johnson who took over as director and gave the school a local habitation and a name in the American intellectual world. His mind now had an action to direct itself to—the establishment of a new educational idea in America, something like the Folk High School (Folkehojskole) idea of another and earlier Dane, Bishop Grundtvig. Johnson had always needed a venture large enough to gather into its scope all his far-flung knowledge and interest, something in which his imagination could build itself a structure, on the actual earth of people's striving. He found it at the New School, and he proved the truth of Emerson's remark that an institution is the lengthened shadow of a man.

To give the school a base Johnson showed an unsuspected and almost miraculous capacity to raise funds. He brought to bear the same gift for generating intellectual excitement that I had seen at the Encyclopedia, and he soon was performing the miracle of getting men of wealth to back a school where teacher and student alike were completely free.

But he also brought to the school a philosophy of education. It is basically instrumentalist, in the pattern of John Dewey. But I find more sense of room in Johnson's educational thinking than I do in most of the Deweyites—a more catholic interest in the arts and in the modernist aspects of creative work, a freer sense of the power of the idea to inflame the imagination. Adult education can be a dreary affair. But Johnson has made it anything but dreary at the New School. Johnson has clung to two ideas: that a man has not stopped learning after he has reached maturity and a life's job; and that the way to run a school is to pick scholars who care about action and men of action who have a bent for scholarship—and give them the run of the house.

But Johnson and the New School reached the peak of their greatness in the crisis of European scholarship under fascism. When Hitler made life in Germany and almost throughout Europe a Gehenna for free men, the great danger was not that Europe would lose some of the most creative minds and skills in history but that no other culture would find them. Johnson was quicker than anyone else I know to take the full measure of Europe's loss and America's opportunity. He quickly sent word throughout Germany and Europe that the anti-fascist scholars would be welcome here. He created for them at the New School a University in Exile, which has had and still has some of the best minds in social theory in the world. He organized the other university administrators into a committee that found places for other exiled scholars throughout the country. I count this the biggest single educational achievement of recent years, by the side of which most of the controversial storms raging now seem thin-spun stuff.

Johnson has turned his work at the New School over to Bryn J. Hovde, whom he describes as "a man after my own heart." Even for those who don't know Hovde's own merit, that ought to be enough. Johnson himself has mapped out a decade's work in the field of fighting race discrimination, and has already made a beginning as the real intellectual father of the Ives committee in New York State. That and, I hope, some more novels. For no man could have built an institution like the New School unless he had the gift of lyricism in him.

In the Wind

THIS OMINOUS ITEM is reprinted from the left-wing London Tribune of November 23: "Sir John Anderson has just returned from the atomic-bomb talks in Washington. Sir John Anderson has just been appointed to the board of Vickers."

SWISS NAVY NOTES: The International Federation of Trade Unions reports that Switzerland may shortly have its own merchant fleet of half a million tons.

EDWIN W. PAULEY, chief of the United States reparations mission to Japan, told a Los Angeles press conference that Japanese industrial equipment might be sent to China and the Philippines to help rebuild their economies. The neighborly way he put it, however, was: "Nobody in this country wants the inferior and second-hand machinery in Japan, which, however, will be welcomed in China and the Philippines."

HEADLINE in Bread and Butter, Consumers' Union weekly: "Shirts and Pajamas Rolled Back." In the middle of December, too.

THE UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION has its first house organ. The Woodrow Wilson Foundation, New York City, has started publication of United Nations News, a monthly "devoted exclusively to news . . . of the UNO, its functional agencies, and other international organizations."

CONGRESSIONAL AFTERTHOUGHT: The Associated Press reported that in rushing through a mass of legislation just before the Christmas holidays the Senate passed a resolution demanding an end to butter rationing—just a month after the OPA had already ended it.

LAST AUGUST an editorial in The Nation urged that the United States use the services of Herbert Norman, Far East expert of Canada's Department of External Affairs, in the military government of Japan. We took careful notice, therefore, of the announcement on December 26 that Herbert Norman had been named to represent Canada on the Far Eastern Commission.

PEACE ON EARTH: While workmen were erecting Cleveland's annual Christmas tree in the city's public square, another crew was busy setting up a forty-five-foot Nazi V-2 bomb just across the street. It turned out to be an advertisement for the coming National Aircraft Show.

JUSTICE KEILER MACKAY of the Ontario Supreme Court used the Atlantic Charter as grounds for a decision which ruled against Jim Crow housing regulations.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

The People's Front

JOSÉ GIRAL, Prime Minister of the Spanish Republican government in exile, passes through New York this week on his way to France. He has said that upon his arrival in Paris he will consult the various Republican leaders with a view to reorganizing and enlarging the present government. Some of my friends are inclined to doubt the sincerity of the Prime Minister's intentions; they suspect him of playing for time by some token reorganization. For my part, however, I believe Giral is honestly convinced that his government, as it is now constituted, is up a blind alley. Entirely lacking in militant leaders, it has awakened no spark of enthusiasm among Republicans inside Spain. Indeed, it has not even aroused any fears in Spanish fascist circles.

Internationally, too, the Giral Cabinet's prospects are far from bright. To date it has been recognized only by Mexico, Guatemala, Panama, and Venezuela—and Mexican recognition was assured even before Giral became Premier. Giral's friends had confidently expected that a "moderate" Cabinet excluding Negrín and the Communists would win quick recognition from Washington and London. To their dismay, that expectation did not materialize. Instead, as recent events indicate, the United States and Britain have edged in the opposite direction. In Washington on December 16 Under Secretary of State Acheson received Dr. Negrín, whom the New York Times described as "the first Republican caller since the fall of Madrid." Cabling from London a few days later, Herbert L. Matthews reported: "No government without Dr. Negrín and without the Communists can expect world-wide recognition." And from Paris came a statement by Foreign Minister Georges Bidault hinting politely but firmly that the French government is in no hurry to recognize a Spanish government not fully representative of all the Republican parties.

Prime Minister Giral has not made public the details of his plan, but my guess is that he will proceed as follows: (1) He will, of course, try to retain the premiership. (2) He will attempt to appoint as vice-presidents the four former prime ministers now in Europe: Portela Valladares, who, despite his seventy-eight years, defied the Gestapo with magnificent courage during the Nazi occupation of France and, though a rightist, suggested the appointment of Negrín as Prime Minister last August; Casares Quiroga, who held the premiership at the outbreak of the Spanish war; Largo Caballero; and Juan Negrín. (3) He will offer a Cabinet post to each of the groups that have remained outside the government—the Communists, the U. G. T., the Left Republicans, and a section of the C. N. T. In short, Giral now hopes to accomplish in France precisely what Negrín attempted in Mexico four months ago when he urged on President Martínez Barrio the creation of a strong representative government—an attempt frustrated by the old politicians.

Thus four valuable months have been wasted, and in that time confusion and disunity have risen again. The sharpest debate has developed around the proposal of a plebiscite;

this is not surprising, given a government whose Foreign Minister belongs to the group of Prieto, who claims the dubious honor of initiating that proposal. Ramón Gonzales Peña, veteran mine leader and chairman of the U. G. T. (Spanish equivalent of the C. I. O.), diagnosed the situation correctly last week when he said, "All that is happening now is the result of the makeshift solution of the August crisis." The split has been further aggravated by a message which Dolores Ibarruri, la Pasionaria, sent to Republican leaders on December 19. I have seen the original text of her cable; it is quite different from the version published in the press. Contrary to the reports, Pasionaria rejects the Prieto formula calling for a plebiscite conducted under foreign supervision. However, she would accept a plebiscite if carried out by "a provisional government representing all the enemies of Franco, from the Republicans, Socialists, Communists, and trade unions to those monarchists and army officers who are genuinely hostile to the dictator." I wish that Pasionaria had not talked about a plebiscite; even her qualified support has introduced an element of confusion into the debate.

In itself a plebiscite sounds wonderful, democracy at its best, but in the case of Spain it makes no sense. If a plebiscite were to be held before the republic was reestablished, with Franco's army and police in control and the Republicans deprived of access to the people, the thing would be a greater farce than the recent elections in Brazil. A plebiscite held, as Prieto now proposes, after Franco is overthrown would be even more absurd. The main argument for the plebiscite is that it will prevent violence; but the time to prevent violence is during the transition, not after. The only way to finish fascism in Spain with a minimum of disorder is to combine unity among the Republican forces, inside and outside Spain, with diplomatic action by the great powers.

Largo Caballero, too, has come out in favor of the plebiscite, and by so doing he has perhaps missed an opportunity of still rendering a great service to the republic. For if Giral should fail in France and objections to Negrín persist, Caballero would have been a logical choice for Premier. Negrín would certainly have been willing to enter a coalition Cabinet headed by the old union leader. But in view of Caballero's position on the plebiscite, that is out.

Today as before, without regard to any statements by Caballero or Pasionaria, the position of all the groups identified with the policy of Dr. Negrín remains unchanged. We are absolutely against the plebiscite. The Spanish people cast their votes for the republic in blood through three years of war and six years of unbroken resistance to the Franco regime; they will not accept the shameful compromise which the defeatists propose. Giral himself has declared his opposition and the opposition of his government to a plebiscite; but as long as representatives of Prieto are in the Cabinet, his position remains equivocal. A hard job awaits him in Paris.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Piety of Evelyn Waugh

WHEN it was predicted that the war would give a new impetus to religion, it could also have been predicted, of course, that of all religions the Catholic would be bound to be most compelling, and especially to writers and other intellectuals, who like their emotions of faith to be as well-organized and traditional as possible. But by any traditional standard, it has surely been an odd kind of celebration that the Catholic church has been recently experiencing in certain quarters. There was the movie, "Going My Way," for instance, which gave us a church whose charms existed quite without benefit of sacrament. And now there is Evelyn Waugh's "Brideshead Revisited" (Little, Brown, $2.50), a novel whose appeal to faith rests on the most familiar cynicisms of non-faith.

"Brideshead Revisited" is a more incoherent book than any summary can suggest. This is the story Mr. Waugh tells: During the war a company of soldiers, including a Captain Ryder, the narrator, is billeted in an English country place called Brideshead, the estate of the Marchmain family. Ryder had known the Marchmains intimately, and he recalls his long difficult relationship with the family—his love for Sebastian, the younger son, when they were together at Oxford; his first meeting with Sebastian's gallant sister, Julia; his early sympathy with Lady Marchmain and his later disaffection from her, as he discovers the pious tyranny she exerts over her family; then the long years in which Sebastian falls steadily into drunkenness, in which Julia makes a miserable marriage, and in which Ryder himself marries unhappily; finally, his reunion and love affair with Julia, which is terminated by Julia's sudden return to the church in which she was born and her recognition that her life has been a sinful one. The book ends with the strong indication that Ryder, agnostic during the extended period of this narrative, is himself now a convert to the faith of the Marchmains. Since there is nothing else to explain Ryder's religious regeneration, one is meant to understand it, I presume, as a revelation from his experience with this family.

But why an experience of the Marchmain family should turn one to, instead of away from, religion is the most immediate of the many questions raised by Mr. Waugh's new novel. For the main emphasis in Mr. Waugh's portrait of this Catholic household is a deep condemnation of Lady Marchmain for a piety which has wrecked her husband and her children. It is Lady Marchmain's unfeeling self-righteousness that is shown to have driven her husband into social ostracism on the Continent, her son Sebastian into his drunkenness, her daughter Julia to her despair, and even her older son, Bridey, to oafishness and her younger daughter, Cordelia, to a spinster's life of good works. Except perhaps in the case of Cordelia and in the case of Sebastian's beloved Catholic Nanny, "Brideshead Revisited" has scarcely a good word to say for any conventional professors of the Catholic faith. When they are not wicked, like Lady Marchmain, they are silly, like Bridey and Bridey's wife. All our sympathies are enlisted for the upper-class bohemians and sinners of the novel, for Sebastian and Julia and old Lord Marchmain. Mr. Waugh's Catholicism, that is, demonstrates itself as a religion for well-placed reprobates, which may not constitute an absolute heterodoxy—I daresay that Mr. Waugh's conviction that Sebastian is a very holy man within his drunkenness represents a perfectly orthodox view of one possible road to salvation—but which surely constitutes a curious bias.

The disproportion between Mr. Waugh's affectation of non-belief and his protestation of belief is, in fact, the chief interest of "Brideshead Revisited." Although Mr. Waugh has and uses all the old sophisticated arguments against his church, he has nothing except the sudden will-to-faith and the inevitability of death—Julia's return to the fold coincides with that of her father, on his deathbed—to offer in its support. When, for example, Julia renounces her love because it is the sinful continuation of a life of sin, nothing in her action assures us that it is anything more than either masochistic or superstitious; religiously, it is no more meaningful than Iris March's running herself into a tree. By masquerading or burying its religious convictions in cynicism, "Brideshead Revisited" makes, indeed, so much better a case against conviction than for it that even to grant that its author's attitude is only a device requires the help of the biographical record, the knowledge that Mr. Waugh was himself converted to Catholicism some years ago. Not that this form of religious dissembling is without precedent: Aldous Huxley, for one, is a practiced hand at it. I find it none the less perverse and suspicious for being an established method of disputation.

Of course, I have never belonged to the growing group of American admirers of Mr. Waugh, even as a satirist. I have not read all his books, only "Decline and Fall" and "Put Out More Flags," both of which, because I am not very sensible of the virtues threatened by the objects of Mr. Waugh's satire and because I cannot share Mr. Waugh's sorrow for the fate of the prodigal sons of England's stately homes, bored me rather more than they enlightened me. Even so small a taste of Mr. Waugh's previous work prepared me for his religious solution to be, at best, a counsel of despair, and at worst, what it turned out to be: an effort to put God on the side of the dying upper classes.

For it is the other noteworthy point about Mr. Waugh's Catholicism, in addition to the uneasiness with which it lives in his sophisticated world, that it is the property of a small and embattled but highly privileged class. The Marchmains of "Brideshead Revisited" are wonderfully rich as well as beautiful: Brideshead itself is a kind of architectural object lesson in the conspicuous consumption of the best that England has had to offer for several centuries. And between this Catholic aristocracy and any other English aristocracy Mr. Waugh makes no distinction except the distinction of religion. But whatever the religion of its owner, Brideshead could not have been built on very solid ground or there would perhaps not have had to be a Second World War in which it degenerated into a billet, and one wonders why Mr. Waugh should hope that faith will be able to restore a class that faith has not succeeded in even holding together. By ignoring the political and economic realities that underlie the dissolution of the Marchmains and blaming their tragedy solely on Lady Marchmain's piety, Mr. Waugh tempts us to indict all the evils of life in the name of piety—an amusing position for a proselytizer of religion to work himself into.

DIANA TRILLING

Mary Petty Presents—

THIS PRETTY PACE. Drawings by Mary Petty with a Preface by James Thurber. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

SHAKESPEARE gave Mary Petty a plug in "Macbeth," V:5: that is, "Creeps in this petty pace from day to day"; and Miss Petty graciously returns the compliment by using his phrase "This Petty Pace" as title for her book of creeps. This volume is not so much a collection of brilliantly captioned drawings as an anthology of compressed novels, a chronicle of the key moments in the lives of many grasshoppers. Writers spend years struggling to convey the background, character, hopes, heartbreaks, follies that Miss Petty reproduces in one drawing and one sentence. Her peculiar appeal is not limited to the eye, nor does she attempt to stun by a sharp line, but her effects are fictional in the sense that they release reading associations in the mind that continue long after the picture itself is forgotten. In this respect as in many others Miss Petty is not in the slightest degree like Daumier or Hogarth. Hers is a four-walled world, a one-class world, a one-street world, and she never ventures into politics, morals, or even life. Her characters are those of a Wodehouse musical comedy, and since their follies are across the footlights from us, her recording of them does not illumine our own follies, as satire properly does; it gives us the Christian pleasure of laughing wholeheartedly at clowns instead of at each other, and gratifies us above all by not requiring us to laugh at ourselves.

As a matter of fact, there is no reason why this book could not be used as the base for a musical comedy, with each picture taken as a song cue and the casting straight from the drawings. Miss Petty might hire one of those little men around the corner who take in writing to stitch up some words between her captions, get Hammerstein, Agnes de Mille, and six screaming agents, and the show is on. There might be difficulty in casting the many varieties of dowagers, for the Du Barry and Elizabeth Arden salons have scourged the country of dowagers, alas, and those left, like Sophie Tucker, who might look the part, prefer having hearts of gold to playing the monstrous lady Neros of Miss Petty's world. There is the majestic raddle-faced old fiend, for instance, ordering over the telephone with smelling salts in hand "a box of old-fashioned wooden matches that you can strike on the seat of your pants." We hear her again at the dining-table directing the old servant, "Here, Pompey, take these meat balls back to the kitchen and tell Lola to step them up with a little shooting sherry." These are the Hampton females, a peculiar breed one hears on Long Island South

Shore trains baying baritone trivia at each other down the coach. It would be impossible for the Petty dowagers to have a vocal range above bass clef. The Petty ingenues squeal, and the Petty men snort, whistle, or harrumph. Ladies and gentlemen alike are complacently confident that whatever is the matter with them physically or mentally should be the matter with all the right people. They are proud of their bony backs, their buck teeth, their wattles, their mighty bosoms or scrawny chests for the wholly satisfactory reason that they are theirs and therefore irreproachable. Their moments of doubt are rare, and on these Miss Petty pounces. A masculine Petty goon is shown having his complexes stroked by an analyst. He has evidently been keeping to his room lest his split personality should open up some day in a crowded ballroom, for the doctor exhorts him to "get out and mingle with other schizophrenes." There is the poor girl whose mama has arranged for a portrait sitting, and who is arrested as she leaps stark naked to the platform by the artist's cry, "Dear no, Miss Mayberry, just the head." There is the awful moment in the aging only son's life when Mother, stabbing her needle into the hideous doily that has been her lifework, stabs Son simultaneously with these words, "Rubbish. Lots of children are unwanted. Your father and I didn't want you." One almost senses Son's stricken eyes moving to the Mater's velvet neckbow, tempted, as no doubt Fay, the maid, has often been, by its strangling possibilities. There is the frightful moment in one beldame's life when the ancient bachelor friend, maddened by an extra thimble of brandy and the elusive whiff of camphor in her pompadour, the beast brought out by the froufrou of her solid iron petticoats, wolfs a kiss from her left eyebrow. "Peabody, are you completely mad?" the aghast lady cries out. Tomorrow, you may be sure, the doors will be closed to the venerable bounder. Madame will take to her bed and Peabody himself will take to the analyst.

There is the poignant breakfast scene between smug wife and startled husband reading his mail. "I'd be interested to know just who offered to donate a pint of my blood." The veins of all the Petty people would not yield a full pint of anything more than a dilution of digitalis, medicinal sherry, and Saratoga water, but Miss Petty is like the maiden at the square piano who, her fiancé says, is "the only one I know who gets the meat out of Humperdink." Miss Petty gets the meat even out of skeletons.

DAWN POWELL

Italy and the Church

ITALY AND THE COMING WORLD. By Luigi Sturzo. Roy Publishers. $3.

THE importance of the role played at present in Europe by the Catholic parties does not have to be stressed. The situation might have interesting developments, especially in Italy, where the government is now in Catholic hands. After the collapse of the Italian state in 1943, the only organized structure left in Italy was that of the Catholic church. And in Italy this structure has a very visible and commanding prime motor—the Vatican. In France the situation is different, as is exemplified by the resistance to Catholic claims in the educational field and by the very prudence of the Catholic hierarchies. In Italy the Fascist law which introduced religious indoctrination in state schools is still being enforced; the Fascist Concordat of 1919 is still in effect; publications considered offensive to the church are being suppressed by the government; and the ex-Catholic priest and eminent scholar, Ernesto Buonaiuti, is still prevented from resuming his teaching at the University of Rome on the basis of an article of the Concordat which had been conceived precisely for this purpose.

Luigi Sturzo might or might not support this state of affairs in all its implications. His personal convictions as an anti-Fascist, and as a Catholic priest who thinks that a certain amount of civil liberty and democracy is more beneficial to his church than arbitrary state rule, are above suspicion. This book of his, however, leaves many doubts as to the exact nature of his liberalism.

To start with, one notices a certain casualness in Don Sturzo's attitude toward truth and falsehood. One example can be found in the paragraph that concludes his account of the Fascist Concordat. Was it good or was it bad for the church to deal with fascism? Don Sturzo's answer is that the question is pointless because, "at best one could only say that Pius XI was prudent or imprudent. The two assertions cancel each other." This is indeed a fine point of logic—after which Don Sturzo goes on defending the Concordat.

A second example: In 1923 the Italian Catholic Party was disbanded on orders from the Vatican. In polemics with Gaetano Salvemini on this point, Don Sturzo has never been able to prove that Salvemini's facts were wrong. In this book, however, he reduces the issue to the question of whether, in 1923, he went to Montecassino for a rest or on orders from his superiors—which has never been the point. The point is rather the fundamental one of whether or not a Catholic party is, in Italy, at the mercy of orders from the Vatican. By not facing the issue Don Sturzo simply shows that it is indeed a dark one.

On this as on other burning questions, such as Vatican intervention in Spain, Don Sturzo would like to let bygones be bygones and see a fresh start. The fresh start should consist of a just peace; a wise amount of democracy for Italy; the question of monarchy versus republic, to be decided in perfect freedom, without even Don Sturzo himself saying clearly where he stands; the abandonment of the principle of separation between church and state; and all kinds of moderate reforms, including an agrarian reform that should not "impair or upset the structure of landed property" (this would seem quite a feat). The whole structure should rest on a principle called "the ontological and ethical unification in God." And certainly Don Sturzo does not mean this unification to take place in any vague or reprehensibly theistic sense.

In 1848 a very honest and very "liberal" Italian priest who was also a very bad philosopher, Antonio Rosmini, made a desperate attempt to resolve the antagonism between the church and modern times. He drafted a constitution for Italy. Article 36 of this constitution said: "The press is free. The church keeps the right of censorship on it." And Article 38 said: "Freedom of education is guaranteed." To this the pious Rosmini added the comment: "But truth has to be taught, not error. And the only repository of truth is the church." And so on.

Rosmini's constitution was immediately subjected to a ruthless attack by the Jesuits. Rosmini had surrendered on principle; Rosmini must perish. And Rosmini was condemned.

More modern than Rosmini, Don Sturzo knows how to keep clear of such dangers.

NICOLA CHIAROMONTE

BRIEFER COMMENT

Ideals and Hazards

IT IS A GOOD THING to state and restate the ideals of a democratic society and to measure the tasks which it confronts in a technical age. This is admirably achieved in David Bryn-Jones's new book, "Toward a Democratic New Order" (Minnesota, $3.50), without, however, arousing the reader's sustained interest. The book is consistently on the side of the angels. It measures the dimensions of the democratic ideal accurately and is not unrealistic in analyzing the economic and international hazards which democracy faces in our technical civilization. Why, then, should it not have a more persuasive quality than it seems to possess?

Perhaps it is just a little too pious and has the effect of a sermon which is consistently opposed to sin but not fully conscious of the strength of temptation. Let one example suffice: The author is dealing with the democratic ideal of equality and seeking to champion the legitimacy of an essential equality despite the differentiation of function which the organization of even a democratic society makes necessary. "If a man does his best," he declares, "he deserves in return

H. G. WELLS— Prophet of the Atomic Bomb

Read his latest book:

"CRUX ANSATA — An Indictment of the Roman Catholic Church"

An historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis.

Cloth Binding $1.75 Paper-covered $1.25

Also get a copy of

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS" by L. H. Lehmann

A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration.

Cloth Binding $1.75 Paper-covered $1.00

COMBINATION OFFERS	Both Cloth Bound Books	$3.00
	Both Paper Bound Books	$2.00

New Pamphlet

"VATICAN POLICY IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR"

48 pages of Documented Facts 25c

Free to those who return this ad with their order for the above books

Order From:

AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. 151

219 WEST 48TH STREET

NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

the best that society can do for him. . . . No necessary work is menial. . . . There is no inherent dignity in a white-collar job. . . . That the brain worker belongs to a superior order is a naive superstition. . . ." All very true. But it does not change the fact that some functions in society are surrounded with an aura of prestige, not to speak of privilege and power, which they may not deserve but will probably always have. Even democratic societies have various oligarchies; and their power and prestige are based on something more than "naive superstition." We cannot dispense with equality as a regulative ideal of justice; but neither can we regard the social processes which lead to the hierarchical structure of society as grounded merely in superstition. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Armies and Modern War

HAD THE PUBLISHERS of "Arms and Policy," by Hoffman Nickerson (Putnam's, $3.50), seen fit to edit it with close attention, it might have been received with the respect which it deserves but probably will not get. The objectionable material consists largely of gratuitous asides and passing comments, apparently representing Mr. Nickerson's political and social beliefs, which could have easily been omitted, since for the most part they have nothing to do with the main arguments of the book. Some reviewers will be so taken up with denouncing Mr. Nickerson as a reactionary that, it is to be feared, they will overlook or dismiss his very real merit as a student of military problems. For he is something quite rare in this country—a military theorist of the first rank.

The author begins by restating an old thesis of his: the origins of present-day mass warfare do not lie in industrialization but in the political and social thinking of the French Revolution with its concept of war-making as the conscripted duty of the many rather than the voluntary privilege of the few. Indeed, industrialization is slowly but steadily reducing the size of fighting armies. The bulk of any modern army is its service and maintenance force, and on the battlefield the plane-tank team has assumed a decisive striking role, relegating the foot soldier—the eloquent efforts of Pentagon publicists notwithstanding—to a secondary position.

The main body of the book is taken up with a critical analysis of the campaigns of the war up to about September, 1944. Two points may be cited by way of illustration. The Nazis' failure to invade England after Dunkirk was no staff blunder: had they made the attempt, the ensuing repulse would have taken on the proportions of a "massacre." Close support proved to be the most effective employment of the air arm. Strategic bombing—which Mr. Nickerson somewhat brutally calls "baby-killing"—did not, as we are beginning to discover, produce the results which its supporters claimed it would, either in industrial destruction or terrorism. The book contains only a few remarks on the atomic bomb, and they were evidently written in haste, but this development is plainly the concern of the politician and the scientist rather than the soldier.

The book concludes with a survey of two post-war questions. The author is opposed to the acquisition of Pacific bases because they can never really be made defensible, and by so extending itself the country is weakening, not strengthening, its military position. Still less can be said for compulsory military training in an era when, more than ever before, the mass conscript army seems to have outlived its usefulness. These theories will not pass unchallenged, but they are on the whole supported by sound reasoning, worthy of examination.

HARVEY S. FORD

Proof Positive

HISTORIES OF ART AND LITERATURE are the stepchildren of the historical sciences because their subjects cannot be dealt with adequately without that quality called taste, and taste does not necessarily belong to the scholar's scale of virtues. This unfortunate state of affairs is already well known, and there was no need for Victor Lange to prove the point.

Nevertheless, he has proved it in almost exemplary fashion in his volume, "Modern German Literature, 1870-1940" (Cornell, $2.50). If anyone wishes to know how not to write a history of literature he has only to be given this book. Every author, no matter how obscure, is mentioned at least once, and no distinctions whatever are made. Third-grade writers like Raabe are set side by side with first-rate poets like Stifter. The twentieth century, for which judgments are not yet established, fares even worse. To give one single instance taken at random: "The poetry of the later Rilke, of Binding and Carossa, of Rudolf Borchardt and Rudolf Alexander Schröder, of Oskar Lörke and Agnes Miegel, and the singularly impressive epic poems of Albrecht Schäffer are all indicative of a palpable shift from expressionist abandon to the austerity of a disciplined idiom." The point is that Binding, Lörke, and Agnes Miegel are indicative of nothing except very mediocre poetry; that the others may be "indicative" but of widely differing trends; and that only Borchardt and Schröder have anything in common at all.

The only proof that this book was written by a real person and is not a filing system which through some magic has got into print lies in occasional omissions—of Mörike and Kleist in the first part, of Hans Blüher and the last beautiful novel-fragment of Hofmannsthal ("Andreas") in the second. But for these omissions one feels rather grateful.

There would not be much sense in reviewing such a book if it were not for the, let us hope, imaginary danger that it should become a textbook. It would cause the intelligent student to shy away from German literature, while it might give to the more feeble-minded a terrific arsenal of cheap catchwords which have not the slightest relation to the respective authors and their work.

HANNAH ARENDT

Reply to Hayek

"ROAD TO REACTION" by Herman Finer (Little, Brown, $2) is a long, angry review of Hayek's "Road to Serfdom." It would have been a better book had it been less angry; the frequent use of the argument ad hominem is no credit to its author. It is a sad commentary on the lack of communication between social scientists of different disciplines: both Hayek and Finer write with a strong prejudice in favor of their own intellectual interests. Hayek, the economist, loves the private administration of business and the working of economic competition; Finer, the political scientist, loves public administration and the working of political competition. Both are blind to the defects of their loves.

It is characteristic of Hayek that he gives scant attention to the scourge of economic competition—unemployment. It is characteristic of Finer that he gives no attention whatever to the scourge of political competition—war. If Hayek is blind to the blood on the hands of Standard Oil, Finer is even blinder to the blood on the hands of the national state.

Neither Hayek nor Finer, it seems to this reviewer, has come to grips with the real problem of the place of competition in social life. Hayek is unduly naive about the benevolence of the free market as an economic regulator, and does not adequately appreciate the ease with which beneficent competition slips into maleficent deflation. Finer, on the other hand, is equally naive about the universal benevolence of parliamentary democracy and the competition of parties, and does not see that, like economic competition, this benevolence operates only within limits, and that under adverse conditions the will of the majority—as Plato saw—can lead to tyranny. The argument of the collectivists against the free market—that it gives the rich too many "dollar votes" and the poor too few, and so distorts the structure of demand away from the structure of "need"—can also be applied to parliamentarianism: the votes of a majority who care little about a measure may override the votes of the minority who care a great deal. This does not mean that we should abolish either the free market or parliaments; it does mean that both are successful only within limits. We need much hard thinking and study to find what these limits are and how to secure them. Mr. Finer would have made a greater contribution to this task if he had written less hastily, with less heat, and with better editing.

K. E. BOULDING

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents

MAURICE EVANS

In His New Production of Shakespeare's

HAMLETColumbus Circle Thea. E'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
Eves. 8:30. Mts. Thu. & Sat. 2:30UP IN CENTRAL PARKBook by HERBERT Lyrics by Sigmund ROMBERG
& DOROTHY FIELDS
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway at 53rd Street. Mts. Wed. & SAT."DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nippon, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein presentMADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'SI REMEMBER MAMAfrom Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 8-4638.
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp.

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present

DEEP ARE THE ROOTSA New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW Staged by ELIA KAZANFULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of Broadway. Circle 6-6380.Evenings: 8:40, $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Matinees
Wednesday and Saturday, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax Inclusive.

MOTION PICTURES

RKO NOWHAPPY NEW YEAR HITS!"Elaborate Puzze Thriller"—N. Y. Sun"Satisfyingly Thunderous"—*N. Y. Herald-Tribune'THE SPANISH MAIN'

STARRING

PAUL HENREID
MAUREEN O'HARA
WALTER SLEZAK

In GLORIOUS TECHNICOLOR

— And —

'SING YOUR WAY HOME'Jack Haley
Marcy McGuire

MON., TUES., WED.—JAN 7, 8, 9

'BORN FOR TROUBLE'

Van JOHNSON • Faye EMERSON

— And —

'IT ALL CAME TRUE'

Humphrey BOGART • Ann SHERIDAN

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
48th ST.
49th ST.
50th ST.
51st St.
52nd St.
HAMILTON
123rd ST.
RECENT RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYALWestchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERSBrooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney IslandQueens
Keltch's
FLUSHING
Keltch's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far RockawayB. G. DeSylva presents
BETTY HUTTON in
"THE STORK CLUB"

— with —

BARRY FITZGERALD
DON DE FORERobert Benchley • Bill Goodwin
Iris Adrian • Mikhail Rasumny
Mary Young
and introducing ANDY RUSSELL
Midnight Feature NightlyNOW PLAYING PARAMOUNTIn Person
WOODY HERMAN
and his ORCHESTRA
— featuring —
FRANCES WAYNE
— plus —
DOROTHY KELLER
Extra added attraction
BUDDY
LESTER
Don Baker at the OrganTIMES
SQUAREThe New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review

may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN copy on request

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

AS WE all know, from the newspapers, two hundred important paintings by masters ranging in time from Giotto to Daumier have been brought to this country from damaged or destroyed museums in Germany by the United States government for safe-keeping in the storage rooms of the National Gallery at Washington. They will be returned to Germany when "definitely established as being of bona fide German ownership . . . and when conditions there warrant." Meanwhile, "it is not contemplated that any of these works of art will be exhibited to the public at present."

I have seen the list of the pictures involved in this transaction, and the number of great masters and the quantity in which they are represented take my breath away: four Altdorfers, four Baldung-Grüns, five Botticellis, three Bronzinos, three Cranachs, two Chardins, five Dürers, four Elsheimers, three Guardis, six Halses, three Holbeins (including the portrait of Giesze), two Mantegnas, three Masaccios, three Memlings, two Giovanni di Paolos, two Pousins, two Raphaels, fifteen Rembrandts, six Rubenses, two Sassetas, three Signorellis, two Steens, two Ter Borchs, three Tiepols, two Tintoretts, five Titians, five Van der Weydens, five (!) Van Eycks, two Van Leydens, two Velasquezes, two Vermeers, two Andrea del Verrochios, three Watteaus—not to mention single examples by Angelico, Bosch, Caravaggio, Carpaccio, Correggio, di Cosimo, Giorgione, Hubbema, the Lippis, Lorrain, Patinir, Ruysdael, Schongauer, Seghers, Cosimo Tura, Manet, and still others.

That these works should come to this country and remain unseen is of a piece with everything else that distinguishes an age which, even when it wants to, can no more tell the difference between man as an end and man as a means than it can tell the difference between things as ends and things as means.

These pictures are means, let there be no mistake about that—means to the gratification of man. When they are removed from sight their purpose is violated. And to handle them at the same time with such care (air-conditioned storage) is to regard them in effect as objects solely of great material value, which is to pervert their function. The money value the pictures represent becomes more important and more of an end than the delight they would afford countless people in this country who will never be able to travel to see them in Europe.

Naturally, it would cost money to put the pictures on public exhibition—and that is a consideration; especially since it would be better to show them all at once than piecemeal, and still better to send them around the country. But if money is all that stands in the way, a collection could be taken up; or perhaps some rich benefactor of the arts would come forward to donate the costs. At any rate they ought to be shown; if they come and go without being seen by the American public it will amount to a scandal.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

THE BELLS OF ST. MARY'S," like "Going My Way," is distinguished for leisure and spaciousness, for delight in character and atmosphere, for its use of scenes which are inserted not to advance the story but for their own intrinsic charm. One such set-piece—in which primary-school children rehearse a Christmas play—is almost magically deft and pretty; and the picture is full of shrewd and pleasant flashes. It is also fascinating to watch as a talented, desperate effort to repeat the unrepeatable. But on the whole it is an unhappy film. Bing Crosby's priest, who was so excellent in the earlier picture, at times looks just bored, cold, and sly, as if he knew that this sort of thing had gone on too long for the good of anybody's soul, his own first of all. Ingrid Bergman replaces Barry Fitzgerald and, for my money, cannot compete with him in sex appeal, though she has and uses a lot too much to play a Mother Superior, comes painfully close to twittering her eyes in scenes with Crosby, and in general, I grieve to say, justifies a recent piece of radio promotion which rather startlingly describes a nun: "Ingrid Bergman has never been lovelier, hubbuhubhabubba."

I find very objectionable the movies' increasing recognition of the romantic-commercial values of celibacy. I like hardly better a little boxing lesson in which Mother Bergman shows one of the schoolboys how not to lead with the other cheek. I am just plain horrified by the way in which the sisters hound an old nabob into beneficence. And though I was amused both by a kitten which got fouled up in Fr. Crosby's famous straw hat, and by a mongrel which got a fit of yawns while Henry Travers was trying to pray, I think that too much of a good thing is more than enough. The trouble is, the whole picture is more than enough, and anyone of Leo McCarey's talent would have been wise to use the talent on something entirely new instead. But it looks as if Father O'Malley, like Andy Hardy, is set to go on and on. In case there is any doubt about a subject, I suggest that the priest become a fixer, next time, for the Little Brothers of St. Dismas—if only in order that he may sing the theme song (which I will gladly furnish on request) "Take It on the Lam of God."

For what seems at least half of the dogged, devoted length of "They Were Expendable" all you have to watch is men getting on or off PT boats, and other men watching them do so. But this is made so beautiful and so real that I could not feel one foot of the film was wasted. The rest of the time the picture is showing nothing much newer, with no particular depth of feeling, much less idea; but, again, the whole thing is so beautifully directed and photographed, in such an abundance of vigorous open air and good raw sunlight, that I thoroughly enjoyed and admired it. Visually, and in detail, and in nearly everything he does with people, I think it is John Ford's finest movie. Another man who evidently learned a tremendous amount through the war is Robert Montgomery, whose sober, light, sure performance is, so far as I can remember, the one perfection to turn up in movies during the year.

"A Walk in the Sun" is often very alive and likable, thanks to several of its players, particularly Herbert Rudley, Richard Conti, Lloyd Bridges, and Dana Andrews. The gradual increase of daylight which opens it is atmospherically and technically wonderful; you can seldom get your eyes hurt, as I did here, by the manipulation, against dark contexts, of a little bit of cloudy light on a screen. In motion and shooting, much of the film is worked out with very unusual vitality and care—much of which, unfortunately, is related more nearly to ballet than to warfare. But mainly, I think, it is an embarrassing movie. The dialogue seems as unreal as it is expert. Most of the characters—as distinct from the men who play them—are as unreal and literary as the dialogue. The aesthetic and literary pseudo-democratic preoccupations are so strong that at times all sense of plain reality drops out of the picture. At the end, for instance, with their farmhouse captured, various featured players are shown completing the gags which tag their characters—chomping an apple, notching a rifle-stock, and so on—while, so far as the camera lets you know, their wounded comrades are still writhing unattended in the dooryard.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE Budapest Quartet has been playing Schubert and Brahms at the concerts of the New Friends of Music and repeating its Beethoven cycle at the Y. M. H. A. There can be no doubt of the loss to the quartet through Alexander Schneider's departure. One hears it in the altered sound of the entire group, in which the robust and dark-toned viola and cello are less well balanced by the two delicate and light-toned violins than they used to be when they were matched by at least one of the violins. And one hears it in Ortenberg's own playing, which lacks the vitality and style that Schneider's had. And yet, even with these losses, the performances are unique, unapproached by any others. One must, in fact, say of them what one says of Toscanini's—that they are not just great performances, or the greatest one has heard, but that in their province they are something on a different level of functioning from the best of other good performers and musicians, a product of a different order of powers of musical insight and execution.

One must say this even though the performances are uneven these days—possibly as a result of fatigue and staleness from too much playing the last few years. The finale of Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" Quartet at the New Friends kept building up to big moments that were so expansive in sonority and pace as to break the wonderful continuity of momentum the movement used to have. And some of the Beethoven quartets at the Y. M. H. A. have been dry and scratchy in sound. But at the same concert where the Opus 95 was dry and scratchy the Opus 135 had all the beauty of sound of the group's playing at its best. And though the sound in Opus 95 was scratchy and dry one heard in the performance the operation of that different order of powers of musical insight and ensemble execution.

Schneider meanwhile continues to lead the Albeneri Trio, which also has been playing Brahms and Schubert at the New Friends and all of Beethoven's trios at the Y. M. H. A. And these have not been performances by a well-matched group of three players of equal capacities, but instead performances in which the violinist's beautiful use of his instrument and distinguished musical style have stood out sharply against the coarse playing of the cellist, the pallid, characterless sounds from the piano. I am anything but unaware of the particular talent it took to play the piano's great opening statement in the slow movement of Beethoven's Opus 97 so that its greatness was made almost completely unnoticeable; but it is a talent I do not value.

I am aware also that this gray, mouse-like piano-playing is what many listeners and critics—from long hearing of it—consider proper in ensemble performance (just as long hearing of hysterical falsification of Tchaikovsky's music has given them the idea that this is the proper way of treating that music.) My own idea of what is proper in ensemble performance is playing that is pianistically beautiful and musically alive—the playing of a Rupp, a Balsam, a Harry Kaufman. And the New Friends audience heard an outstanding example of it when Webster Aitken played with a group assembled in place of the originally scheduled Budapest Quartet. I chose to listen to the concert as broadcast by WQXR; and careless microphone placement made the strings sound right in the room and the piano a mile away when it was not blanketed completely; but when it could be heard there was no mistaking the beautiful sound of Aitken's playing and the exciting continuity of rhythmic flow and phraseological outline that he created for the other players. Really—to quote Virgil Thomson's remark after an Aitken recital—it was not the sort of playing you hear every year; certainly it wasn't the sort of playing the New Friends audience had heard recently; and I hope it appreciated it when it heard it this time. If it did it may be interested in Aitken's performance of Schubert's G major Sonata at his Town Hall recital early in February, when he will also play Mozart's wonderful Rondo K. 511, Bach's Toccata in E minor, Stravinsky's Sonata, Debussy's "Estampes," and a new piece by Messiaen.

WQXR not only transmitted the performance of Schubert's "Forellen" Quintet badly balanced but cut it off in the middle of the finale; and it did the same thing with the Albeneri Trio's performance of Schubert's Trio Opus 100.

CONTRIBUTORS

RICHARD ARMOUR, professor of English at Scripps College, California, is the author of "Privates' Lives" and other books of light verse.

DAWN POWELL is the author of "A Time to Be Born" and other novels.

NICOLA CHIAROMONTE has contributed articles on Italian affairs to Politics, the Partisan Review, View, the New Republic, and Italia Libera.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR is professor of Christian ethics at Union Theological Seminary and editor of Christianity and Crisis. His most recent book is "The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness."

HARVEY S. FORD is the author of "What the Citizen Should Know About the Army."

HANNAH ARENDT has recently contributed articles on politics to the Jewish Frontier, Review of Politics, the Partisan Review, and other journals. She is at work now on a book on imperialism.

K. E. BOULDING, author of "The Economics of Peace," is a member of the Department of Economics of Iowa State College.

Buy Bonds

★ for Keep! ★

Courses in MAGAZINE WRITING

fiction • non-fiction

The Magazine Institute, a private school owned and operated by successful writers and editors, offers practical, up-to-date training in story and article writing. You work in your own home. Every assignment you send in is returned with detailed criticism.

EXPERT INSTRUCTION. An experienced writer or editor takes you in hand, answering all your questions, helping you find the type of work for which you are naturally suited. Before long you are writing in your own home fiction stories, essays, short sketches, whatever you are best fitted to do.

Send coupon today for free catalog which tells about opportunities in magazine writing.

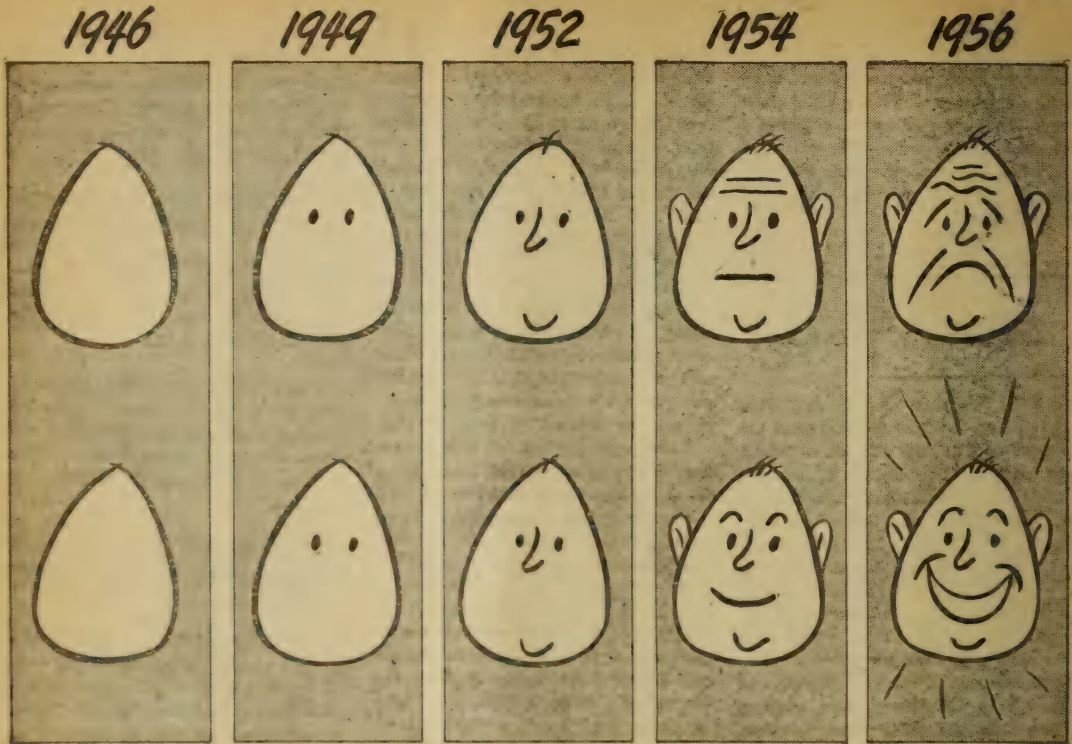

The Magazine Institute, Inc., Dept. 91-D
Rockefeller Center, New York 20, N.Y.
Please send catalog, without obligation to:

NAME

ADDRESS

.....

(Confidential. No salesman will call.)

Two ways your face can grow in the next few years

USUALLY, our faces show what's happening to us. For instance, suppose financial matters are constantly on your mind.

Suppose you know that there's practically no cash reserve between you and trouble.

It would be surprising if your face didn't show it.

But suppose that, on the contrary, you've managed to get yourself on a pretty sound financial basis.

Suppose that you're putting aside part of everything you earn . . . that those dollars you save are busy earning extra dollars for you . . . that you have a nest egg and an emergency fund.

Naturally, your face will show that, too.

There's a simple and pretty accurate way to tell which way your face is going to go in the next few years:

If you are buying, regularly, and holding as many U. S. Savings Bonds as you can, you needn't worry.

Your face will be among the ones that wear a smile.

Buy all the Bonds you can... keep all the Bonds you buy

Space contributed by THE PUBLISHER OF THE NATION

Letters to the Editors

Friends of France

Dear Sirs: Seeing the message in your December 22 issue listing agencies which collect clothing for war victims, I want to let your readers know that the needs of the French people are not forgotten, and that there is definitely a way for American friends to help them in this sixth year of their suffering from the war.

As a member agency of the National War Fund, American Relief for France has observed the regulations of the President's War Relief Control Board in not making public appeals for "gifts in kind" during the fund-raising campaigns of the War Fund—but such gifts are received, sorted, packed, and shipped to France the year round; and all contributions of clothing are welcomed at the American Relief for France Warehouse, 15 East 24th Street.

FLORENCE GILLIAM,

Executive Director of Public Relations,
American Relief for France

New York, December 21

Notes on Bolivia

Dear Sirs: In his article entitled Terror in Bolivia in your issue of November 17, Mr. Arze discloses that he is an exile, that he is head of the P. I. R., and that the P. I. R. asked the Bolivian President to include them in the government, and they were not included. In other words, Arze, who did not participate in the people's revolution that put Villarroel in office, wanted to participate in the government. He was not acceptable; so he is in the United States or Chile (he drifts back and forth), calling the government bad names. He calls them Nazis or fascists.

On the opposite side of the picture, Patiño, Hochschild, and Aramayo—the three big mine owners—are also political exiles. They are in the United States and Argentina calling the Bolivian government equally ugly names. But since these gentlemen are well known to be reactionaries, they are calling the Bolivian government Communists.

Thus we have Arze calling them fascists and reactionaries, and the mine owners calling them communistic. I think you will find the government to be a little left of center. I think you will also find the wage scale to have increased considerably due to government decrees, and social-security benefits to have been increased likewise.

Enrique Camacho, president of the Bolivian Development Corporation, is a Bolivian army officer without much business experience. He is an ideal man for president of the Bolivian Development Corporation. The American manager will run it, and Camacho is honest and patriotic. What more could you want?

Incidentally, Bolivia had a free election. The M. N. R. won; the P. I. R. lost. The President has had to do business therefore with the majority party in Congress. Otherwise, he would not be democratic.

SPROESSER WYNN,

Honorary Bolivian Consul
Fort Worth, Tex., December 7

AMG Rebuttal

Dear Sirs: The article AMG—Innocents Abroad has attracted my attention in the October 6 issue of The Nation—a scarce article of literary fare in the ETO.

I am one of those innocents recently returned from nineteen months overseas service in Military Government. I commanded MG teams in the field, served on Corps and Division MG staffs, and was a member of a team which assumed control over one of the first large cities to be taken in Germany. Altogether I spent twenty-two months in Military Government.

First, let me say that there is some truth in Mr. Padover's article; unfortunately, there is not enough. I am sure that his contact with Military Government was far more limited than he implies, and in any event, his presentation of conditions presumably prevailing in Aachen in November, 1944, as current in the whole American zone in October, 1945, is not good journalism.

Contrary to Mr. Padover's first contention, Military Government was organized to rule Germany in peace time. AMGOT was planned in advance for Italy, and as a result of the lessons learned (and mistakes made) there, the program was reorganized for Germany. Special classes were begun in the spring of 1943 in leading universities for those selected to participate in the MG phase of the expected German occupation. This training was concerned with German customs, language, politics, the Nazi Party—background material. It did not concern itself with long-range policy as there was and apparently still is none. This was no fault of MG. Policy is "higher-level stuff," not to be determined, presumably, by local MG representatives. We, the underlings, were painfully aware of this situation.

I think that any MG officer will bear me out in saying that the first essential in any change in Military Government in Germany is a clear-cut policy not subject to daily amendment. Personally, I believe that most MG officers have done an excellent job while laboring under unexpected and sometimes nearly insurmountable difficulties.

Regarding the retention of Nazis in power, I must agree that it was done at first. But let's review what happened. It had been early recognized that the bulk of the civil service in less important, lesser-paying jobs was filled with people who had been admitted to the party on a join-or-else basis. Within certain limits, the decision as to whether a man was only a nominal Nazi and could be retained was discretionary with the local MG officer.

It soon became apparent that leaving the question of political reliability of office-holders up to individual MG officers was unworkable administratively. On April 14, 1945, the 12th Army Group issued its famous directive stating in black and white who was to be removed and who could be hired. A house-cleaning then commenced, and when the deadline, July 31, was past, the American zone was pretty clean.

Perhaps the worst untruth perpetrated by Mr. Padover was the assertion that MG "lacked a political-intelligence department," which he rightly considers "a most vital instrument of government." Such a statement is strong indication to anyone familiar with MG that Mr. Padover is not the best authority on its operation.

There is a certain type of "liberal" who believes that anyone unsympathetic to Russia must of necessity be a fascist. I do not know whether Mr. Padover falls into that category, but as for the "anti-reds" among MG officers, who thought that Nazis were "just a political party, something like the Republicans and Democrats at home," there may be some so naive. I never met any.

Let's put it this way: I myself have been sympathetic toward Russia for many years. I still am. But I do not believe that the war was fought to make

Crossword Puzzle No. 142

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 This British war measure was so frightening at first that even burglars stayed at home
- 5 No ordinary horse, he: if more than one rode him he accommodat- ingly grew in length
- 10 American painter, and illustrator of Shakespeare (1852-1911)
- 11 "What economy is it to go to bed to save candle light," he asked, "if the result be twins?"
- 12 Reward with sixpence, in Shakespeare's day
- 13 Town of Oklahoma
- 14 Snoop around an industrious worker in the butler's room
- 15 Place just outside New York
- 18 Lake in Campania, called by the poets "the entrance to the infernal regions"
- 21 Co-stars with Palamon in the first of the Canterbury Tales
- 24 How far can you go into a forest?
- 26 Having made a will—so much of it being landed property, you know
- 27 Dog which used to love having a coach run over him
- 28 Not recognized that gears were engaged
- 29 To peck (anag.)
- 30 Was in supreme command in Greek waters

DOWN

- 1 Is only skin deep—but then it's only the skin you see
- 2 A surprising occurrence in war

- 3 Town of Florida, so called because of the number of bones found upon the reef (two words, 3 & 4)
- 4 Unearthly, but not necessarily heavenly
- 6 Suddenly
- 7 As our Spanish friend here sees it, his French colleague lacks go
- 8 Break up
- 9 Proverbial state of crowned heads
- 16 Might make Ned recant
- 17 "Found drowned," perhaps; finished, anyway (two words, 6 & 2)
- 19 Famous London prison
- 20 Enough to put a golfer off his putt
- 21 Father of Proteus, in Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona
- 22 I will be found in an old stronghold in Spain
- 23 Charlie McCarthy's wire-puller
- 25 Shrub of the ash, jasmine and olive family

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 141

ACROSS:—1 AD LIB; 4 ORC; 6 HERON; 9 SEVENTY; 10 FRANTIC; 11 MARMOT; 13 HEATRICE; 15 MILLERS; 16 IN DEBT; 17 SLUM; 19 EARTHEN; 21 PORT; 23 NEW INN; 25 SIBERIA; 27 ALISTAIR; 28 CRAFTS; 31 SHIKARI; 32 CLEARED; 33 MUGGY; 34 GAT; 35 STORM.

DOWN:—1 ASSAM; 2 LEVERED; 3 BUN-COMBE; 4 ONYX; 5 COFFEE; 6 HEARTS; 7 RETRIAL; 8 NACRE; 12 TITANIA; 13 BLATHER; 14 ARSENIC; 16 IMP; 18 MAN; 20 NEARNESS; 22 RATTLING; 24 INFERNO; 25 STEADY; 26 BITING; 27 ADSUM; 29 SODOM; 30 SCOT.

the world safe for communism. In MG we unhappily realized that our own country did not know quite what it wanted to do with Germany, while the Russians apparently did. However, we did believe that some form of democracy was our objective, and we had no intention of playing into the hands of Russian agents busily engaged in re-establishing German communism by turning civilian administration over to the pro-Russian elements. Personally, it was simply a question of ordinary loyalty to my own country outweighing sympathy toward Russia. As for our classifying "anti-fascists, Social Democrats . . . as nothing but reds, and reds are worse than Nazis," nonsense!

In conclusion, too many people still differentiate sharply between Nazis and other Germans. We in Military Government concluded from experience that after eliminating the real Nazi hierarchy, the distinction between the rest of the Nazis and the German people was somewhat hollow. The assumption that the bulk of the German people are peace-loving democrats whose republic was stolen by a Nazi minority is at odds with the facts, to put it conservatively.

No doubt most Americans expected MG to establish a democratic government in Germany, a government run by people who believe that the war was wrong and that Germans are no different from anybody else—in other words, a government run by people much like ourselves. That is the trouble. There are, practically speaking, no such Germans.

FORMER MG OFFICER

Manhattan Beach, Cal., December 1

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

RESORTS

INVITATION TO RELAX

Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, roaring fireplace, delicious food—and fun. Only 55 miles from New York!

MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY
plum point
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 600-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails, 800' to 1,000-foot Ski Slopes. Delicious food. Easy transportation.

Attractive Winter Homes
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 259

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 12, 1946

NUMBER 2

The Shape of Things

THE MOSCOW DECISIONS OF THE BIG THREE were a bitter pill for France even though sugar-coated by an offer to hold the proposed general peace conference in Paris. But the French Cabinet after long and apparently heated deliberations decided against any outright refusal to cooperate. Instead it authorized a note to the Big Three powers making French sponsorship of the conference contingent on satisfactory answers to a number of searching questions. In the first place the French government wants to know whether the Big Five Council of Foreign Ministers which was set up at Potsdam has been permanently superseded by a council of three. With regard to the conference of active belligerents to examine peace treaties with Italy, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Finland, information is requested as to what influence it will be allowed to exercise. Is the conference intended simply as a face-saving junket for the smaller nations? Or do the Big Three consider themselves obligated to heed its recommendations when writing the final texts of the treaties? Elucidation of the plan for a Far Eastern Commission is also desired. France feels slighted because it appears to have been relegated to a secondary position with no veto power. Apparently, however, this matter has been cleared up by informal assurances from Washington that the commission will deal only with Japan. In taking the critical position which it has done the French government evidently feels that it is acting not only in defense of its own prerogatives, particularly in the Balkans, but of those of the European nations generally. In Paris, emphasis is put on the fact that Europe's fate is being decided by three powers, none of which is strictly European. By seizing the initiative in protesting this development France hopes to do something to reestablish its prestige and advance its claim to continental leadership. *

THIS AIM, BROADLY PHRASED TO SUIT THE occasion, was the theme of President de Gaulle's address at a New Year diplomatic reception. France, he declared, would persevere in efforts to regain her place among the nations knowing "how much her greatness means to the world." Unfortunately, if not unnaturally, the French leader has always been inclined to overemphasize military strength as an ingredient of national greatness. That was one reason for the recent sharp controversy in the Constituent Assembly over army appropriations. The budget estimated army expenditure in 1946 at 125 billion francs—over $1 billion—with 42 billion francs required in the first quarter. When the Socialists asked for a 20 per cent reduction in the latter amount, de Gaulle made it a question of confidence and declared he would resign if his figure were not approved. The crisis passed, thanks to a compromise providing for an immediate 5 per cent cut and a pledge by the government to bring in proposals for army reform before February 15. But the size of the military establishment is likely to remain a burning issue in French politics. De Gaulle feels that the voice of France will not be listened to unless the country recovers its armed strength. The Socialists put greater faith in overcoming economic weakness. Up to now the claims of the army have received priority as is shown by the fact that the reconstruction budget for 1946 stands at 17 billion francs or 13.6 per cent of the military budget. The sense of values indicated by this comparison is not the best of auguries for the French renaissance we are so eager to welcome.

★

EMPEROR HIROHITO'S DENIAL OF HIS OWN divinity is not a retreat under irresistible pressure but rather a strategic withdrawal to a position from which the most powerful instrument of Japan's ruling class can be more easily defended. The hardest blow leveled at Emperor-worship was the American directive ordering the end of government support for state Shintoism which has indoctrinated three generations with the belief that since the Emperor is of divine descent, Japan is entitled to rule the world. Apart from this the Emperor has suffered little in the general disillusionment with the old order. The militarists, big business and the bureaucracy have been pilloried in the press and denounced by the people. Thus far only the Communists have dared to attack Hirohito as a war criminal and demand the establishment of a republic. Although the great mass of the people have not yet turned against the Emperor, they have made clear their opposition to the other members of the oligarchy and may—if they have the support of the American authorities—unseat many of its chief representatives. Far-sighted conservatives have recognized that unless the throne is disassociated from the oligarchy, and brought much closer to the people it may eventually bear the brunt of the democratic attack which is now in preparation. A constitutional monarch in tweeds makes a much smaller target than a divine-right monarch in uniform.

★

THE NATION APPLAUDS THE NOMINATION OF William H. Hastie as Governor of the Virgin Islands. If confirmed by the Senate, as he should be, Mr. Hastie will be the first Negro to serve as governor of an American territory. But the nomination is more than a gratifying recognition on the President's part of the appropriateness of placing

• IN THIS ISSUE •

THE SHAPE OF THINGS	29
EDITORIALS
Admiral on Horseback	31
Truman and the People	32
The Palestine Inquiry by Freda Kirchwey	33
ARTICLES
Gangsters or Patriots? by I. F. Stone	34
This Is Your Fight! by Walter P. Reuther	35
Stamford Sticks Together by J. Mitchell Morse	37
Philippine Aftermath: I. The Menace of Freedom by Mildred Adams	38
What's Behind the Attack on the Co-ops by Paul Green	40
The Far North: International Frontier by D. M. Lebourdais	42
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	43
The People's Front by Del Vayo	45
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
The Sick City and the Family Romance by Delmore Schwarz	46
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	48
Canada and the United States by J. King Gordon	50
Briefer Comment	52
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	54
Music by B. H. Haggin	54
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS	55
CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 143 by Jack Barrett	56

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors: Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison,
Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama Critic: J. W. Krutch Music Critic: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors: Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside, Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting, Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

Published weekly and copyright, 1946, in the U.S.A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two Years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

the islands, with their overwhelmingly Negro population, under a Negro governor. Hastie was judge of the District Court of the Virgin Islands from 1937 to 1939—the first Negro federal judge in American history. As assistant solicitor of the Interior Department from 1934 to 1937, he became something of an expert in territorial problems. He had made a reputation as dean of the Law School at Howard University, and is regarded as one of the ablest young lawyers in the country. The people of the Virgin Islands will be getting a governor who has never been afraid to speak up for his people. Hastie demonstrated his courage and integrity on this issue in 1943 when he resigned his post as civilian aide to Secretary of War Stimson in protest against Jim Crow practices in the air corps. The President could not have picked a better man for the island governorship.

✱

ONE PROBLEM WHICH HAS PLAGUED THE development of television in the United States is the projection and enlargement of televised images on screens big enough to permit a number of persons to view them simultaneously. In Britain the problem was solved as long ago as 1939. The Scopphony Corporation, Ltd., through a supersonic liquid valve on which it held patents, was able to project images the size of motion-picture screens. Later it perfected what is said to be an even better system of enlargement by means of a skiatron tube. In 1942 the Scopphony Corporation, needing funds to exploit its devices, entered into an arrangement with two American concerns, Paramount Pictures and the General Precision Equipment Corporation, largest supplier of motion-picture equipment in this country. They formed the Scophonic Corporation of America, agreeing that it would have exclusive right to sales in the Western Hemisphere, while the Eastern Hemisphere would be reserved for the British Scopphony. This was, of course, an indubitable violation of our anti-trust laws, and a civil suit against the companies involved has been brought by the Department of Justice. Perhaps of greater interest, however, is the allegation that the American participants have used their financial control to block any development of the supersonic and skiatron techniques. The patents they hold obviously represent a gold mine. But apparently they do not wish to tap it until they have exhausted the gold mine of present motion-picture projection methods, which would probably be rendered obsolete by these new developments. What was good enough for yesterday's public is good enough for today's. Technological progress seems once more to have run into the Stop sign of vested interests.

✱

F. H. LA GUARDIA, AFTER TWELVE YEARS AS A Mayor who was always highly articulate and sometimes noisy, often irritating but generally on the side of the angels, has become a private citizen; but he bids fair to become the most public private citizen in the country. He has announced that he is embarking on a career of "thinking, writing, and talking." He is to do a weekly column for PM, and he will broadcast twice on Sundays. One of his sponsors is Liberty magazine, the other is a dairy-products company which, as the newspapers were careful to point out, distributes Blue Moon cheese. He has signed a contract to write an autobiography "for the Christmas, 1947, trade," as he engagingly put it. And finally he will write another weekly column which should keep him in the hot water he seems to find so stimulating. It is to be called Under the Hat, and it will appear in the paid advertising of Sachs Quality Stores every Thursday—and therefore in papers that will find it anything but agreeable. This last is La Guardia's pet project, and we can't blame him for taking a mischievous pleasure in getting what he calls "my stuff" into such papers as the Journal American. Under the Hat has already begun, and the first installment was devoted to freedom of the press, which La Guardia proposes to exercise. In it he said among other things that "freedom of the press becomes a mockery unless it is a truthful press," and paid his respects to misleading headlines. But he also paid his respects to censorship—"better a bad uncensored press than a subservient, intimidated, government-controlled press." We wish him well; and we are sure the Newspaper Guild, which he plans to join, will find him a live member. As for his successor in City Hall, William O'Dwyer, whose inauguration was attended by such Tammany luminaries as Edward J. Loughlin and Generoso Pope, we can only hope that he is not turning over an old leaf.

✱

CHRISTMAS PROVIDED A PLEASANT ESCAPE FROM reality for a good many of us. Wars and famine and insurrection in various parts of the world were forgotten. The Moscow agreement was the excuse for postponing our worries and sidestepping our fears. As a healthy reminder of the actual present, we would recommend Dr. Harold J. Urey's article on the atomic bomb in Collier's of January 5. Title: "I'm a Frightened Man."

Sweigert in the San Francisco Chronicle

Admiral on Horseback

ADMIRAL Horthy, former Regent of Hungary, has been released from "protective custody" in Nürnberg where he had been held as a possible witness for the prosecution. He has been allowed to retire to a country estate near Munich which Hitler presented to him in 1944 because, as the Nazi press pointed out, he had "rendered great services to National Socialism." Those services had almost slipped into oblivion but Dr. Ries, the present Hungarian Minister of Justice, has refreshed our memory by recalling in a recent article the unpunished "crimes against humanity" committed by the Hungarian counter-revolution and its leader Horthy, which provided the model both for Fascism and Nazism. It was no thunderbolt from a blue sky which struck Hungary when the Nazi forces occupied the country in March, 1944; it was only the final step in the systematic progress toward national suicide begun in 1919 when the Admiral rode on his white charger into "guilty" Budapest encouraging and ordering the white terror. The atrocities that followed were fully exposed in several issues of The Nation in 1920 and further investigated and reported upon by a British Labor delegation in 1921. It was under Horthy's leadership, too, that Hungary signed the anti-Comintern Pact in February, 1939, and in September, 1940, joined the Axis—a term, by the way, coined by Horthy's favorite, Premier Goemboes.

At the Nürnberg trial, the prosecution produced the files of the Reich Chancellery from which it appeared that in May, 1938, Hitler disclosed his future plans to the Admiral, remarking at the same time that although he did not need Hungarian help, if Hungary wanted to share the meal it would have to participate in its preparation. Horthy's letter to Hitler, offering to create if necessary an "incident" on the Czechoslovak frontier which would justify the German attack on the Czech republic, was also read at the trial. Munich made the "incident" unnecessary, but the self-appointed jackal nevertheless shared in the loot. As a consequence of the Vienna Award which authorized the Admiral to ride into Kosice and Cluj, Hungary had to take part in the shameless attack on Yugoslavia in April, 1941, and to declare war against Russia in June, and Great Britain and the United States the following December. All this was done in defense of "Christian" (meaning Nazi) civilization. The brave Admiral certainly deserved the Iron Cross first class which the Führer personally pinned on his warrior chest when he visited the Russian front.

Now he has been released from the Nürnberg jail, where he enjoyed the company of his former Nazi comrades-in-arms; the authorities, it is reported, said there were "no charges against him." Obviously not, because those same authorities did not make any charges. Why? The reason is obvious. Horthy was a fascist snatched from the burning; he turned his coat just in time to save his skin. And so, by the grace of the Allied prosecutors and the late Führer, he will be permitted to find undisturbed repose in the charming Bavarian countryside. Unhappily, some hundred thousand Hungarian soldiers met a different end; they repose instead, under the hard Russian earth at Voronezh.

Truman and the People

MR. TRUMAN'S radio appeal to the "plain people" must be seen in political perspective. Neither Mr. Truman nor any other Democratic candidate can be elected in 1948 without the support of organized labor and the Northern Negro. To get that support Mr. Truman must carry on the New Deal program. Unfortunately the Democrats are more often a coalition than a genuine party. The coalition holds together for the election of a President but falls apart when faced with social reform and general welfare legislation. Hence Mr. Truman's troubles with Congress. Franklin D. Roosevelt, for all his glamour, was able to do very little with Congress after the depression demands of farmers had been satisfied in the early New Deal and after the Little Steel strike and returning prosperity had cured depression-born middle-class desire for reform. Politically, the war saved Mr. Roosevelt, and politically peace may be the ruin of Mr. Truman.

Mr. Truman, echoing basic Democratic faith in vox populi, is appealing to the "plain people" to help him get necessary legislation past stubbornly hostile Congressional committees. He wants popular pressure for passage of bills to extend price and materials control. He wants help on full-employment legislation, on a permanent FEPC, on higher minimum wages, on decent jobless compensation, and on his proposal for a cooling-off period for fact-finding in labor disputes. It is necessary to go beyond Democratic mysticism and ask who are the "plain people" to whom he is appealing. On the answer depends the likelihood of his success.

On many of these issues a good many of the "plain people" are against the President. The FEPC is a special case perhaps; here the Coxes and Smiths certainly have the approval of most of the "plain people" of the white South in blocking FEPC legislation. But there are broader issues also on which mere vague appeal to the "plain people" is apt to be ineffective. The farmer, for example, reacts much as does the businessman to price controls, higher minimum wages, better unemployment compensation. The farmer thinks in terms of his hired hand, and wants no legislation that will tend to raise wages. On price control he thinks as an individualistic producer and not as a consumer; the chance of getting more in a scramble for higher prices on what he sells means more to him than keeping steady the prices of the things he buys. As for full-employment legislation, the middle class and the employers are suspicious; the farmer is indifferent or instinctively hostile.

It will take a lot of grass-roots education and agitation to roll up enough popular pressure for these measures. There are "plain people" who can be mobilized. There are millions in the North who are against racial discrimination, but as yet much too vaguely to count politically. There is a consumer interest. There are farmers, as there are businessmen, capable of taking a broader view than narrow class interest. But somebody must care enough to ring their doorbells and grasp their coat lapels. Only the working class is wholeheartedly for these measures, and the P. A. C. is its only organization for grass-roots agitation. Without P. A. C. this program cannot be put over.

Unfortunately Mr. Truman's appeal for fact-finding and a cooling-off period not only is opposed by the big employers but has split labor from the Administration. Part of the reason lies in Mr. Truman's own gauche handling of labor leaders and of the General Motors strike. Part of it arises from the painful experiences labor underwent during the war waiting for the War Labor Board to find the facts in labor disputes before it. Labor fears bureaucratic delays and employer litigation of issues raised in fact-finding and sees no assurance of employer compliance even after the facts are found and the recommendations made. Labor leaders feel so deeply on this issue that Mr. Truman finds himself at loggerheads with the only group which can possibly put over his legislative program—the legislative program which may well mean the difference between defeat and victory in 1948. The President does have this slight comfort, that labor has every bit as much to gain as he does by a reconciliation. Sooner or later labor leaders must realize this, if indeed they have not already done so. For divided, neither the President nor the labor movement stands a chance in Congress.

It is not enough to appeal to the "plain people." It is necessary to lead them. There are millions of political ciphers who need to have brought home to them the meaning of race discrimination, price control, higher wage standards, full employment, millions who are neither employers nor racially biased. They cannot be reached by the kind of formal and bloodless indorsement Mr. Truman is accustomed to give on these issues. He not only shows no capacity to dramatize and illuminate these issues; he seems to understand them imperfectly himself. The White House has floundered on price control, housing, taxes, and wages in managing the executive branch of the government. It has been weak in dealing with the legislative branch on many of the bills the President now submits to the "plain people." Thus Mr. Truman failed miserably to support progressive elements in the House last month for a showdown fight on the full-employment issue. Many people have lost faith in him because he says the right thing but fails to do much about it.

Mr. Truman needs and deserves grass-roots support on his general program, but he also needs better advisers than the little clique of mediocre men who surround him. This is true in the case of housing; Mr. Truman's feeble rhetoric on this topic seemed to reflect a complete lack of any concrete program. It is especially true on labor, where again Mr. Truman seems to have failed to grasp the problem, much less to solve it. He believes that if the facts are found, "public opinion" will make itself felt "in a practical way." But facts are only a small part of the picture. The crucial questions come up in the sphere of policy, not fact. The level of wages must rise if we are to have full employment and make use of war-expanded productive capacity. There would be much less resistance to the wage increases if government were prepared, by leadership and planning, to insure the higher levels of economic activity which would make it easy to pay the higher wages. The framework of the problem is America's expanded capacity to produce, and it is in this framework alone that an economically sound and politically statesman-like program can be evolved. But who in the White House today thinks in such terms?

The Palestine Inquiry

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

BRITISH intentions in Palestine cannot be simplified to a pattern of unrepentant imperialism or disinterested generosity. They are complicated, often self-contradictory; affected by intrigues and promises and antagonisms long antedating the present difficulties. It is to be hoped that the members of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on Palestine beginning work this week in Washington will tackle their assignment with a live sense of history: otherwise the time spent will be total waste.

Even the committee is a product of mixed motives, but it was invented by the British principally as a device first, to delay the inevitable showdown in Palestine and, second, to involve the United States in whatever decision is ultimately arrived at. One cannot blame the British government for asking this country to hold one edge of a bag packed with TNT, especially since in the past we have offered so much free advice on the proper way of handling it; one can only say that the United States, in accepting this responsibility, should demonstrate a degree of courage and objectivity which the British government is obviously unable to attain. Our representatives on the Committee of Inquiry must not allow themselves to be stampeded into hasty decisions by the echo of exploding bombs in the streets of Jaffa or by rumors of Jewish plots opportunely launched by a British general operating off-bounds. Bombs and canards are ephemeral if nasty symptoms of a deep trouble. The job of the committee, and the absolute obligation of the American members, is to go to the roots of that trouble. Indeed, that is the only excuse for its existence in 1946.

I am not suggesting that the committee should confine itself to exhuming the past. What is going on in Europe today is an integral part of the study. For the chilling horrors of Nazi rule and their present backwash in Poland and Slovakia and in the detention camps of Germany provide dramatic evidence of the condition that brought Zionism into being and made the British promise of a Jewish National Home the focus of hope for oppressed Jews everywhere. That any Zionist organizations in Poland managed to survive the Nazi extermination policy and muster enough resources to give a little training and material help to Jews who want to go to Palestine—this seems to be the only factual basis of the "plot" revealed the other day by General Morgan—is one of the most encouraging and valiant manifestations of human resilience I have heard about. The Committee of Inquiry will be expected to look beyond the difficulties of relief agencies in Europe and examine the profound economic, political and emotional factors that make such "plots" inevitable. The committee will learn—I say this confidently on the basis of overwhelming evidence already reported—that a great majority of Europe's Jewish displaced persons want to go to Palestine. Its further duty is to find out why.

The work of the committee is sure to be hampered by the British government's weak and shifting maneuvers in regard to Palestine immigration. First it shut off, for the duration of the inquiry, even the trickle of immigration previously allowed. Then under pressure of violence in Palestine and indignation throughout the world, it requested the "Palestine Arab Higher Committee" to "permit" the "interim" admission of 1,500 Jewish refugees a month as "a humanitarian gesture." What sort of policy is this? Has the Mandate already been abrogated? Are the Arabs from now on to have the final say on Jewish immigration questions? If so, then certainly the committee can fold up and go home. If not, it had better demand that the British government make one more shift and rescind both previous moves in order that the inquiry may proceed in an atmosphere as free from suspicion and bitterness as circumstances permit. The granting of 1,500 certificates amounts to very little in practical terms; symbolically it is of great importance.

For it is linked with the whole process of British fumbling which must be reexamined by the Committee of Inquiry: the curious fluctuations of Foreign Office and Colonial Office policy, sometimes working together, sometimes one against the other, sometimes encouraging Jewish settlement as a bulwark of British interest in the Middle East, sometimes—and consistently as the war approached—shifting toward the support of Arab claims until the obligations to the Jews, assumed under the mandate, were completely and cynically abandoned in 1939. What caused Britain—and at what moment did it happen?—to decide that its position would be better secured if the French were forced out of Syria and the Jews restricted to a static minority in Palestine? What convinced it that an Arab League, run by fanatic if mutually suspicious Moslem leaders, would be a safer ally? Did the Tory government fear the leavening effect of Jewish enlightenment and social ferment in the vast lump of Arab misery and ignorance? The record opens an immense range of questions which the committee will have to answer if its conclusions are to be of use.

I suggest that its best course will be to ignore the ready-made conclusions provided by Mr. Bevin when the committee was announced. It can take as its premises the text of the Balfour Declaration, the provisions of the Palestine Mandate, the handful of official interpretations of those pledges put out of responsible British and American statesmen. With these as a starting-point it can consider what specific political arrangements in Palestine will best serve needs of all groups concerned. The Jewish National Home, in itself, is not an issue; even Bevin admitted that. The issues lie in the numbers of Jews to be admitted to Palestine; the rate at which they are to be allowed in; the kind of control that should be set up to insure the permanent development of Jewish institutions free from the danger of Arab attack, physical or political; the protection of Arab rights; and the adjustment of great-power interests to one another and to the interests of the people of the country.

This set of problems should be enough for the inquiry to solve. Since the United States has no commitments beyond its single reiterated pledge to support the Jewish commonwealth in Palestine, and no interests except a relatively modest amount of Arabian oil, the American members are in a position to exhibit a decency and humanity—a broad disinterestedness—which are seldom compatible with old, crusted political and material investment. We look confidently to them to do so.

Gangsters or Patriots?

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 5

ON DECEMBER 26 it became known in Jerusalem that the British government had reneged on its promise to grant 1,500 certificates a month to Jewish immigrants while an Anglo-American committee investigated the Palestine problem. On the following night there were explosions in British offices in Jaffa, Tel Aviv, and Jerusalem. The target in Jerusalem was the headquarters of the Criminal Investigation Division of the Palestine government. Deputy Inspector General Giles, who is detested by the Jewish community, narrowly escaped with his life. "This," he was quoted as saying by Gene Currivan, Jerusalem correspondent of the New York Times, "is the work of our friends, the Haganah." The remark had a fine detective-story flavor.

It also had the flavor of an attempt to smear the Haganah, the self-defense organization of Palestinian Jewry, and to identify it with irresponsible terrorist groups. Currivan lent himself to this effort. His dispatches described the Haganah as "vigilante" in origin and as "an underground gangster group . . . which prides itself on its conservative terrorism," whatever that is. This is typical of the unfair treatment the Jewish-owned New York Times has given both Palestinian and Polish Jewry in recent weeks. The British Colonial Office could have no more loyal journalistic ally. When a group of correspondents, recently in Palestine, including Frank Gervasi of Collier's, Gerald Frank, and myself, protested against Currivan's attempt to link the Haganah with terrorism, a curious kind of correction was elicited.

In its issue of January 4 the Times ran a Currivan dispatch from Jerusalem headed, "Two Zionist Groups Boast of Bombing. Claim for 'Credit' by Sternists and Irgun Zvai Leumi Gives Haganah Clean Bill of Health." The Irgun and the Sternists are not Zionists but offshoots of the Revisionist movement; that bit of distortion was added by the copy desk of the Times in writing the headline. Currivan wrote of a joint communiqué in which these two terrorist groups had boasted of the bombings. "If the communiqué can be accepted as actually emanating from these groups," Currivan grudgingly admitted, "it leaves Haganah in the clear and corroborates this third underground organization's recent protestations." The net effect of the slanderous headline and the obscure "correction" on the ordinary reader must have been to deepen the impression that Palestine was a place infested with Zionist gangsters.

What is the truth about the Haganah? The name is a Hebrew word meaning "defense." It was first applied to small groups formed in Russia after 1905 to defend Jews against pogromchiks. The idea was taken to Palestine by Russian Jewish immigrants before the First World War. There, as in the rest of the Ottoman Empire, law and order were rare. Bedouins raided one another and the Jewish settlements. The newer immigrants declared they had not come to Palestine to be at the mercy of hooligans again. They formed an organization called Hashomer—The Watchman. David Ben-Gurion, now chairman of the executive of the Jewish Agency, and Isaac Ben Zwi, now president of the Vaad Leumi, the Jewish National Council of Palestine, were in the initial group. This was the forerunner of the Haganah.

The Shomrim (members of Hashomer) were not vigilantes. They began as armed guards for the settlements and were recognized as such by the Turkish authorities. They pioneered the settling of wild country and sought, like the Cossacks, to establish agricultural-warrior colonies on the frontier. They became a kind of élite.

This conception of the Shomrim had dangers which became apparent toward the close of the First World War. It was feared that they might develop into an arrogant, policy-making armed faction able to impose its will on the community. A group of Shomrim led by the late Eliahu Golomb succeeded in bringing about the disbanding of the organization and the formation of the Haganah. The basic idea of the Haganah was that defense should not be in the hands of a picked few but that every able-bodied Jew should be trained in the use of arms and enrolled in the Haganah. Hashomer was an élite guard; Haganah was a democratic militia. The Shomrim under Golomb and returning veterans who had served in the Jewish Legion under Allenby formed the nucleus of the new organization.

The Haganah took on a more solid and systematic form after the massacres of 1929, when some two hundred Jews were killed in Hebron and Safad. The massacres occurred a few weeks after the British authorities had withdrawn all licenses for the possession of shotguns in Jewish settlements. Where the Jews had illegal arms, they successfully fought off attack. Where they had none, they were slaughtered. The Jewish community felt that it could no longer rely on the British authorities for protection and took steps to speed up training and the acquisition of illegal arms. The wisdom of that policy was demonstrated in the Arab rebellion from 1936 to 1939. There were attacks on Jewish settlements and Jews were killed, but even in the most isolated areas there were no pogroms, and there will be none unless the British succeed in smashing the Haganah.

During the Arab rebellion there was unofficial cooperation between the British authorities and the Haganah. Every British battalion had a Jewish "interpreter" whose real function was to act as liaison with the Haganah. Finally, rather than deal with an illegal organization, the British deputized some 16,000 Haganah members as "supernumerary police" and issued 6,000 rifles to them (more men than guns because they work in shifts). These rifles are still in use in Palestine. Service as a supernumerary policeman is taken into account in figuring what we would call demobilization "points" for Palestinian Jews in the British army. Thus the Haganah achieved a kind of backdoor recognition.

This unofficial cooperation was taken a step farther by a young British lieutenant in the Sudan Frontier Force who was transferred to intelligence duty in Palestine in 1936. His name was Charles Orde Wingate, and he was later to lose his life in Burma. Wingate's first raiders were the squads of Haganah-trained men he organized to protect the oil pipe-lines from Arab saboteurs. Wingate, a non-Jew, became a Zionist in Palestine, and though his views were frowned upon by his superiors they found themselves forced to adopt his tactics during the Second World War. In the gloomy months before El Alamein British headquarters in Cairo in unofficial conjunction with Haganah leaders prepared "post-occupation" plans for Palestine. Secret methods of communication were worked out to keep British authorities in touch with Jewish guerrilla forces if the Axis should succeed in taking Palestine. The Palestine civil administration was disapproving, and the Cairo military authorities would never admit they were dealing with the Haganah, but as one British officer said, "If you're dealing with a self-respecting young Jew you must take it for granted that he belongs to the Haganah."

The Irgun, the military arm of the Revisionists, are what the Shomrim might have become, quasi-fascist terrorists; they number some five or six thousand. The Sternists, who split off from the Irgun at the beginning of the war, number about five hundred men; they wanted to fight Britain by terror even though Britain was fighting Hitler. But the Haganah is the People's Army of Palestinian Jewry. It is prepared to fight the British authorities to bring in so-called illegal immigrants and to settle on forbidden land in defiance of the White Paper. It has embarked on a small-scale war of strictly limited objectives against British rule, and the Yishuv is prepared to back it up with a mass civil-disobedience campaign, Indian style. But the Haganah is not terrorist. It is not irresponsible. It is a disciplined military organization. Its leaders are bitterly critical of the Jerusalem bombings. These provide the British with an excuse for more stringent measures against illegal immigration and hurt Jewry with world opinion. The Haganah are no more gangsters than were the men of Concord or Lexington.

This Is Your Fight!

BY WALTER P. REUTHER

Vice-President of the U. A. W.-C. I. O. and director of its General Motors department

Detroit, January 3

IN THE confusion of peace, much of it carefully planned, we are in danger of losing the clear view of post-war needs which we had during the war. Administrative agencies, Congressional post-war planning committees, and business groups such as the Committee for Economic Development were generally agreed during the war that after the war we must produce and consume at least 50 per cent more than we did in pre-war days to avoid a return to chronic mass unemployment. They were agreed that a return to pre-war levels of production—and consumption—would mean nineteen million unemployed.

This conviction was expressed in the Department of Commerce study "Markets After the War," which became the bible of the C. E. D. It was reiterated by Senators James E. Murray and Harry S. Truman in the 1944 year-end report of their War Contracts Committee, in which they proposed a bill to insure full employment. Last July Fred Vinson, then Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion, put it this way: "We are in the pleasant predicament of having to learn to live 50 per cent better than we have ever lived before." In August, before V-J Day, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System published Post-War Economic Study No. 1, "Jobs, Production, and Living Standards," in which these statements were made:

We shall have an opportunity of living better than we ever have in the past, but only if we so manage our economy as to provide markets for a much larger total product than we have ever had in peace time.

Purchases of all classes of goods and services could and should expand greatly. A rise of 40 or 50 per cent above pre-war levels in consumption goods will be possible and necessary. This would mean that people would buy many more cars than they did during the 1930's, many more ice-boxes, and several times the amount of some other goods and services. . . . Resources will be available for this rise in national well-being, but it will require a well-planned and vigorous national public and private business policy to realize this unequaled opportunity.

We must not accept the miserable alternative of having our products piling up as surpluses for lack of markets and have their output shrink in consequence. We must not suffer our wealth to be the cause of our poverty, or permit the abundance of our resources to be the basis of our want. . . .

If there is to be a market for the goods and services that will be produced if employment is to be maintained, the nation's income must not be permitted to decline materially.

Four days after V-J Day President Truman announced the national reconversion wage-price policy: free collective bargaining between workers and employers was to be restored, and wage increases were to be approved up to the point where price increases would result.

On the same day, August 18, the United Automobile Workers of the C. I. O. filed with the General Motors Corporation a demand for a 30 per cent increase in hourly wage rates without price increases, asserting that this increase was needed to make up for the loss in take-home pay resulting from abolition of overtime and downgrading in jobs. We said that such an increase in wage rates was directly in the national interest as stated over and over again during the war, that it was in line with the national wage-price policy, that it was necessary to maintain purchasing power during reconversion. We pointed out that to make progress toward a standard of living 50 per cent better than we had ever known it was first necessary to hold our ground, to stay where we were, economically, when the war ended.

It seemed to us that the way to begin was to begin. It was only fair to call upon the General Motors Corporation, the most profitable corporation in the most profitable industry, to lead the way. We were convinced that past earnings, the certain market for capacity production for at least three years, and the lower unit costs of a volume 50 per cent above pre-war days made it possible for the automotive industry generally—and General Motors most conspicuously—to pay 30 per cent higher wage rates without increasing prices, and at the same time to pay dividends higher than the high pre-war rates.

However, our demand was never "30 per cent, or else!" as some editors, politicians, and propagandists have charged. From August 18 up to now we have offered to scale down our demand by whatever amount was proved necessary to prevent an increase in prices. But we said that until and unless G. M. proved it could not pay 30 per cent, we would not reduce our demand by one red cent.

On October 2 G. M. turned down our demand as "unreasonable." No counter-proposal was made.

In dismissing our demand as "unreasonable" and in arguing in page advertisements that higher wages meant higher costs and higher prices—suppressing the basic production fact that 50 per cent greater volume will mean lower unit costs—General Motors was, in our view, pleading inability to pay higher wage rates.

On October 19 we began presentation of an economic brief in support of our demand. We addressed ourselves to the question of G. M.'s ability to pay. We invited, urged, and begged the G. M. representatives to discuss our facts, figures, and arguments as presented. They refused. They said, "Go ahead, and when you're all through, we'll make our answer." We read our case to the soles of their shoes perched on the edge of the negotiating table, and to the back of Liberty, which they said was "more interesting than the crap you [the union] are giving us."

When our case was all in, on October 26, Harry Anderson, vice-president of G. M., said they would answer us in ten days. That was at five o'clock in the afternoon. Three hours later, on a nation-wide radio network, he gave G. M.'s answer—a flat rejection.

In the course of the so-called negotiations G. M. shifted its ground from inability to pay to a refusal to discuss the corporation's ability to pay. In our view the change was made because G. M. knows that the arithmetic of our case is taken from its own reports and published government sources, is confirmed by facts hidden in the corporation's books, and is incontrovertible. This was made plain when G. M. made its formal answer to our brief on November 7. G. M. offered the union a wage increase of 10 cents an hour—subsequently increased to 13½ cents—hitched to the right later to use the increase in applying to the OPA for higher prices. (When we asked if G. M. would offer even a 1 per cent wage increase without a price increase, the answer was no.) In addition, G. M. renewed its proposal that the union join the corporation in petitioning Congress to amend the wage-hour act to raise the normal work week from forty to forty-five hours.

The U. A. W.-C. I. O. could have settled this wage dispute long ago, without resort to a strike, if the General Motors workers had been willing to join the General Motors management in a double conspiracy—against American consumers clamoring for eighteen million cars, and against millions of returning veterans and laid-off war workers, including more than one hundred thousand former G. M. workers with seniority rights. We could have agreed to take a wage increase and have kept quiet about price increases which, spreading out from automobiles in spiraling inflation, would have taken fifteen cents or more out of one pocket for every dime put in the other in high wages. We could have joined the corporation in ganging up on Congress to legalize a longer normal work week at a time when unemployment of between six and nine million is predicted. We could have drawn down on the head of labor the whole blame for the rising pressures of inflation and its disastrous results. We could have focused on labor the justified resentment of millions of unemployed veterans and laid-off war workers. We could have drunk the cup of pure economic poison which the G. M. management poured out and enticingly set before us on the negotiating table day after day.

Instead, faced with the deliberate, contemptuous, and provocative refusal of G. M. to bargain collectively in good faith by discussing the ability to pay, and having vainly offered to submit the dispute to arbitration, the G. M. workers on November 21 went on strike to obtain the demands presented on August 18. The strike, with an appeal to the opinion and judgment of the American people, was their only remaining economic weapon.

Today, with the strike in its second month, and with the G. M. attitude being copied by other employers across the whole country, General Motors workers and their families are the front-line troops in a home-front war to win the very peace that, only five months ago, it was generally agreed we must have if the war aims of the Four Freedoms were to be more than a sour phrase on the lips of apple-selling veterans of World War II. On G. M. picket lines and in U. A. W.-C. I. O. union halls and soup kitchens in a hundred American towns and cities the eyes of G. M. strikers see the post-war needs of this nation as clearly now as when they were stated before V-J Day by our business and political leaders.

They are exercising the right of free collective bargaining. One of these days the G. M. management will agree to move the bargaining back from the picket lines to the conference room and to write a contract with the U. A. W.-C. I. O. which will maintain the purchasing power of G. M. and other workers, including the farmers and business men from whom those workers in years to come will buy more or less, depending on the wages they receive.

Until that day, the strike of the G. M. workers is the fight of all Americans who want a lasting peace of full production, full consumption, and full employment, year in and year out, spreading beyond the United States, by example, not by conquest, to the rest of this fevered and unhappy world.

The Union for Democratic Action will hold an open meeting to discuss the General Motors-Automobile Workers' dispute at the Hunter College Auditorium in New York on January 15 at 8 p. m. Mr. Reuther will speak.

Stamford Sticks Together

BY J. MITCHELL MORSE

Formerly on the editorial staff of The Nation

Stamford, Connecticut, December 3

WHAT the New York press had described in advance as a "general strike" that would "tie up" this city of 65,000 and make it a "ghost town" for an indefinite length of time turned out to be a two-hour parade and rally in front of the Town Hall. It was a demonstration, by some 10,000 members of 56 A. F. of L. and C. I. O. unions in Stamford and nearby towns, of solidarity with the 3,000 striking workers of the Yale and Towne lock company's local plant. One union official called it "an extended lunch-hour." As a demonstration it was a great success. There were two lusty brass bands and a kilted bagpiper; half a dozen union leaders made short, fiery pep talks; and the 10,000 cheered and laughed and sang. The atmosphere was more like that of a carnival than of an industrial battle. When I arrived in Stamford at 7:30 this morning men in overalls and leather coats and hunting caps and women in slacks and leather coats and kerchiefs, carrying lunchboxes and thermos bottles, were going to work as usual; the demonstration began at noon; by 2:30 it was all over, and most of the workers went back to their jobs. The movies opened at 3.

The immediate cause of the demonstration was Governor Baldwin's sending state troopers to break up the picket line around the Yale and Towne plant a week ago, but there were two other more fundamental causes. One was a feeling among the workers which was put into words this morning by Donald Martin, chief steward of Lodge 1887, International Association of Machinists, A. F. of L., a brass-cutter at the Schick razor plant here. "The people in little locals like ours," he told me, "know that if Yale and Towne licks the union we're all sunk." The other cause was an intense personal hatred of W. Gibson Carey, Jr., president of Yale and Towne, not only by his employees and labor generally but by everyone I spoke to in Stamford. A business man in a restaurant looked up from his copy of the New York Daily News, saw me watching him, smiled, and said, without preliminaries, "Christ, they can do a lot of damage. You know what I mean, like if they cut off the electricity, see? Jeez, I wish they'd get it settled. It don't affect me, but hell, I like to see things settled. You got to admit, though, Carey is a son of a bitch." That last sentiment was echoed in one form and another all day. The chief complaints against Carey seem to be that he has kept other industries out of Stamford and that in the past, when he employed more than 50 per cent of the population, he ran the city as if it were a department of his plant. About half the stores have in their windows signs that read, "We are in the fight with you workers of Yale and Towne."

The state troopers returned today to guard the plant as negotiations were resumed, at Governor Baldwin's behest, between management and Lodges 339 and 1557 of the International Association of Machinists. Connecticut has only 150 troopers; 15 of them were outside the plant this morning, rather shamefacedly watching the half-dozen middle-aged men and women strikers standing around a little charcoal stove at each gate. There was no effort to keep anyone from going into the plant, but the only people inside were a few foremen and superintendents playing cards in their overcoats. They didn't seem to be enjoying themselves very much. They greeted me with glum resentment. It was colder in the plant than outside.

During the recess in the negotiations I went with two shop stewards to the home of one of the striking workers. He has nine children, aged fifteen years to fifteen months, and a tenth is on the way, and he hasn't worked for nine weeks. The union strike-benefit fund pays him $10 a week, and now and then he gets an odd job and makes a couple of dollars. He has no other income. He is a skilled tool-setter, whose basic pay was $1.245 an hour. During the war he worked sixty hours a week and earned about $85, but various deductions cut it down to $72. Since the war, for a forty-hour week his take-home pay had been $38.

The negotiations were held in public, in the city courtroom. That was management's idea. Jerome Y. Sturm, attorney for the union, had protested that the presence of an audience would not conduce to candor on either side and would hinder the reaching of a settlement. Having lost this point, however, he made the best of the situation. He made much better of it than Weldon P. Monson, the company's attorney.

The essential points at issue were, as Sturm said, money and union security. The union asked a 30 per cent increase in basic wage rates and a general increase of 17 cents an hour to offset partially the post-war decline in take-home pay; a two-week annual vacation after five years' service; six holidays a year; a closed shop and a maintenance-of-membership clause. Sturm announced a willingness to compromise on all points, but Monson flatly rejected everything but the wage increase. On that he made a counter-proposal: basic wage rates would remain unchanged, but if employees worked forty-five hours a week the company would see that they got a 14 per cent increase in take-home pay. He admitted under persistent questioning that the company couldn't guarantee forty-five or even forty hours a week. Sturm rejected the counter-proposal. "You knew it would be unacceptable," he said. "The company doesn't want to reach an agreement. You're just a stooge. Carey is trying to starve the workers out. He is acting as the spearhead of a group here who think this is a propitious time to break unions."

Monson took up more than half of the morning session with a rambling history of the negotiations since 1940. He looked at Sturm most of the time, but Sturm presented his left profile and looked bored. Everybody was bored. Mayor Charles E. Moore was moved to say to Monson, "You're making a summation. When are you going to start negotiating?"

"You've been intimidated by the union," Monson blandly replied.

"The only people who have tried to intimidate me," shouted the Mayor, "are Yale and Towne, because I wouldn't send police to crack skulls on the picket line. But I've stood right up and said, 'To hell with you!'" There was a roaring cheer, and a few minutes later the first brass band passed beneath the windows.

At the afternoon session Monson was flanked by two company accountants bearing charts which they held up before the audience but which were too small and too faintly drawn to read. They didn't help Monson. Nothing could have saved him from Sturm's magnificent attack. He could not answer Sturm's questions, and his own were so silly that the audience laughed at him almost continuously. He grew red and flustered. It is almost incredible that the legal representative of a large corporation should be so slow on the uptake. Sturm beat his ears off.

Nevertheless, the result was a victory for the company, for no agreement was reached. It was obvious that that was Monson's purpose. With his arguments all blown up and with a horribly embarrassed expression on his face, he still said "No" to everything. He floundered miserably, smiled sheepishly, and said "No." He seemed not to have been authorized to say anything else.

However, his argument read smoothly enough in this afternoon's Stamford Advocate. The direct quotations were excerpts from an advance press release written and handed out by Milton M. Enzer, the company's public-relations man, who is said to make $300 a week. I don't doubt that he is worth it. He writes well.

An effort to salvage the situation was made by William Gaston, a conciliator of the United States Department of Labor, who announced that he had a compromise plan and would like to discuss it privately with representatives of both sides. "If the company rejects it, it will be because they want to bust the union," he said. The company rejected it.

Philippine Aftermath

BY MILDRED ADAMS

Journalist and critic; until recently head of the Post-War Division of the Columbia Broadcasting System

I. The Menace of Freedom

PAUL McNUTT, who resigned as High Commissioner to the Philippines in 1939, has gone back there. He has returned to a situation several diameters worse than the one he left—and his final report to President Roosevelt revealed plenty of trouble even then. The problems he listed have not been solved in the interim. Instead, they have been vastly complicated by the physical destruction and the social disintegration caused by war and enemy occupation. When he left, he saw ahead a cushion of seven years—in which progress might be made, with American help—before the Filipinos would be left to carry their own burdens. Now he sees only six months.

Just how serious Washington considers the immediate situation can be surmised from the carefully worded analysis introducing President Truman's directives. Reference is made to the agrarian unrest which has been described in previous Nation columns:

In the provinces near Manila thousands of share-croppers organized some years ago to demand a more equitable division of the product of their labor. For several years there was no effective solution of the problem. During the war the tenants organized a guerrilla army which reportedly did good work against the enemy. After the enemy was defeated in their localities, they did not disband, and today they constitute a special problem which threatens the stability of government. On the other hand [the President cautions], their legitimate claim to fair treatment and the assistance they rendered in resistance to the enemy require that they not be dealt with in a ruthless manner.

The President wants more speed in the investigation, trial, and punishment of collaborators, for "disloyalty to the Commonwealth is equally disloyalty to the United States." Therefore he informs the Attorney General:

While the mass of the Filipino people and many of their leaders remained staunchly loyal during invasion and rendered invaluable assistance to our arms, it is necessary to admit that many persons served the puppet government sponsored by the enemy. . . . Reports have appeared in the press which indicate that a number of persons who gave aid and comfort to the enemy are now holding important offices in the Commonwealth government. Reports further indicate that the Commonwealth government is only beginning to investigate, charge, and try the offenders. It is essential that this task be completed before the holding of the next Commonwealth general election.

Law-enforcement agencies are seriously disorganized, and the famous Philippine constabulary needs help in reforming its ranks and rebuilding its morale. Emergency American currency is further upsetting the disorganized economy and must be redeemed as soon as possible. The Japanese occupation peso, declared not legal tender at the time we landed on Leyte, continued to be used in certain sections, and many contracts depend on its declining value. (In numerous instances, though President Truman does not say so, this worthless currency was used for land purchases, and agrarian unrest is intensified by the fact that the deeds are now thrown into question.) There is a tremendous relief and rehabilitation problem. Ships are needed, and banking aid, and a regular flow of consumer goods. The chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been requested "to direct the United States Commercial Company to use resources and personnel within its jurisdiction to continue and to advance the Philippine program which it has undertaken, and, where necessary, to sell goods on credit terms not exceeding two years in duration."

The program of assistance invokes the aid of the Secretaries of War and the Treasury, the High Commissioner to the Philippines, the Alien Property Custodian, the Attorney General, the Surplus Property Administrator, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, the president of the Export-Import Bank, the Administrator of War Shipping, and the chairman of the RFC. It paints the situation as so grave that it could hardly be straightened out before the islands are scheduled to assume the entire burden of their own support and governing. Yet the only hint it gives that the all-important time element might be stretched is contained in two paragraphs, one addressed to the chairman of the RFC, which is quoted above, and another on the subject of enemy property, which says, "Should these operations extend beyond the date of independence, I shall endeavor to arrange by treaty or otherwise for the completion of the processes of vesting and liquidation."

What "otherwise" might mean is not explained, but it should be noted that the Presidential directives set in motion machinery of a kind and a size that can get under way in six months but cannot conceivably finish its formidable tasks in that short time. What, then, are the probabilities? Will independence be granted on schedule, regardless of the condition of the islands? Or will it be postponed, on request from Washington or Manila, until the American program of assistance has had time to function adequately?

It will be remembered that when war broke out, the High Commissioner was Francis Sayre. Between his resignation in February, 1942, and the appointment of McNutt in the fall of 1945 the Secretary of the Interior watched over the Philippines as best he could in the absence of communications. The executive order accompanying Mr. McNutt's appointment specifically stated that the High Commissioner in the Philippine Islands and the Secretary of the Interior in the United States "shall be responsible for the representation, administration, and coordination of the authority and policies of the United States government in respect to the Philippine Islands."

In the Senate the guardian of Philippine affairs is Millard Tydings, author of the Tydings-MacDuffie act of 1934 and chairman of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs. In the House it is C. Jasper Bell of Missouri. Both these gentlemen are members—Mr. Tydings is chairman—of the Filipino Rehabilitation Commission which was appointed by Congress in the summer of 1944 and, so far as can be ascertained, has been slumbering ever since.

High Commissioner McNutt has not talked about Philippine independence since his new appointment, but he did make speeches when he was High Commissioner in the late 1930's. His general attitude may be guessed by rereading a speech he made in March of 1938 before the Chicago Economic Club, in which he severely criticized certain features of the Tydings-MacDuffie act. In his final report to the President he went even farther.

The uncertainty and artificiality which still feature Philippine economy and finance [he said], together with the admitted impossibility of national defense and the troublesome international situation, are being daily more and more realized by Filipinos and Americans and foreigners resident in the Philippines. Doubt is growing as to the desirability of either economic or political independence. In view of the growing general realization in the Philippines of the serious economic, financial, and international consequences which may result from independence, it is recommended that both the government of the United States and that of the Commonwealth support and carry through a reexamination of every phase of the question. (The italics are Mr. McNutt's.)

No such reexamination was held. Instead, the "international consequences" arrived ahead of independence. Whether or not Mr. McNutt has changed his mind one does not know, but the logic of events would not so suggest.

Mr. Tydings holds very different views. As author of the act which promised the Filipinos independence in 1946, he has a vested interest in seeing that promise fulfilled. He visited the islands last May as head of a Presidential mission, and his report to Congress painted a dark picture.

It is a picture of centuries of effort, building, and development which have been destroyed and wiped out before the relentless conflict of war. . . . Tens of thousands are without clothing, food, and medicine. . . . It is impossible, except through the limited supply of army goods, to buy any of the necessities of life in the Philippines. . . . Not a bank in the island is open. . . . It will take at least two years, probably three, to even revive the sugar industry. . . . Much machinery was shipped to Japan. . . . The food situation in the Philippines is tragic. . . . Most bridges are destroyed. . . . 15 per cent of all the buildings in the islands have been destroyed.

But this black picture in no way changed his basic stand. In the same report he said firmly, "I look upon independence as a settled issue. . . . The event of Filipino independence on or before July 4, 1946, is as certain as anything can be."

The Senator is not wholly insensitive to the question of how a people so beset by trouble can carry out the obligations of independence. His first idea was that the United States should grant a hundred million dollars for rehabilitation and relief in the Philippines, the spending to be done by us. Since then he has introduced four bills: one provides that war damages shall be paid both by the Japanese and by the American liberators; one would turn over to the Philippine government certain funds which have been accumulated from excise taxes and held in our Treasury; one would transfer certain Japanese properties to the Philippine government;

Drawing by B. Haydon

Paul McNutt

one is a trade-relations act which would raise tariff barriers slowly over a period of twenty years instead of slapping them on the moment independence is granted.

Representative Bell was invited to introduce a similar trade bill in the House. Instead, he came forward with a bill providing for twenty years of free trade between the Philippines and the United States to cushion the shock of economic independence, which is the price of political independence. Obviously, a country which in the last year before the war carried on 80 per cent of its trade with a single nation, as did the Philippine Commonwealth with the United States, cannot endure the sudden imposition of tariff barriers and keep its balance. The offer of twenty years of free trade may prove to be one of the devices which will make it possible for the Filipinos to have independence without immediate starvation.

The physical confusion in Manila has its parallel in the political confusion. Independence is of course a cause to which all parties pay tribute. Sergio Osmeña, the aging and enfeebled friend of the United States who succeeded to the Presidency after Quezon died, spent the war years in the United States and suffers the handicaps of every official who functioned in exile. Among his competitors for power are men who worked with the Japanese and men who worked against them. In the first group are Senate President Manuel Roxas, known before the war as the coming strong man of the islands—he is staunchly defended as a patriot by many persons, including General MacArthur, but is attacked with equal vigor by the resistance leaders—and Jorge Vargas, head of the Supreme Court. The other group includes Tomas Confesor and Tomas Kabili, who worked with the guerrillas for many years—both men were appointed by Osmeña to his post-liberation Cabinet and turned down by the Philippine Senate—and Alejandro Castro and Louis Taruk, leaders of the Hukbalahap (People's Anti-Japanese Army), who made their influence felt first in the field and then in the capital.

Bit by bit the problem is becoming one of balancing political expediency against economic realism. It is generally believed that independence will have to be granted on schedule for a number of reasons. No Filipino leader has yet risked his political career by advocating its postponement, though there is a rumor that Manuel Roxas favors dominion status for the islands after the form of independence has been granted. No American leader has explained to the satisfaction of Congress just how and why independence for the Filipinos might be thought to have gone sour. No American spokesman in international affairs has figured out a way to explain convincingly to the rest of the world that the magnanimous gesture we so loudly advertise when we reprove other nations for their colonial policies is not opportune at the moment.

[This is the first instalment of an analysis of the Philippine problem by Miss Adams.]

What's Behind the Attack on the Co-ops

BY PAUL GREER

A staff writer on the St. Louis Post-Dispatch

THE success of the Rochdale plan of cooperation, by which savings accumulated by self-service are credited to member patrons, has created a new political issue: Shall the earnings of cooperatives be taxed just like corporate profits? The movement of co-ops into those economic fields where wide margins of profit have tended to reduce consumer purchasing power runs counter to the interests of both native monopolies and international cartels. Private enterprise, therefore, has long been trying to apply a brake to their progress. Now Congress, seeking new sources of federal revenue, is reported to be exploring the possibilities of taxing the co-ops, influenced perhaps by the recent recommendation of a Royal Commission to the Canadian government that cooperatives in the Dominion be subjected to income and excess-profits taxes. According to the New York Times of January 2, Congress expects to take up the question soon after it reconvenes next week.

This is no village feud along Main Street. In the petroleum field, for instance, 1,500 cooperative service stations have been established in the United States, and one-fifth of all gasoline and oil used on farms is supplied cooperatively. Behind this service are eleven cooperatively owned refineries, with their own oil wells, pipe lines, river barges, railway tank cars, and trucks. Formation of an international cooperative petroleum association was approved in principle at a meeting of the International Cooperative Alliance held in London in September of last year. The idea originated with Howard A. Cowden, president of the Consumers' Cooperative Association of Kansas City. With him on a committee to work out details are executives of the Swedish, Scottish, English, and French co-ops. Though the demand for tractor fuel in Europe is bound to increase, few members of the great English and Scottish movements have automobiles, and Cowden has therefore advised the cooperatives to work for lower-priced motor cars, reduced taxes on horse-power, and cheaper gasoline.

In one year co-ops in the United States have increased their business 20 per cent, with savings at the rate of $200,000,000. This accumulation of savings has been used to establish other instruments of mutual aid. Indiana farmers have bought into a coal mine. Miners at Dillonvale, Ohio, have established their own packing plant, in addition to a chain of stores and a community hall, complete even to a tap room. All kinds of businesses are run cooperatively—saw mills, feed mills, fertilizer works; plants producing everything from cosmetics, fly spray, and paint to milking machines and tractors; canneries, hospitals, undertaking establishments, power plants, insurance mutuals, and even banks.

Instead of selling at cost, consumer co-ops usually charge their members current prices, crediting the overcharge for annual refund. In Scotland the charge for many items is greater than in stores operated for private profit, and the system of refunds works as a savings bank. In America the overcharges are often placed in a five-year revolving fund, which means that the member reinvests or pyramids his savings for the expansion of services. Thus the movement has pushed out rapidly from distribution into production.

Ultimately consumers pay for every factory and processing plant that supplies them with goods. Only in the case of cooperative enterprises do they obtain title. This fact and the turnover of more than four billion dollars a year attained by cooperatives explain the intensive propaganda campaign being carried on by private enterprise to tax co-op earnings. The opposite view has been expressed by the St. Paul Pioneer Press, published in a center of cooperative activity. "These cooperatives, their services and the genius of their leaders, will be highly important assets in coping with the peace-time economic problems that lie ahead," an editorial in the Pioneer Press said recently. "Public policies affecting these cooperatives should not be shaped by Minneapolis grain traders with private axes to grind. The people of this country, if they have the facts, will not stand for crippling the cooperative movement through the proposed tax device." The indignant response from the president of the National Tax Equality Association, Ben C. McCabe, himself a big grain operator, was chiefly remarkable for its admissions: "The cooperative form of business," it said, "enjoys two inherent advantages over private business, advantages that cannot be taken away by any change of laws. They are customer ownership and the division of profits on the basis of patronage rather than primarily on money invested."

With the avowed object of plugging the tax leak the N. T. E. A. pushed a bill through Congress to compel cooperatives, and labor unions as well, to make annual financial reports to the Treasury Department. The results have not yet been made public; in the meantime cooperative leaders are stressing the vast difference between savings dollars and income dollars, or profits. Their view is that nothing short of an amendment to the Constitution would permit taxation of patronage refunds, which represent simply overcharges. If cooperatives were to adopt the price policy of performing their various services without margin, on a cost basis, there certainly would be no funds to tax.

A discussion of the subject prepared by the American Historical Association for the G. I. Round Table of the United States Armed Forces Institute ran as follows:

The statement is often made that cooperatives do not pay their full share of taxes. What is the situation? . . . Cooperative associations do pay the same property taxes that similar business organizations are required to pay on buildings and plants which they own. But farmers' marketing and purchasing cooperatives that meet conditions prescribed by Congress are exempt from federal income taxes. Moreover, the Bureau of Internal Revenue has permitted cooperatives which are not entitled to exemption as agricultural cooperatives to subtract from their total income the amount they pay out in patronage refunds and to figure their income tax on the remainder. Many states exempt farmers' cooperatives from state income taxes also.

In the case of consumers' cooperatives, the Bureau of Internal Revenue looks upon patronage refunds as rebates upon the business transacted with members rather than as true income of the association. If a commercial business obligated itself to return its profits to its customers, it could also deduct such refunds in figuring out its taxable income.

The advantage enjoyed by farmer-owned cooperatives over profit business in general, and even over urban consumer cooperatives, derives from Section 101 (12) of the Internal Revenue code. As a form of farm relief this section provides that rural marketing and supply associations are exempt from federal income taxation as long as they pay a fixed and reasonable rate of dividend on their stock, do at least half of their business with members, and in the case of purchasing agencies do at least 85 per cent of their business with farmers as distinguished from town residents. Farm co-ops pay no tax on share capital, on interest declared on it, or on surplus reserve or members' equity reserve. They are able to obtain federal credit at reasonable rates, are not taxed on patronage refunds, and do not even have to buy documentary stamps.

Business men, especially retailers, have been warned by the N. T. E. A. to "keep their eyes open for any attempt to induce Congress to give consumer cooperation special privileges like those of farmer cooperatives." As a matter of fact, non-farmer cooperatives, which are growing very rapidly, have never sought special consideration. They are taxed on share capital and on income and have no standing with the Farm Credit Administration's Banks for Cooperatives. They must put documentary stamps on share certificates, on their transfer, and on certificates of indebtedness and of sales of real estate. Their patronage refunds, however, are not taxed.

In spite of this disparity, the largely urban consumer movement has supported the farm organizations, perhaps feeling that if the outpost should be taken, the whole line might fall. Old-fashioned farm leaders, while welcoming this support, have not been entirely easy over the celerity with which members of labor unions have taken to cooperatives as a means of holding down living expenses.

As things now stand, farm co-ops would lose their tax and loan position if they did not restrict their urban patronage to 15 per cent. Should the N. T. E. A. obtain the repeal of this entire provision, the last trade barrier between farm and town would be removed. American cooperatives might then experience an expansion surpassing the movement in Great Britain or Scandinavia.

In the meantime something is happening to the cooperative theory of political neutrality. (Adherence to this principle in certain parts of occupied Europe led the public to associate some co-ops with collaboration instead of the resistance movement.) In the Labor landslide in England twenty-three candidates wearing the label of the Cooperative Party were elected to Parliament. The present Cabinet includes Alfred Barnes, who has been head of the Cooperative Party for twenty-one years, as Minister of Transport, and A. V. Alexander, a top man in the movement, as First Lord of the Admiralty. In Minnesota Representative Knutson is facing some political opposition caused by his anti-co-op stand, and all over the United States members of cooperatives, in cities as well as on farms, are taking the measure of their representatives in Washington, where the war between monopoly and cooperation will be decided.

The Far North: International Frontier

BY D. M. LEBOURDAIS

A Canadian newspaperman specializing in economic subjects, Mr. Lebourdaïs was correspondent for the North American Newspaper Alliance on an expedition to Wrangell Island. He is the author of "Northward: On the New Frontier."

A WORLD war was fought and millions of lives were blighted or destroyed—chiefly for the possession of land. Yet there is on this continent a region of tremendous future importance which is still virtually undeveloped. Its rocks contain gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc, uranium, and many other minerals more valuable than the dream riches of El Dorado. It could produce enough oil to keep all the motor cars in the world running for two hundred years. On its grasslands meat animals can graze the year round. Its arable lands, if put in crop, could feed Europe's starving millions. It is drained by a river system comparable to that of the Mississippi, the Amazon, or the Nile. And in addition it is a bridgehead on the road to Asia.

This fabulous region comprises the Canadian North and Alaska, which are really a geographical unit. Little is known about it, and what most people think they know is usually wrong. They think of it as a frigid wasteland, but it is neither wasteland nor frigid. While a large part of it may not be suited to agriculture, the proportion is no greater than in many countries—Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, for instance—where sturdy peoples have been able to reach a high state of comfort and culture. The winters of course are cold and long, but the amount of summer sunshine is much greater than farther south, and the winter cold is often exaggerated. Many places in the northern states and the settled zone of Canada are quite as cold.

Now that the Canadian North is known to be the most important source of uranium, raw material of the atomic bomb, the whole territory takes on added importance, and its development becomes a matter of high political interest. However, it is quite possible that neither uranium with its destructive potentialities nor radium with its curative qualities will be looked upon as the area's most valuable asset. Its real worth for the whole northern half of the world may lie in the fact that the Mackenzie-Yukon region of Canada and Alaska is a land bridge to Asia. Only in the North do the continents nearly meet. Cape Prince of Wales, Alaska, the westernmost point of North America, is within sight of East Cape, Siberia, the easternmost point of Asia. Nome, Alaska, a short distance south of Cape Prince of Wales, is farther west of Seattle than Seattle is west of New York. It is halfway to China. This is easily seen if one looks at a globe rather than at a map on Mercator's projection.

The airplane has set these northern lands in the center of the world today. All the shortest air routes between important points in America on the one hand and Europe and Asia on the other are over the Far North. And the only possible route for land travel between America and Asia is also found in the North. A tunnel may well be dug under Bering Strait some day; it need not be more than fifty or sixty miles long. Of course before a tunnel could be built, an agreement would have to be concluded with the Soviet Union, and before a tunnel could be of much value, a railway would have to be built connecting it with the settled portion of North America. The latter would require the co-operation of Canada and the United States.

The present Alaska Highway, built as a war measure, brings motor traffic to within 500 miles of Bering Strait. Parallel to the highway is a line of airfields over which planes were flown to the Soviet Union during the war. In a sense, therefore, it may be said that this peninsula stretching out to the Northwest is already the highway to Asia.

But although the Alaska Highway and the parallel line of airfields are already well established, the most suitable route for air, land, and water traffic is through the Mackenzie and Yukon valleys. The Mackenzie and Yukon together provide an almost continuous water route—it is interrupted by but one short, low-altitude stretch of land—from the present end of steel in northern Alberta to Bering Sea. The Mackenzie, including its tributaries and lake system, is 2,514 miles long. About 300 miles from where it flows into the Arctic Ocean, separated from it by low passes, a tributary of the Yukon begins and flows in a generally westerly direction to Bering Sea. The route chosen for the Alaska Highway, through tortuous canyons and over high mountains only a few miles west of the easy-grade Mackenzie-Yukon route, was a costly error which can scarcely be justified even by military necessity. Now that the highway has been built, it may help in the development of the adjacent country, but if the opening of the North is to proceed as it should, the use of the Mackenzie-Yukon water route must not be long delayed. After the initial error was made it was necessary to lay a pipe line across mountain ranges to provide oil for trucks and planes on the way to Alaska and Siberia. If highway and airfields had been built down the Mackenzie and Yukon in the first place, the oil would have been exactly where it was needed; and the $134,000,000 Canol project would have been unnecessary.

Modern civilization is built on transport, minerals, and power resources—in addition, of course, to food. The northern two-thirds of Canada east of the Rockies, known as the Canadian Shield, is one of the world's richest mineral storehouses. At Yellowknife on Great Slave Lake, 700 miles from the nearest large center, a gold camp is mushrooming in typical gold-rush fashion. Some of the largest mining companies on the continent have been unobtrusively drilling and developing there since before the war, with spectacular results. Farther north, on Great Bear Lake near the Arctic Circle, are the world's greatest deposits of radium- and uranium-bearing ore. The Canadian government has already taken control of these deposits for the public benefit.

Although gold is found in large or small quantities almost everywhere in Alaska, it is not so important to the Alaskan economy as fish or timber; and it would not be surprising if some day coal and copper proved more valuable—to say nothing of petroleum. Northern Alaska and the Mackenzie valley—with Siberia on the opposite side of the Arctic—constitute one of the world's outstanding oil-concentration areas. Because so little drilling has as yet been done, geologists are not able to say what place among the world's four greatest oil regions the Arctic will take, but they are certain that it is among the first four. A tract of 30,000 square miles has been set aside in Alaska for the exclusive use of the United States Navy, but so far nothing has been done to develop it.

How are these northern lands fixed for food? Taking the whole region into consideration, one may say that it can provide much more food than it will ever require for its people, no matter how populous it may become. It is potentially one of the world's greatest meat-producing areas. The grasslands of northern Canada and Alaska are exceeded in extent only by the steppes of Siberia. If a Texas or Alberta cattleman were to be transported magically to the Far North and to awaken on the Arctic tundra in midsummer, he would go mad with joy, for he would see grass such as he had never dreamed of. There would be a catch, however: the grass would be useless for cattle since cattle must be housed and fed in winter, and this would be too expensive. But these grasslands already support such grazing meat animals as the caribou and the musk ox, for which no one needs to cut hay or build barns.

After the Dominion of Canada was formed in 1867, the most pressing problem facing the Canadians was the settlement of the West. It was solved by the offer of free land, which attracted settlers from every country in Europe as well as from the older parts of the United States. The opening up of the North is a very different matter. Sporadic individual efforts would surely fail. So far as Alaska and that section of Canada which is part of the natural bridgehead are concerned, it should be undertaken as an international project. We should forget the boundary line and put the whole region in the hands of a joint commission having full power to proceed.

Surely with the disastrous consequences of economic imperialism in evidence all over the world, it should be possible for us to evolve a plan by which the vast wealth of this favored region might be conserved for the common good. The need for uranium control should point the way; the wasteful manner in which oil resources everywhere have been exploited should furnish an additional incentive. When it was a matter of dislodging the Japanese from the Aleutians, no question of national sovereignty was allowed to stand in the way of the United States building the Alaska Highway through Canadian territory. And when oil was needed for trucks and planes bound for Alaska and beyond, the United States government did not hesitate to drill wells in Canada or to pipe oil from one point in Canada to another. Now that the war is over, the two countries should not withdraw behind their own borders and cut cooperation to a minimum. The wealth of the North could justly form the nucleus of a peace-time Lend-Lease. A further and yet more courageous experiment in international collaboration should be inaugurated.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Human Needs and Human Nature

I HAVE been shopping with a friend just discharged from the army. He needed to stock up on shirts, socks, ties, gloves, and so forth, but he wasn't able to make much headway. In fact, the net result of our expedition was that I returned with one shirt—the store had a few in my size but none in his—while he was empty-handed! It wasn't because he was unduly choosy but because there was very little to choose from without going into the fancy price ranges. There were plenty of swagger sports shirts at $6 and upward but nothing suitable for a G. I. who wanted to get back to work as soon as possible and meanwhile had to make his muster-out pay stretch a long way.

Millions of veterans have been sharing this experience, and of course every housewife knows what a headache shopping has become. The Christmas season was a fine time for the stores; they did a record business and were able to unload most of their stocks of Ersatz, with great benefit to their balance sheets, for the customers were in a buying mood and if they couldn't get what they wanted took expensive or sleazy substitutes. But in spite of their open-handedness the customers were not satisfied; so far as their relations with the retailers were concerned it tended to be a season of ill-will.

What is the reason for the current shortage of goods, and how can it be overcome? How are we to get a volume of production which will match the tremendous pent-up buying power that is now manifest? The answer of the National Manufacturers' Association is simple: Release all controls, abolish all price ceilings, and give business its head. Free the boys from red tape, offer them the incentive of increased profits, and production will roll forward in a mighty flood.

Well, Congress recently added very considerably to business incentives by ending the excess-profits tax, and the result seems to have been to dam the flood rather than add to the flow. The knowledge that business transacted after January 1 would not be subject to this levy appears to have induced a great many firms to hold back either on production or sales during the last two months. This fact has, of course, been indignantly denied, but there is a good deal of evidence to support it. As early as November 13 Raymond Moley reported in the Wall Street Journal complaints "that something very like a strike is going on among the manufacturers of cotton goods." This did not appear at all remarkable to Mr. Moley, who pointed out that it was "only human" for a manufacturer in the excess-profits bracket to defer sales he could be sure of making after the beginning of the new year.

The United States News, a very conservative periodical, has been equally frank. In its December 14 issue it declared that "tax-law changes have been a factor" in the lag in production. "Some kinds of goods," it added, "should begin to come to market early in 1946, when taxes will take 38 per cent, not 80 per cent, of profits for many producers and distributors. It has paid to board" (my italics).

Shortages in the textile field have been particularly severe, and it is worth noting that the textile industry is one of the chief beneficiaries of tax relief. As the following table shows, textile manufacturers have been making excess-profits payments equal to two to five times their final net profits, which, nevertheless, have represented a handsome return on capital.

	1944 Excess- Profits Tax	1944 Net Profit
American Woolen Co.	$25,540,000	$5,294,909
Arlington Mills	2,119,000	596,832
Merrimack Mfg. Co.	832,000	244,861
Pacific Mills	7,850,000	1,871,609
West Point Mfg. Co.*	3,352,500	1,714,273

* Year ended Aug. 31, 1944.

If costs, prices, and volume of business remain the same in 1946, earnings would be equal to the sum of these two columns. Of course there will be some changes in these factors, but they may tend to cancel out. For instance, wages will almost certainly go up if only to attract enough labor to keep up with demand. But with additional labor a larger volume should be possible. As to textile prices, there is not the slightest probability that they will be reduced this year. For while it is true that in a sellers' market corporation taxes are to a large extent passed on to consumers, a reduction in taxes does not mean cheaper goods as long as supply is unequal to demand. Consequently, for many industries, including textiles, abolition of the excess-profits tax means a tremendous windfall that ought to end all the clamor about profits being insufficient to induce production.

Nevertheless, I expect that clamor to continue, since it is also true that under present price controls business is being prevented from charging all that the traffic will bear, and nothing less will satisfy it. But it doesn't follow that if the OPA were ended and the free market reestablished goods would suddenly become plentiful. For the sharp upward movement of prices which would certainly follow would encourage hoarding in anticipation of further increases. Manufacturers would scramble to build up their inventories of materials, wholesalers to fill their warehouses, retailers to stock their shelves, while the panic-stricken consumer, who in a race like this always gets the worst of it, would buy whatever he could lay hands on. Yet the Wall Street Journal in a recent editorial declared that there was absolutely no need for an OPA to protect consumers since consumers could always protect themselves by ceasing to buy. So they can, in theory, but it is a theory much more comforting to a financial editor with a well-furnished apartment and an amply stocked clothes closet than to a veteran seeking to establish a home. His demands are not postponable, and for him inflation means the rapid exhaustion of his savings.

Henry Hazlitt, another champion of the free-market cure for scarcity, writing in the New York Times on December 17, complained that price controls prevented "trustworthy comparisons of relative shortages" and thus were an obstacle to the concentration of productive facilities at "the points where they were most needed." For example, he asserted, no more effective way of preventing a building boom could be devised than setting price ceilings on new houses. Mr. Hazlitt's underlying assumption is that need can be measured by ability to pay. But we know that in housing the greatest need is for low-priced dwellings and that in a free market building facilities would inevitably be concentrated on the production of high-priced houses and business structures. Nor is it at all certain that a boom would occur. After the last war, controls were abandoned within a few weeks of the Armistice, but the Federal Reserve Board index of residential construction (1923-25 equals 100) stood at 44 for the year 1919 and at only 30 for 1920.

Comparisons with World War I are also illuminating in regard to other forms of production. Then controls were much milder, and prices rose faster and higher. Prices of industrial goods, for instance, increased 88 per cent, while production advanced only 20 per cent. During World War II industrial prices were held down to a 21 per cent increase, but despite this discouragement to enterprise, production jumped by 116 per cent. On the basis of these facts it cannot be claimed that there is any direct correlation between a free market and the level of production.

It cannot be claimed, either, that a tight rein on prices in the past four years has unduly restricted profits and left business financially weakened. On the contrary, most corporations have reported much higher earnings, after taxes, throughout the war, and now find themselves in a very healthy position, with ample reserves for reconversion and expansion. For if they have not enjoyed the speculative bonanzas which World War I brought to many businesses, they have reaped a harvest through their huge increase in volume.

In this first crucial post-war year it is vital that business should be encouraged to seek prosperity through maintenance of volume rather than through the increased profit margins which would result from the cancellation of price controls. More than that, business ought to be encouraged to think in terms of a stable price level and strongly discouraged from holding back production or building up stocks in the hope of making a speculative killing.

That is one reason why the extension of the OPA beyond next June 30 should be considered by Congress, not in the late spring, but immediately it reconvenes this month. If manufacturers and merchants are given any cause to hope that price controls will be abandoned after mid-summer, they will inevitably tend to hold goods for a higher price. As Mr. Moley says, it is only "human nature" that they should do so. No smart free enterpriser worth his salt will sell today for $100 something he may reasonably expect to get $125 for in a month or two, unless he is hard pressed for cash.

If, therefore, we are to avoid hoarding and stimulate production, business should be given early notice that the price line will be held for at least another year. This does not mean that there should be no adjustments in price; in certain cases they will be needed to induce the investment of new capital, in others to make possible higher wages. But by and large industry, fatly cushioned by the repeal of the excess-profits tax, can make handsome profits at current prices provided it maintains production schedules. Let Congress, then, adopt policies which will end the chase after speculative profits and set off business in a steady pursuit of volume.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

OF COURSE it would have been more fun for the little Doctor to write a German Charter for the World, but when Allied victory made that impossible, he doubtless drew a certain satisfaction from composing a charter for the post-war fascists. Throughout Hitler's political testament the personal style of Dr. Goebbels—insolent, vindictive, fanatical—is unmistakable. A commentator with a sense of humor is inevitably tempted to make political satire out of the document disclosed by the Allies on December 30. But I remember the Théâtre des Dix Heures in Paris where French chansonniers used to delight the audience with jokes about "Mein Kampf"—and while Paris laughed, Hitler armed. So I shall take his testament for what it is: the arrogant claim of a man who, though beaten, is confident he leaves behind a movement that will survive.

Hitler was not a fool in assuming the possibility of a fascist revival. Indeed, no revival is necessary, for fascism has weathered the storm; it has injected even into the blood of the victors a poison that is sapping their strength. The record of the FBI in the field of military counter-intelligence is magnificent, but in combating political espionage its performance is rather less brilliant than the sample provided in "The House on 92nd Street." No more than a fortnight ago a certain Demetrio Carceller checked into the Savoy-Plaza Hotel in New York; when he signed the register he should have added: "Franco agent; former Minister of Industry and Commerce of the Spanish fascist regime." Demetrio Carceller, one of the ablest Phalangists, can come and go freely in the United States while José Rodríguez Vega, Republican exile and general secretary of the Spanish U. G. T. (General Workers' Union), was refused an American transit visa from Mexico to Paris—on the wholly unfounded charge that he was a Communist.

Through Hitler's mind, as he dictated his testament during the forty-eight hours before his death—if he is really dead—must have passed a panorama of the six years before 1939, when he had only to bluster and threaten to win concessions from the terrified democracies. Chamberlain is dead and Daladier is politically also dead, but many appeasers still occupy responsible posts in government, business, the church hierarchy, and the diplomatic corps of the United Nations. Interpreting the nationalization laws as the hand-writing on the wall for capitalism in Europe, they already begin to long for a new Führer. In Italy they have found a willing candidate in the person of Guglielmo Giannini, founder of the Uomo Qualunque front. This swashbuckling, gun-toting clown speaks a language which Italians have heard before: what Italy needs is a government of experts—the politicians and the parties must go.

Remembering things past, Hitler may have lingered pleasantly over the thought of the democracies' excessive zeal in safeguarding freedom. Even now in the special hell to which he has been consigned he must be smiling at the spectacle of an Oswald Mosley again in command of his pre-war fascist organization, while a British Labor government, as if oblivious of the thousands of young Britons who died fighting Mosley's allies, proclaims that it will never use "totalitarian methods" to suppress him. There would be less danger of totalitarian methods being one day employed in Britain if Sir Oswald and his beautiful wife joined the Nazi labor battalions rebuilding the devastated cities of Europe.

Of course the question will be raised: What about the countries occupied or influenced by Russia? Let me say plainly that an old fascist holding public office in Rumania is as obnoxious to me as one in office in Italy. And when the Italian Communists supported Badoglio and appeared to attach little importance to the demand for the abdication of King Victor Emanuel, I condemned their stand strongly in a Nation article. But while the use of isolated fascists by the Russians may have an immediate demoralizing and confusing effect, it is a very different matter from the use of fascists by the Western powers. The Russians are single-minded in their determination to liquidate fascism as a system and a movement; and this purpose will not be altered even if they employ fifty fascists to carry out one of those political maneuvers to which Communists in recent years have become so addicted. Nobody can seriously believe that Russia, after what it has suffered and accomplished, is going to permit any fascist regime to return to power in Europe. Unfortunately the same cannot be said with equal assurance of the West. When British or Americans use fascists in their zones of occupation or encourage reactionaries in office, one cannot write it off as a mistaken but temporary expedient, for nothing has happened to convince us that the democracies have learned—even yet—that fascism must be rooted out completely and everywhere.

Having ended the war without winning a clear political victory, the Western Allies are now confronted with some unfinished business which must be wound up quickly if Hitler's testament is not to be put into effect by his disciples in every part of the world. We "premature anti-fascists," who were the objects of such unfriendly attention from the intelligence services of all the democratic countries, will continue our role of gadfly until the destruction of fascism renders the very word "anti-fascist" obsolete. As a start we suggest that the Assembly of the UNO which meets in London this month undo the damage done when Argentina was admitted to membership in the United Nations. The Assembly should immediately serve notice on Argentina that, having failed in the obligations agreed upon at Chapultepec and San Francisco, it will be suspended until a clearly democratic government takes power. Following that the Assembly should carry to its logical conclusion the San Francisco resolution on Spain, asking all the member states to end diplomatic relations with the Franco regime. And, above all, it should proclaim the principle of collective sanctions against any country that chooses fascism as its form of government.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE SICK CITY AND THE FAMILY ROMANCE

BY DELMORE SCHWARTZ

THE books of Abram Kardiner* are based upon the concept of "basic personality" and upon a union of the disciplines of psychoanalysis, sociology, and anthropology. Basic personality is a technical term far from equivalent in meaning to the popular sense of personality, or to such colorful personalities as John Barrymore and Alexander Woollcott. The recent biographies—or, more exactly, disguised jokebooks—by Gene Fowler and Samuel Hopkins Adams which deal with these gifted, unhappy, and wasted human beings do touch, however, upon Kardiner's important researches. The reader of Kardiner will be able to rescue from the two grab bags a few significant facts—the fact that Barrymore was afraid he would go insane, like his father, and that Woollcott detested his father, adored his mother, and as a child was dressed as a girl. Fowler refers in passing to "the neo-Freudians," and Adams mentions intimate psychological matters, but both books might have been written forty or one hundred years ago, for all the use they make of insights which should by now be familiar to the biographical author. The distance which separates Fowler and Adams from Kardiner is significant because Barrymore and Woollcott were human beings whose lives represent and illuminate life in America. Moreover, one of the limitations of Kardiner's studies is the singling out of a small rural community in the Middle West as typical of America. Kardiner has some methodological justification for taking a backward community as representative of our culture, but one cannot help speculating repeatedly on whether a big city or an academic community might not have been more fruitful. The question becomes all the more pressing when Kardiner analyzes the characters of four human beings in Plainville, the pseudonymous name of his rural community. For it seems likely enough that celebrated and gifted beings such as Barrymore and Woollcott might have yielded richer and more illuminating results. In reading about Plainville, one also remembers such a work about rural people as James Agee's "Let Us Now Praise Famous Men." The anthropologist's picture has the same relation to Agee's as photographs of the moon's craters have to an actual sight of the moon. No doubt one must keep both purviews in mind if one is interested in the truth, but in this instance it is clear that the poet has come closer to intimate knowledge than the scientist.

The concept of basic personality begins with the premise that human nature is not the same the world over but that each society develops a basic personality or character structure which distinguishes it from other societies. Thus a Wall Street broker and a Dutch fisherman, different as they are, resemble each other in character structure much more than they resemble an Eskimo. Their resemblance and their fundamental sameness is produced by the institutions of Western culture. A great deal of variety—an infinite variety, says Kardiner—is possible within the framework of basic personality: the same society gave being at about the same time to Horatio Alger and Henry James, and the same family included Henry James, William James, Alice James, and the two now forgotten brothers. Yet if we compare any of these human beings to Fantan, a fascinating character who belongs to a primitive people named the Alorese and is continually on the verge of divorcing his wife, the Western human beings show a likeness as obvious as red hair, and their difference from Fantan is not at all like their difference from each other.

This profound difference Kardiner attempts to explain by a detailed comparison of Western culture with four primitive societies. As a psychoanalyst Kardiner is predisposed to emphasize the institution of the family and the child's relationship to his parents. Yet one of his great virtues is his effort to connect the family relationships with the economic system and other institutions of any society, institutions which most analysts tend to regard either as derived from the family life or as not really crucial in determining the fate and the character of the individual. Freud, for example, makes much of the fact that one of his patients, after being cured in 1914, lived through the World War and the Russian Revolution without breaking down under the strain of the social crisis. Kardiner shows, however, how just such social crises can "mobilize" the latent neuroticism of a human being. It is, at any rate, the institutions peculiar to a given society, the chief of which is the parental care of the child, which bring into being the fundamental structure of character of all the human beings of that society. Thus among the Alorese, who inhabit an island in the East Indies, the mother is the breadwinner. She works all day in the rice fields which are the economic basis of this people, and consequently she does not take care of her child as a Western mother does. The effect of this economic role of the mother upon the child is extraordinary. Maternal neglect of the child creates an adult human being who is full of anxiety, mistrust, and emotional instability; and who is without constructive ability, an interest in the outer world, or executive capacities. The Alorese men resent the women and suffer from a repressed longing for tenderness and affection. The women in turn suffer from a resentment of work, an aggressiveness toward the male, and a repressed longing for the maternal role. This example ought to illustrate the intimate connections between the economic order, the family life, and the development of individual character.

* "The Individual and His Society." Columbia University Press (1939), $5. "The Psychological Frontiers of Society." By Abram Kardiner, with the Collaboration of Ralph Linton, Cora Du Bois, and James West. Columbia University Press (1945), $5.

Our own society, by making as much as possible of maternal care, brings into being the Oedipus complex, which Freud, with his genius for phrases, entitled "the family romance" and which Mr. Fowler might describe as "boy meets mother." To most human beings the idea that the Oedipus complex, the sexual feelings an infant has toward his mother and his hatred of his father as a rival, is crucial in the formation of the character of all Western beings will seem like a strange, silly, and doubtless repugnant conception, although in America Mothers' Day is the national celebration of the Oedipus complex. Repugnant or not, Kardiner demonstrates how, in Plainville, U. S. A., as in Western society since the Pharaohs, good maternal care brings about strong attachment to the mother, the tendency to idealize the parent and thus authority in general, the strong "development of curiosity and executive capacities," and all the other traits of character which have made Western man active, self-reliant, and ambitious. But precisely this attachment to the mother, involved as it is with a repressed hatred of the father, brings about also the tendency toward extreme aggressiveness, competitiveness, and hostility, the consequence of which is the systematic anxiety and insecurity which also have always characterized Western society. The child's sense of rivalry with his father soon becomes a competition with his brothers and sisters, and as an adult human being he feels that all men are enemies at the same time as he seeks to believe that all men are brothers. So, too, the child's idealization of his mother creates extraordinary inhibitions of sexual desire. Consequently as an adult human being he suffers from an overwhelming sense of shame and guilt about the act of making love, one of the results being a tendency to take success and social esteem as a substitute. But "there is no substitute for sexual gratification," and the emphasis upon success as a means of winning the esteem of the loved parent is already overwhelming for other reasons. Hence the adult Western man is weakened by tensions, conflicts, and anxieties which often become unbearable. Guilt, depression, and suicide prevail in Western culture—Western religions, for example, may be regarded as techniques for the forgiveness of guilt—while among the Aloreses guilt, depression, and suicide do not exist at all.

The rise of science, the discrediting of religion, and the abiding triumph of capitalism have focused the basic personality of Western man upon one goal, success, the only proof of which is the endless acquisition of money: the chief ideal of Western culture is the possession of one million dollars. In discussing this edifying ideal Kardiner attempts to show how social and economic changes are effective only in so far as they draw upon traits of character determined by parental discipline. Parental discipline does not create social change, but it provides the psychological forces within the human being necessary to accomplish the change. Thus the rise of capitalism drew upon the denial or postponement of pleasure which is part of the training of the Western infant, and which was transformed into thrift, industry, obedience, and the other traits necessary to the growth of capitalism. But this kind of training, as it emphasizes striving for self-esteem and success, releases at

INSTRUCTORS!

Take Advantage of The Nation's

Special Class Room Rate—

25¢

Monthly per Student

for orders of ten or more copies to be sent to one address — Desk copy is supplied free.

ADDRESS YOUR ORDER TO

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review

may now be obtained through

THE Nation

20 Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

Yearly subscription

$6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN copy on request

WHY has the Catholic Church

Supported

Mussolini
Hitler
Tiso
Franco
Salazar
Peron

?

Why did the Catholic church support Roosevelt's domestic policies and oppose his foreign policy?

Why is the Catholic church anti-Capitalist as well as anti-Communist?

What kind of a political, social and economic system is the Catholic church attempting to bring about?

How has this affected your life and how may it affect the lives of your children?

READ:

"The True Nature of Roman Catholicism"

by L. H. Lehmann

An important series of articles describing aspects of the Catholic church never before revealed.

Beginning in the January issue of

THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE

Edited by former Catholic priests

Subscription only $1.00 a year (10 issues)

Sample copy 15¢

A limited number of January copies are being reserved for readers of The Nation. To make sure of getting your January copy include Dept. number in the address as follows, or return this ad.

Agora Publishing Company, Dept. I-T-51

229 WEST 48TH STREET

NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

Anna Louise Strong

I saw the NEW POLAND

Here is the first eye-witness account of the shape of things inside Poland as the Lublin government took over.

At all bookstores ■ $2.50

An Atlantic Monthly Press Book

LITTLE, BROWN AND COMPANY

the same time the extraordinary aggressiveness which takes so many cruel forms. Aggressiveness turned inward results in masochism, feelings of inferiority, passivity, and other kinds of weakness. Turned outward, the result is sadism, extreme rivalry, envy, and conflict, the social climax being war. Competitiveness, which motivates the entire psychological formation, is not in itself evil, since it may create a strong and self-reliant human being; but in a scarcity economy such as ours the combination of the social system with a basic personality focused on competition for success overburdens the lives of most human beings with tensions and insecurities for which there is no relief and for which only one term is adequate—lifelong neuroticism.

It should be remarked that as a psychoanalyst Kardiner is involved in the revision of Freud initiated by Erich Fromm and Karen Horney, a revision in which the human being's need of support and security is as much a primary motive as sexual desire. Indeed, Kardiner describes the Oedipus complex itself in terms of the infant's desire for maternal care as well as sexual gratification. The correctness of this criticism of Freudian method cannot be determined by argument, of which there is no lack, but only by actual clinical practice. This suggests that many of us may have been born too soon to know what the whole truth is. But at any rate to a layman Kardiner's explication of his departure from Freud is remarkable for clarity of statement, absence of polemic, and scrupulous effort to account for the view which Freud himself wrongly adopted.

This necessity of justifying the revision of a scientific method is but one of the causes for the difficulty and abstruseness of Kardiner's prose. Indeed, the abstruseness of the terminology may very well conceal the fact that these books seek out the very depths of our lives. The reader can be forgiven for not recognizing a phrase like "the social discomforts of our time" as a description of wars, depressions, and the unhappiness of most human beings. It is a fact, however, that few books have attempted as these books do to examine the assumptions, habits, and institutions of our lives.

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

I WONDER how many people in this great age of technology are sometimes oppressed, as I am, by the feeling that we live in a kind of vast prison with invisible walls, from which we catch glimpses once in a while, as out of a high small window, of the life we should be having, considering how short our sojourn on this earth must be? It is a self-made prison; who's to stop us from spending at least one-third of our time "outside"—looking at wonderful pictures, walking in the moonlight, watching a garden grow and wither and grow again, talking good talk, writing a paragraph for the sheer pleasure of it, or whatever it is that seems to each of us to constitute the good life? Yet how often do we do any of these things? Or do them as if they were not, like all our other activities, things we ought to be doing?

Some people, a very few, do manage to live "outside" or to get there and bring us back reports. The wonderful thing about Dylan Thomas's poem, "Fern Hill," which I printed some weeks ago was the sense it gave me of having been released, turned loose in a sunny meadow "painted with flowers," and the further sense that this was the "real" world. In a different, much less dramatic way, one gets a similar feeling from "All Trivia" by Logan Pearsall Smith (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50).

It takes courage to name a small book "All Trivia" and send it out into a world of vast events, significant works in two volumes, best-sellers half a foot thick, and titles that scream each other down. But I suspect that Mr. Smith's unpretentious little volume, in which he has gathered together "Trivia" and "More Trivia" and added Afterthoughts and Last Words, will outsit most of its contemporaries on the shelf of books one keeps. As most people know, Mr. Smith's Trivia are comments, brief and very brief, on everything under the sun. And he has distilled the experience and thought of a long and sentient life into drops of prose as limpid and pure as you are likely to find.

Mr. Smith admittedly takes great care with his words, sentences, paragraphs. But if I'm any judge he also gets a direct simple pleasure out of the actual writing that is not as common as non-writers may think—the same sort of pleasure those old cabinet-makers must have got out of turning a chair or a table. And this joy of his is embodied in the product, just as the joy of the craftsman, or so I've always felt, is embodied in the chair or table—and almost as palpable as the seasoned silky wood or the good design.

There is no "fine writing" in "All Trivia." Mr. Smith's taste and his nice sense of the ridiculous save him from that just as they save him from whimsicality—even though he writes as often as not of subjects that would betray more assuming writers. He is disillusioned and sophisticated, sardonic and irreverent. But he can still become lost in wonder at the thought of the universe, and his book has a sweetness and equability of temper in itself as refreshing as spring water fresh from the "outside."

I WENT TO SEE the first production of the Readers' Theater, which is putting on a series of dramatic works of the past. "In order to avoid the great technical and financial responsibilities that full production entails" the plays are being presented without scenery or costumes, and the parts are read from scripts, but by professional actors. The project is sponsored by two committees, one of people connected with the theater and one of critics and writers; the theatrical unions have made concessions and Lee Schubert is providing a theater for the first three productions. James Light, Joel Schenker, and Henry G. Alsberg are in charge of operations.

The first play to be given was Sophocles's "Oedipus Rex" in a version by William Butler Yeats. The second will be Calderón's "The Mayor of Zalamea" (on January 13), the third John Ford's "'Tis Pity She's a Whore."

"Oedipus Rex" (Majestic Theater) got unfavorable critical notices but I enjoyed it—and the audience seemed to me surprisingly enthusiastic. Eugene O'Neill, Jr.'s introduction was too long drawn out and its cosy tone a bit out of line with Sophocles and Yeats. Of the players, Frederic

Have You Read—
"CHINESE
PUBLIC OPINION"?

ARE YOU SATISFIED with just reading official statements by Chinese leaders such as the Generalissimo, or do you want to read the opinions of the common people, the really important elements in Chinese national life—opinions which serve, when soundly interpreted, as a true barometer of coming events.

CHINESE PUBLIC OPINION, a weekly newsletter, accurate in its facts and suggestive as to developments in China, takes no sides, "sells" no goods, and represents no "interests," but stays right on the job of giving you each week a clear, concise appraisal of developments in China.

You can now subscribe to CHINESE PUBLIC OPINION for the next 26 weeks at the special rate of only $5. If you are not satisfied after reading the first issue, we shall be glad to refund your money. Just fill out the convenient subscription form below, and mail it to us with your remittance.

Use This Convenient Order Form

CHINESE PUBLIC OPINION
National Press Building
Washington 4, D. C.

I enclose $5 for a 26 weeks' subscription to your weekly newsletter CHINESE PUBLIC OPINION, with the condition that if I am not satisfied after reading your first issue I shall be entitled to a full refund.

Name
Street
City Zone.... State.....

Tozere as Oepidus was the least satisfactory, Harry Irvine as Tiresias the most convincing, but in general the plainclothes cast was adequate and the text itself is so fine, the play so powerful, that once it was set in motion the lack of props and the reading from scripts didn't much matter.

I came away brooding, once more, on the really scandalous fact that there are no repertory theaters in this country. Everyone would consider it intolerable and absurd if only contemporary poetry and fiction, music and art were available. Yet in the theater we are almost entirely limited to contemporary plays. To be sure, the great and not so great dramatists of the past are accessible as literature; they ought also to be accessible in the form in which they were meant to be presented.

There should, of course, be a repertory theater in every city, supported if necessary by government funds. After all, federal and state funds are used to train physicians, lawyers, musicians, and journalists and to maintain libraries for their use. Why not repertory theaters which would provide experience and training for professional workers in the theater? They would certainly improve the quality of acting; they might improve the quality of plays by setting good examples. And it is hard to see how such a project could hurt private theater interests. On the contrary it would probably increase the public demand for "legitimate" plays, and a string of repertory theaters purveying adult works might create a healthy backfire against radio drama and the movies, which, whatever their technical proficiency, are deliberately geared to a middling if not lower level of intelligence and taste—has written a book about the USA. Like everything this extraordinary author does it is disturbing and revelatory and prophetic. It's called

Henry Miller

Air-Conditioned
Nightmare

This book will infuriate people who think

"the American way" is now perfect. It will give Americans who want to make our spiritual standard of living as high as our material one plenty to think about. $3.50.

New Directions, 500 5th Ave., N. Y. C., also publish Miller's "Sunday After the War",

"Cosmological Eye", "Colossus of Maroussi", and "Wisdom of the Heart" ($3 each)

New Directions

and completely dominated by a stupid and stupefying code of "inoffensiveness" which professes to reflect the mores of the country but is in reality at least twenty years out of date.

A COMMITTEE of the Association of Research Libraries, whose chairman is William Warner Bishop, Librarian Emeritus of the General Library of the University of Michigan, is issuing a "photo-lithoprint reprint" of the "Catalogue of Printed Books of the British Museum." A new edition now being issued by the museum itself will not be completed for years. Meantime the paper in the original edition is disintegrating under use. The reprint is to be financed by subscriptions, and the final price will depend upon the number of subscriptions received. They may be sent to Paul North Rice, executive secretary of the Association of Research Libraries, at the New York Public Library or to Mr. Bishop or to the publisher, J. W. Edwards, at Ann Arbor.

Librarians and scholars will no doubt be delighted to hear this news since, as Mr. Bishop says, the "Catalogue" is an indispensable book for all literary, historical, and scientific research. I am happy to pass the news along, if only because it is reassuring to find anyone taking peace and international cooperation so much for granted.

WE WERE TALKING about superstition in a condescending way. But when a dissident demurred we agreed that superstitions have often had a base, far back, in some experience of the race. "Truth," mused the dissident, "usually begins as heresy and ends as superstition." "And yet," he continued after a self-searching pause during which he might have been passing under review his own long life as a fancier of truth, "truth is still worth looking for. It's interesting." One could wish it were fashionable as well.

Canada and the United States

NORTH ATLANTIC TRIANGLE. By John Bartlett Brebner. Yale University Press. $4.

MEMBERS of Congress should be required to read this book. So should members of Parliament in Canada and Great Britain. Because misunderstandings between nations—and it has been particularly true of the three in question—arise all too often from bad teaching of history and bad reading of history. "North Atlantic Triangle" is a notable example of interpreting history from a point of view that is neither nationalistic nor yet aloofly internationalist. It is, in fact, the retelling of the common history of three great democracies whose pasts have been molded by mutual interests and by fierce antagonisms and whose destinies from the beginning to the present day have been inextricably bound together. I don't know why I have emphasized the must nature of this book. Any member of Congress or of Parliament who can read will find "North Atlantic Triangle" an exciting adventure in historical exploration.

The title is a little misleading: its full meaning does not become evident until the final chapters. The book is the concluding work in the distinguished Carnegie Endowment series: "The Relation of Canada and the United States." Chiefly the book is concerned with the conquest and settlement of a continent, with the emergence of a North American economy and a North American culture, with the political preferences which determined that there should be two nations north of the Rio Grande and not one. Geography and topography played important roles. The great shield of granite which circles Hudson's Bay and covers most of northern and eastern Canada had much to do with the economy and politics of North America. Until quite recently, when mining, power, and timber have attracted some settlement, it remained a great wilderness in contrast with the thickly settled land south of the border. Moreover, it constituted for Canada a barrier between the eastern provinces and the western plains until the railway drove its steel west to the mountains and beyond. The four main entrances to the continent—the St. Lawrence, the Hudson, Hudson's Bay, the Mississippi—set the pattern of commercial warfare from the earliest days of the French and English fur traders to the days when canals and railroads superseded the great natural waterways. It is interesting to speculate what might have happened had Champlain, instead of returning to the St. Lawrence in 1607, continued his explorations down the New England coast beyond the Cape and discovered the great Atlantic entrance a year or two before Hudson.

Professor Brebner's important contribution is to show how closely the political acts of France, Spain, and England, then England and the thirteen colonies, and then England, Canada, and the United States were related to basic economic interests, frequently conflicting, often complementary. That does not mean, of course, that the development of political democracy in North America was simply a rationalization of economics and geography. For England, Canada, and the United States all developed under the impact of political ideas that sprang from ancient battles against the privileged claims of kings and feudal overlords. In North America this battle came to a head at the unhappy moment when England was making a belated experiment in royal rule. It continued in England through the nineteenth century. It continued in Canada, where native democrats found themselves at odds with stupid colonial administrators and native landed Tories—reinforced after the War of Independence by Tory loyalists who flocked across the border to take up their land grants and add their weight to reaction. Fortunately Canadian democracy was tough enough and wise enough to survive. The new ideas of Adam Smith had shattered the dreary mercantilist framework of British colonial thought, and the economic interests of a united Canada reaching from sea to sea coincided with the pressure for self-government.

The emergence of the "North Atlantic Triangle" of counter-balanced economic and political interests has become an important fact in world affairs. Each of the three nations has recently experimented in political isolationism and its own brand of economic nationalism. Each has learned the lesson of interdependence the hard way. In the war the three powers developed the highest degree of joint action in planning military defense, war production, and economic controls. In the post-war world the Canadian-American-British triangle is important because it has demonstrated the possibility of close international cooperation between nations that in the past frequently sought solutions by conflict. It is important because it constitutes a bridge between North

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

THE Nation

- ☐ with Harpers Magazine . . . $6.50
You Save $2.50
- ☐ with Consumers Union . . . $7.00
You Save $1.50
- ☐ with Harpers Magazine
and Consumers Union . $9.00
You Save $3.50
- ☐ with Free World . . . $7.50
You Save $1.50
- ☐ with Saturday Review . . . $8.50
You Save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself

- ☐ One Year $5 ☐ Two Years $8 ☐ Three Years $11
- ☐ Servicemen's Rate $3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

SPECIAL NOTICE TO READERS

To Subscribers:

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please cooperate by renewing your current subscription on receipt of the first notice of expiration.

To Newsstand Readers:

The only certain way of getting The Nation regularly is to enter a subscription. By doing so you will not only insure prompt receipt of your copy, but you will make a considerable saving in money over the newsstand price.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

America and Europe—Canada in the air age is almost as close a neighbor of Europe as is England. The advantages and the dangers of this close relationship were evident in the development of the atomic bomb and the more recent moves toward international control. The Truman-Attlee-King statement represented a compromise between an attempted one-nation monopoly and the full sharing of secret and control. According to rumor, it was William Lyon MacKenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, who worked out the compromise formula that bridged the gap between Mr. Truman and Mr. Attlee. It is perhaps not without significance that Mr. King, who today asserts the necessity of a world government if our democratic civilization is to survive, is the grandson of that William Lyon MacKenzie who more than a century ago led an armed rebellion in protest against an intransigent British Cabinet's refusal to grant self-government to Canada. In a world desperately needing proof of a workable international system to free it from the overwhelming dread of war the North Atlantic Triangle provides more than a shred of convincing evidence.

J. KING GORDON

BRIEFER COMMENT

Villa Diplomacy

KENNETH PENDAR, author of "Adventure in Diplomacy" (Dodd, Mead $3), was in a social sense Robert Murphy's right-hand man in French North Africa. At the incredibly beautiful villa of La Saadia in Marrakesh, "one of the showplaces of the world," which had been lent to him personally by the widow of a rich American, Pendar lived in the "quasi-Oriental splendor" which, he says, "the Arabs enjoy and respect." There he was host to President Roosevelt, Prime Minister Churchill, and many other important persons who also enjoy and respect the gracious living that only great wealth can make possible. As a gossipy account of high life and low intrigue Pendar's book makes pleasant reading. Unwittingly, moreover, it contributes to a solution of the mystery of our war-time policies toward France. For despite its trivialities and many factual inaccuracies, the book reveals with naive frankness what Bob Murphy's boys really were up to.

Pendar believes "we were defeated diplomatically in North Africa and in our French policies generally." Although he overflows with affectionate admiration for Murphy, he also takes him to task for being too indulgent, too friendly with the wrong people, too little "tough-minded with the people who eluded, outwitted, or betrayed us." At first glance it is startling to get from this Cholly Knickerbocker of diplomacy what seems a sensible explanation for the mess we made. "The State Department," he says, "should have immediately removed Mr. Murphy and every one of his assistants, once the French were fighting as our allies in Tunisia. Our American diplomatic policy should have been carried out by a man with no personal debt to anyone. Diplomacy cannot be implemented by 'provocative agents.' Mr. Murphy and the rest of us had been bogged down in the details of the pre-landing job too long and had lost our usefulness in the bigger picture. Fresh minds and energy were needed."

This, however, is not the refreshing candor it appears to be. The trouble with Murphy, in Pendar's view, is that he did not go far and hard enough in the wrong direction. Pendar complains that "we awkwardly and grudgingly allowed De Gaulle to come to power." The "adventure in diplomacy" which failed was an effort to prevent France from falling into the hands of Frenchmen more concerned with bread and butter for the masses than with gracious living for the few. The book professes to be an attack on De Gaulle as an illiberal, fascist would-be dictator. Some of the criticism is sound, but all of it amounts to a foil for a covert attack on the French who choose to go their way to the left. Pendar laments that we have failed "to keep France in the Atlantic democratic world." Although he never once mentions it, the enemy to which he feels we have lost is not De Gaulle but French socialism.

Pendar's book, which in parts reads much like the effusions of Carlton Hayes and Patrick Hurley, is another straw showing the direction of a rising wind from the right. He wants the State Department purged of any democratic fellows who may have managed to worm their way in. He would like the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to take over control. And his notion of the diplomacy we now need is a new variety of "big-stickism," by which American ambassadors—preferably generals and admirals—"will not force a foreign leader" to take "advice" but will present policy "so clearly and forcefully that a foreign leader will be persuaded."

By the way, Pendar's "head man" in the "enchanted castle" of La Saadia, the half Syrian, half Indo-Chinese Louis, is now with Bob Murphy, thereby assuring a continuity of culinary if not of democratic policy.

PERCY WINNER

The Art of Communication

ANYONE WHO IS WILLING to be convinced that the acquiring and communicating of knowledge can set as many red corpuscles dancing as the next pursuit can, provided the knowledge is brought out into the sunshine, dust, and heat and not sequestered as a frail and sterile museum-piece, should be interested in "Pursuit of Understanding" by Esther Cloudman Dunn (Macmillan, $2.50). Miss Dunn, a professor of English at Smith College, found herself surrounded by books throughout her childhood, both at home and in school; yet neither her teachers nor her book-loving father managed to impart any awareness of the reality of the people who had written those books, of the events that had shaped them, or of the real value of the ideas they embodied. It was her Greek professor in high school who first made her appreciate "what magic is in the greatest teaching," made her realize, for instance, that the coin pictured in her Greek grammar had been fingered by people of flesh and bone, people who labored and conspired and discussed their daily affairs in the very words that looked so lifeless spread out in glossaries and tables of conjugation.

That Miss Dunn's own attitude toward teaching is zestful and human rather than merely professional is shown by the incident of the fractious boy whom she punched in the nose during her first term as a high-school English teacher. "This prize-fighter's triumph," she writes, "was probably the first real connection that I made with my class. . . . It showed at once that we lived in the same world, my pupils and I." Not that Miss Dunn is beating the drum for pugilistic pedagogy; in fact, she puts up a vigorous defense of the potential and often actual waywardness of students, who, being young, naturally demonstrate their vitality by "intermittent attention and submission," a mixture which she finds preferable to mere docility or slavish plodding. But the point she stresses most in her little "autobiography of an education" is that the teacher's knowledge of his subject is not enough: what counts more than anything else is communication—the ability to transplant into a student's mind, not necessarily by means of a left jab to the beak but better so than not at all, some of the teacher's own store of information and much or all of his conviction of the importance of learning.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

You may again buy BOOKS through The Nation

Because of government restrictions on wrapping material, book publishers, for the past two years have refused to accept orders for less than five books. For this reason The Nation was obliged temporarily to discontinue its Readers' Service Department.

Now that these restrictions have been dropped Nation readers can again avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, postfree if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

The Readers' Service Division
THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

ALHAMBRA
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
COLISEUM
81st STREET
86th STREET
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
14th STREET
14th & 15th STS.
HAMILTON
HAMBURG HILL
125th STREET
PELHAM
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
SUNSET
23rd STREET
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCHELLE
WHITE PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO

"DISTINGUISHED AND DRAMATIC BIOGRAPHY"
—N. Y. SUN

'Rhapsody in Blue'

The Jubilant Story of
GEORGE GERSHWIN
—EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION—
FRANK SINATRA
'The House I Live In'

B. G. DeSylva presents
BETTY HUTTON in
"THE STORK CLUB"
—with—
BARRY FITZGERALD
DON DE FORE
Robert Benchley • Bill Goodwin
Iris Adrian • Mikhail Rasumny
Mary Young
and introducing ANDY RUSSELL
Midnight Feature Nightly

In Person
WOODY HERMAN
and his ORCHESTRA
—featuring—
FRANCES WAYNE
—plus—
DOROTHY KELLER
Extra added attraction
BUDY LESTER
Don Baker at the Organ

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents
MAURICE EVANS
In His New Production of Shakespeare's
HAMLET
Columbus Circle Thea. 8'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
Eves. 8:30. Mts. Thu. & Sat. 2:30

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by Music by
& DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND SCHIMMELG
BROADWAY THEA., B'way at 53 St. Eves. Incl. Sun., 8:30. Mats. Sat. & Sun.

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West at Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4836.
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp.

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present
DEEP ARE THE ROOTS
A New Play by ARMAND d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW
Staged by ELIA KAZAN
FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of
Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings: 8:40, $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Matinees
Wednesday and Saturday, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

ELMER RICE produced his first play in 1914. If Miss Crothers and Owen Davis may be regarded as retired, then I cannot recall offhand any other currently practicing American dramatist whose history goes back so far, and though Mr. Rice is by no means venerable in either years or appearance he is any day now in danger of being dubbed the dean of Broadway playwrights. O'Neill was unheard of even in Provincetown when "On Trial" made a hit, and by comparison with Mr. Rice such so-called old hands as George Kaufman, Philip Barry, Maxwell Anderson, and S. N. Behrman are mere newcomers. "The Adding Machine" was the first substantial native play produced by the Theater Guild, and "Street Scene" was one of its biggest hits. If memory serves me, Mr. Rice, with a long career already behind him, renounced the theater sometime in the early thirties when the public showed a considerable lack of enthusiasm for the sociological dramas he was then determined to write, but he came bouncing back when the Playwrights' Company was organized, and the prospects seem to be that he will go merrily on for another generation or so.

All this is by way of leading up to two observations concerning "Dream Girl," his new hit at the recently rechristened Coronet Theater. One of these observations is that "Dream Girl," though a very agreeable divertimento, will probably not be remembered as one of its author's major efforts. The other concerns the fact that its greatest charm seems to be a certain fresh, youthful quality; and I say "seems" for the obvious reason that what looks like youthful freshness is no doubt in reality the effect of long-practiced skill.

Last season, in the piece called "Foolish Notion," Philip Barry over-elaborated, over-wrote, and so rather bungled a play in which much of the action was concerned not with what actually happened but with what one character or another day-dreamed as happening. Mr. Rice has adopted a somewhat similar "notion," and by keeping it simple as well as relatively unpretentious, he has achieved something which may never be more than lightly amusing but at least never makes one painfully aware that it is trying too hard to be something more.

His heroine is an attractive young lady beset by an only slightly more than average tendency to react to all situations by going off into a fantasy either triumphant or disastrous. When, for example, she listens to the radio she almost immediately sees herself confessing to Mr. Anthony, and when a professional seducer suggests a trip to Mexico she sees herself, first, bandying politenesses in impeccable Spanish with the native serenaders and then, by a swift transition, as a Sadie Thompson in flame-colored taffeta standing beneath a lamppost explaining her fate to a man from the past whom coincidence has brought face to face: "The second time it was easier to say 'yes'; the third and fourth times it was easier still . . . and after that I had to do the asking." To make things really serious she becomes ultimately not quite sure what is real and what is not, with the result that she is just about to elope to Reno with a feeble brother-in-law who has been figuring in some of her favorite dreams when a tough newspaperman shakes her rudely awake and she elopes with him instead. This ending or something like it is, I suppose, necessary to turn what is really only a series of skits into something resembling a play, but there is one respect in which it troubles me seriously. How do I know that this tough guy and his rough wooing were really real or that the real elopement really took place. The whole thing is suspiciously of a piece with some of the preceding fantasies. If Mr. Rice expects me to notice this and have my doubts, then his play is very tricky indeed. But I do not think that he does.

Publicity notices inform me that "Dream Girl" was not written with Betty Field (in private life Mrs. Rice) in mind, but my contention is that it must have been, subconsciously at least, for the role fits her to perfection, and no small part of the play's predestined success will be due to her performance. She is not only a very appealing actress but also one who helps create precisely the right atmosphere, as she did on that previous occasion when she played the heroine of Mr. Rice's "Two on an Island." Mr. Rice's farce-comedies do not strive for either the painful sophistication of the ultra smart or the frenetic action-at-all-costs which George Abbott made popular. They are, instead, cheery, fundamentally wholesome, and rather more thoroughly American than a good deal of what passes for American comedy. Miss Field manages somehow to suggest the same spirit, and for all her experience in Hollywood to seem closer to the real thing than the Hollywood version of the emancipated young business woman usually is. In this play I do not think that her fantasies are usually either quite as funny or quite as embarrassing as those imagined by Mr. Thurber in "The Private Life of Walter Mitty," but many of them are highly diverting, and "Dream Girl" is a very pleasant addition to a theatrical season which would be grateful even for plays a good deal less entertaining than this one.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THIS is my first opportunity to speak of the festival of Fauré's music with which the Department of Music of Harvard University honored the hundredth anniversary of his birth, and of the various pleasures which the occasion gave me. Not just the pleasure of hearing two beautiful and moving works—the Requiem, which I had known, and the opera "Pénélope," which was a new experience—beautifully performed by members of the Boston Symphony, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and soloists under the direction of Nadia Boulanger. But also certain pleasures from the entire occasion—the way the music for all five concerts was selected; the way it was performed; and the way it was listened to. Not since London many years before had I experienced so agreeable an atmosphere at concerts—an atmosphere of quiet and interest created by people, young and old, who seemed to be present for no other reason than their desire to hear the music, and who were completely unself-conscious about it; as against the atmosphere of New York concerts, particularly the New Friends of Music concerts and the Budapest Quartet concerts at the Y. M. H. A., which is heavy and noisy with the ostentatiousness and restlessness of people who are there because it is the musical place to be and to say one has been.

I had been urged to attend the festival by a distinguished musician—one of "the true believer[s] in the genius of Fauré," as Aaron Copland put it in a New York Times article, who are "convinced that to hear him is to love him." This musician, long disturbed by my lack of interest in Fauré's songs and chamber music, thought I had not heard enough of the songs or the best of the chamber works. And so I went up to Harvard, and did hear a large number of songs, and the late chamber works—the second Piano Quintet, the second Sonata for violin and piano, the Piano Trio—which the true believers consider representative of the greatest Fauré, the products of his fully matured powers. But I found all these no more interesting than what I had heard before.

Mr. Copland would explain this very easily. "It is perfectly true," he wrote in the Times, "that you must listen closely if you would savor the exquisite distinction of Fauré's harmonies or appreciate the long line of a widely spaced melodic arch. His work has little surface originality. . . . To the superficial listener he probably sounds superficial. But those aware of musical refinements cannot help but admire the transparent texture, the clarity of thought, the well-shaped proportions." I would say, on the contrary, that it does not take any effort on the part of the listener to perceive the exquisite harmonies and textures in one of the chamber works; but that the greatest effort discovers nothing beyond these exquisite surfaces; and that the endless progression of these surfaces may please the ear of a superficial listener (to say nothing of a composer fascinated by their craftsmanship), but it wearies the mind of the person who requires something beyond them—the something that he finds in the Requiem or in "Pénélope," each of which is also beautifully wrought, but in a very different style that is the medium of a very different and moving expressive content.

I should speak of the singing of many of the songs by Isabel French—of her musically intelligent use of a very limited voice. A young soprano, Olympia di Napoli, who was excellent in "Pénélope," also sang some of the songs effectively; but in "La Bonne Chanson" William Hain's voice was frayed in its upper range and his phrasing was dull. The chamber music was excellently performed by Melville Smith and Beveridge Webster, pianists, Ruth Posselt, violinist, and members of the Boston Symphony—Gaston Elcus and Norbert Lauga, violins, Jean Lefranc, viola, and Alfred Zighera, cello—who formed a quartet of perfectly matched players that astounded and delighted me with its refinement and beauty of sound and execution. It may be that the group would play with exactly the same sound and style in a Beethoven quartet, where I would find they were incongruous; but in Fauré it was wonderfully right.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

A Point of Principle

Dear Sirs: The following appears in Del Vayo's article, Clerical Offensive in Mexico, in The Nation of December 15: "In direct violation of the Mexican constitution, which provides that 'ministers of religion will not be permitted, either in public or in private meeting, to criticize the basic laws of the country, the authorities, or the government,' the celebration was a bitter attack on the accomplishments of the revolution."

In regard to that passage, I wish to raise with Del Vayo a point of principle.

Del Vayo implies that his opponents have committed an outrage in doing or saying anything "in direct violation of the . . . constitution." Supposing liberals everywhere refrained from opposition to, even defiance of, any law written on the statute books. Where would they get? Nowhere! In Del Vayo's view were certain people dastards around Boston back in 1776 when they had the audacity to demur about some laws 'well and truly' written by the British?

Let us at least be magnanimous enough in controversy not to accuse opponents of outrageous tactics which miraculously become quite all right when we see fit to employ them.

F. H. HOGAN

Moncton, New Brunswick, December 18

Destroyers and Nuernberg

Dear Sirs: In his book "The Riddle of the State Department" Robert Bendiner told of the opposition of certain members of the department to wise and far-seeing measures which President Roosevelt desired for the well-being of our country.

For example, on page 191 he told of the refusal of Green Hackworth to prepare a brief providing legal argument for the bases-for-destroyers deal to aid Britain in the dark days of 1940. "In justice to Hackworth," he continued, "he was prepared to state that the deal, while neither neutral nor in accord with international law, was justified by the overriding power of a sovereign state acting in self-defense."

This passage came to mind as I read the leading article on the Nürnberg trial in your issue of December 1, 1945, and it strikes me that in permitting this statement to stand as it is you are doing the same thing Bendiner charged Hackworth with doing, namely, you are putting a fetish before dire necessity.

If the bases-for-destroyers deal was a political act disguised as law, would you say that both politics and law were vitiated by our support of the British against the greatest treaty-breaker of all time?

JOHN D. WILLIAMS

Glastonbury, Conn., December 7

Unity for China

Dear Sirs: The civil-war-in-China diet that the American press insists on feeding its readers these days is a source of great unhappiness to us Chinese young people, studying and working in the United States. Not only because civil war will mean years more of unprecedented suffering for our loved ones at home, but because conflicting and unreliable reports may cost us the friendship and understanding of the American people.

We believe too much stress has been laid on the inevitability of internal strife in China and the disunity of the Chinese people. Little mention has been made of the basic and common desire of the Chinese to arrive at a quick and equitable solution of their internal problems and establish a strong and democratic government.

We feel, in reiterating the following national goals, that we are representing the heart-felt desire of all Chinese, regardless of party and faction. (1) China must have unity. A divided house cannot shoulder the burden of internal reconstruction and the responsibility of international cooperation. (2) China must be democratic. She must have a government in which the people are fully and justly represented not only in theory, but in actuality. (3) China must maintain her national sovereignty, free from the fear of foreign military aggression or economic imperialism. She must build herself up to be worthy of her place as a member of the Big Five. (4) The new government must observe the principle of people's livelihood.

To bring these goals closer to realization, we believe that the following steps are necessary: (1) Immediate cessation of hostilities between all Nationalist and Communist forces. A definite day and hour in which all forces will cease firing must be set and adhered to by both sides. (2) Open sessions of the

Crossword Puzzle No. 143

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 No cab has returned for the philosopher!
- 4 Looks like 100 to 1 on Vic
- 7 If it buries its head in the sand, it's probably to get at the insects
- 10 Very keen on beards
- 11 "Needs must when the devil drives." He begins to here
- 12 Driven from pillar to post, so to speak
- 13 "---- teeth, ---- eyes, ---- taste, ---- everything"
- 16 The best cheese, according to many
- 18 He'd be a deep pink if Ma were about!
- 20 We sing (anag.)
- 21 Ted is about to gain the victory
- 22 Glass "eyes" for eyeglasses
- 24 They buried the old Hun in three coffins
- 25 Not what you say, but how you say it
- 26 "Eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die," was his motto
- 28 Boy gun, great fun, gun bust, boy ----!
- 31 Instrument that has nothing to do with a tobacco pouch
- 33 It's all right to drop an aitch in this Eastern country
- 34 Where the bee sucked, there sucked he
- 35 Oh, rats!
- 36 Word mentioned once in these clues
- 37 Ever yours, not ours

DOWN

- 1 "Smally foulies," Chaucer calls them
- 2 Cheat—sounds like Cousin, that!
- 3 Rule broken in the morn

- 4 Don't advise a boxer to take it on this
- 5 Englands one poisonous snake
- 6 Shepherdess in As You Like It
- 8 Why is it "dry" gin—because wet gin can be painful?
- 9 Voltaire thought that if there were no God it would be necessary to this him
- 14 Son of David—remarkable for his good looks, popularity and "undutifulness" to his father
- 15 Jenny, for one
- 16 Exchanged words, or blows, perhaps
- 17 One of them threw away a pearl richer than all his tribe
- 18 She was a true friend to Dora Copperfield
- 19 A tit we find is a linnet
- 23 Presented in theatrical fashion
- 24 Poetic name for Britain
- 26 Alternative for controlling a horse
- 27 Character in The Rivals noted for his cowardice and picturesque language
- 29 Make one
- 30 For keeping accounts
- 31 Having nothing on
- 32 "O woman! in our hours of ---- Uncertain, coy, and hard to please"

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 142

ACROSS:—1 BLACKOUT; 2 BAYARD; 10 ABBEY; 11 CONFUCIUS; 12 TESTERN; 13 ARDMORE; 14 PANTY; 15 YONKERS; 18 AVERNUS; 21 ARCTIC; 24 HALFWAY; 26 TESTATE; 27 DALMATIAN; 28 INCOG; 29 POCKET; 30 POSEIDON.

DOWN:—1 BEAUTY; 2 AMBUSCADE; 3 KEY WEST; 4 UNCANNY; 5 ASUDDEN; 7 AMIGO; 8 DISPERSE; 9 UNEASY; 16 ENTRANCED; 17 WASHED UP; 19 NEWGATE; 20 STYMIE; 21 ANTONIO; 22 CASTLE; 23 BERGEN; 25 LILAC.

The NATION

Political Consultative Council. All parties should be represented and given equal opportunity for voicing opinion on all subjects of national interest. The assembly must agree to abide by majority decision. (3) Carrying out of all mutual commitments and treaty agreements among the Allied powers in the Far East. In this respect, we feel the continued presence of American forces in China will tend to stabilize rather than confuse the situation. (4) Should further attempts at peaceful internal settlement fail, we strongly urge that the matter be placed before a final and impartial United Nations arbitration board. There is no use pretending that the situation in China does not have international implications. It is therefore within the province of the United Nations Organization to intervene, but we sincerely hope that this last step will not be necessary.

We hope that through the enumeration of a positive and concrete program for the settlement of the crisis in China we may be able to restore the confidence of the American public in the peaceful and democratic desires of the Chinese people.

JANET CHANG
SHELLY M. MARK
EDWIN KWOH
MAE ENG
WELLINGTON LEE

New York, November 20

RESORTS

- The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
• A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.
- ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
- MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7985

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 502-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Lush, luxuriant woods, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails. Ski Tow. 700-foot Ski Slope. Delicious food. Easy transportation.
Attractive Winter Rates
For reservations or further information write or call HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 259

The Rein House
Lake Mohogan 42 Miles from N. Y.
FOR REST AND RELAXATION
Skiing in season. Beautiful lake estate.
Horseback Riding nearby. Hunting. Steam-heated. Delicious Food. Reasonable. Informal.
Accommodated by Reservation Only. Dietary Laws.
Mrs. M. F. Rein Tel. Peekskill 1747-J

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 19, 1946

NUMBER 3

The Shape of Things

ON THE WHOLE THE UNO HAS MADE A GOOD start. In contrast with the gloomy deadlock that ended in the failure of the five-power conference in London, fifty-one nations have rapidly agreed in giving the new organization the tools it needs for its global job. Coincidence in every detail could not reasonably have been expected, but differences were ironed out in a matter of hours without producing any of the ill-feeling we witnessed even in San Francisco. Both the United States and Russia won and lost some of their moves, but neither attempted to dominate the Assembly at the expense of the lesser powers. The selection of the six nations to serve with the Big Five on the Security Council showed a general desire to make the executive of the UNO as representative as possible. Canada's decision to withdraw in favor of Australia, after the southwestern Pacific countries had failed by themselves to secure a seat on the Council, provided a notable example of cooperation and magnanimity. The extraordinary ability shown by Manuiski in a similar post in San Francisco gave the Soviet Union the chairmanship of the important Political Committee. Sponsored by Russia, Great Britain, the United States, Canada, France, and China, the establishment of a commission to deal with the problems created by atomic developments will be presented this week from the Assembly floor definitely bringing the controversial and fateful control of the atomic bomb under the UNO.

✱

IT WAS GOOD TO SEE REPUBLICAN SPAIN TAKEN into consideration even in the limited form of the nomination by France of Rafael Altamira, an exile in Mexico, for the International Court. His candidacy was supported by several Latin American countries, significantly eager to proclaim their opposition to Franco. Mr. Bevin has reiterated his disinclination to allow the question of Spain to come before the Assembly, or any international conference, but world opinion will be most disappointed if the first meeting of the UNO ends without finding a way to give practical effect to the San Francisco resolution outlawing the Franco regime. Perhaps the excellent proposal for "multilateral intervention" issued by Argentina's leading democrats can be made the basis of UNO action against both Franco and Perón.

✱

BETWEEN MAY, 1945, AND JANUARY, 1946, THE Argentine government has systematically and defiantly violated every obligation assumed as a member of the UNO. At this moment, while its representatives sit in the Assembly at London, the Perón regime is consolidating its fascist control over the country by every method known to Hitler: a demagogic appeal for labor support based on sweeping wage decrees coupled with attempts to reassure and enlist "little business;" police terrorism; bands of rowdies who break up gatherings of citizens and attack individuals wearing buttons of the Democratic Union; widespread and unchecked attacks on Jews and Jewish places of business; jingoist plans for Argentine domination of the continent. The list could go on; indeed The Nation plans to publish a more complete indictment in an early issue, for we consider the Perón dictatorship comparable in importance with Nazism when Hitler first came to power. The solid resistance of Argentina's business elements is the most striking difference to be noted. But this has its danger, too, the danger of dividing the nation on class lines, with labor yielding more and more completely to the persuasion of the Perón "revolution." The three-day shutdown called by organized business as a demonstration against the bonus and salary increases decreed on December 20 may help to consolidate Perón's support among the unskilled workers and their families, making his election in February even more certain. The democrats of Argentina badly need the support of world opinion, and there could be no more fitting instrument of that opinion than the first meeting of the General Assembly.

✱

THE POLITICAL PURGE DEMANDED IN THE TWO directives to the Shidehara government early this month has given great encouragement to the liberated progressive forces now preparing for the coming elections. The Japanese government was ordered to ban from the elections and from public office all active exponents of militarism, fascism, and aggressive nationalism, and to abolish or prevent the rebirth of twenty-seven jingoist and fascist societies. The terms of the directives were so broad and at the same time so specific that they banned some 20,000 officials and forced a tortured and unstable reshuffling of the Shidehara Cabinet; they also played havoc with the reconversion plans of right-wing politicians who had been donning democratic make-up for the coming elections. Three-fourths of the members of the outgoing Diet will be unable to run for reelection because of membership in the Imperial Rule Assistance Association and similar organizations. The order has not only barred virtually all the reactionary Progressive Party and most of the rightist Liberal Party candidates but has crippled their machines. Many right-wing party organizers in the towns and villages are abandoning their positions because they see the end of the patronage on which their livelihood depended. The result of the purge may be a left majority

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	57
Why G. I.'s Demonstrate	60
Peace in China?	61
Squeeze on Turkey	61

ARTICLES

U. S. Industry's Grand Strategy
by Alfred Friendly	62
What Do the People Think of Truman?
by Richard L. Neuberger	63
"The New Veteran"
Walter Bernstein vs. Merle Miller	65
In the Wind	68
Britain and Empire Planning
by Aylmer Vallance	69
Reveillon in Paris	by Ida Treat
Everybody's Business	by Keith Hutchison
The People's Front	by Del Vayo

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way	by Margaret Marshall	75
Oh, My Name It Is Sam Hall. A Poem
by Randall Jarrell		76
Science and the State	by Benjamin Harrow	76
Briefer Comment		77
Drama	by Joseph Wood Krutch	81
Films	by James Agee	81
Music	by B. H. Haggin	82
In Short	by K. H.	83

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 144

by Jack Barrett	84
------------------------	----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:

Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 319 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $5; Two Years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

in the next Diet if the Socialists and Communists succeed in carrying their campaign to the countryside in the next two months.

✱

WHEN THE UNITED AUTOMOBILE WORKERS accepted the 19½-cents-an-hour increase recommended by the fact-finding board in the General Motors strike, they provided President Truman with an opportunity to win a great victory for labor and industrial peace in this country. If the White House forces G. M. also to accept the decision of the fact-finding board, the way will be cleared for a similar upward revision of wages in other industries and for the resumption of production. The U. A. W.'s move and the narrow margin which separates the two sides in the steel dispute hold out the hope that we may avoid the knock-down and drag-out fight envisaged in Alfred Friendly's article in this week's issue. The crucial point in the letter sent by the General Motors Council of the U. A. W. to President Truman is that the fact-finding board's decision is based on the assumption that 1946 production levels will not exceed those of 1941. Considering the big backlog of demand for automobiles, production during the next few years should far surpass the 1941 volume and thus allow a correspondingly wider margin of profits to General Motors without a price increase. It is up to the President to demand a showdown. Does the General Motors crowd want a reasonable settlement, or do they want to try and smash the labor movement?

✱

THE "JUDICIAL" SPIRIT IN WHICH THE HOUSE Committee on Un-American Activities—successor to Martin Dies and Co.—is carrying on its labors is well illustrated by the following chronological account of its recent dealings with the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee.

December 1. Ernie Adamson, counsel to the Un-American Committee, asks the President's War Control Board to cancel the Joint Committee's license to collect and distribute funds for relief of refugees in Europe.

December 8. The Joint Committee receives a letter from Mr. Adamson saying in part: "In the interests of saving time I suggest that you permit one of our investigators to make a preliminary investigation of your organization to determine whether or not this committee is interested in your organization" (italics added).

December 10. The Joint Committee receives a subpoena to produce all its books and records at a hearing of the Un-American Committee on January 23.

Thus, after trying to execute a death sentence on an organization whose work for the relief of Franco's victims is a matter of public record, the Un-American Committee now wishes to launch a fishing expedition in the hope of finding something that looks like evidence to back the verdict it has already reached. There is nothing surprising about these tactics. The Un-American Committee was created by Representative Rankin to carry on just such political hatchet work against left and liberal organizations. What is surprising is that even a conservative Congress should continue to tolerate in its midst a group which, as Representative Ellis Patterson has said, "has violated every concept of American democracy."

THE PROPOSED EIGHTEEN-CENT INCREASE IN butter prices is the most direct challenge yet offered to the stabilization program from within Administration circles. Money spent for butter is an important part of the living expense of most American families. If this 35 per cent rise proposed by Secretary of Agriculture Anderson is permitted, the door will be opened not only to pressure for higher prices from other producers but to new wage demands based on the rising cost of living. Minor price adjustments have been made without serious consequences, but drastic increases of this type will almost certainly start off the inflationary cycle. There are several ways to obtain increased butter production without a rise in price. During the war steady production was achieved by a subsidy enabling creameries to pay above-market prices for butter fat. As an alternative to restoring the subsidy, the Department of Agriculture could impose a ceiling on butter fats that would be sufficiently low to divert cream into butter production. A system of allocations might be set up if the price ceiling failed, to insure the butter producers a sufficient amount of cream.

FRANK FAY OF "HARVEY," WHO WAS RECENTLY censured by Equity for charging five actors with religious bias because they attended a left-wing rally at which Harold Laski "attacked" the Catholic church—Laski criticized the Vatican for its pro-fascist role in Spanish affairs—has now been taken over by the Friends of Frank Fay and raised to the status of a crusader. Last week Mr. Fay was the star performer at a Madison Square Garden rally which, to judge by the people who spoke or occupied prominent boxes, might have been a joint convention of every pro- and proto-fascist group in the country. The hall was alive with America Firsters, Coughlinites, Franco apologists, and assorted anti-Semites. The publicity for the affair was handled by a former office manager of America First. The chairman was state Senator John J. McNaboe, a frequent speaker at Coughlinite rallies. Joseph P. Kamp, whose friends include Lawrence Denais and G. L. K. Smith, is said to be the brain trust for the Friends of Frank Fay. Needless to say, the speakers roundly denied that they were anything but "fine American citizens." But they attacked the "more deadly of the Roosevelt species" and denounced, significantly enough, John Roy Carlson, author of "Under Cover." One of them, Dr. Emmanuel M. Josephson, referred to "labor-union fascists and subversive labor unions," but Mr. McNaboe rose to correct Dr. Josephson, probably out of deference to Joseph P. Ryan, permanent president of the International Longshoremen's Union, who was sitting on the speakers' platform. Mr. Fay apparently enjoyed every minute of it. "I want you to know from the bottom of my heart," said Mr. Fay, whose clichés, like his political opinions, seem to be a little confused, "that tonight I am a happier and prouder American than I have ever been," and so on. His sponsors no doubt are rubbing their hands with glee. What rabble rouser would not be proud to have pulled out of his hat a rabbit as amiable and long-eared as Mr. Fay.

THE NAVY'S INVESTIGATION OF THE CROATAN case led to interesting findings. The Croatan, it will be recalled, is the escort carrier reported to have refused to embark a contingent of high-point Negro troops waiting transportation home at Le Havre. According to the Navy report, when an army officer asked whether the Negro troops might come on board, the carrier's commander replied that of course he had no right to refuse but he would prefer not to have them. It was all very genteel, as if the sponsored applicant to a select club had suddenly been discovered to have come from the wrong side of the tracks. Discrimination, apparently, is not the rule of the navy—merely the prerogative of hypersensitive officers.

THE HUGE ADVERTISEMENT IN WHICH THE House of Seagram last week congratulated Ray Milland on his magnificent performance in "The Lost Weekend" was as nice a blend as we can remember of defense and tribute. "To the applause of motion-picture critics... we, of the House of Seagram, wish to add our own sincere and enthusiastic acclaim." But don't for a moment think that the advertisement went on to suggest a few drinks on the House. On the contrary, it said that the picture constituted an indorsement of its own earnest conviction that "some men should not drink."

Ever since Repeal in 1934 [it continued] the House of Seagram has exerted all its influence to further the cause of moderation in drinking. In newspapers and magazines from coast to coast we have published such significant statements as "Drinking and Driving Do Not Mix," "We Don't Want Bread Money," and "Pay Your Bills First."

This feverish protest would—if anything could—cause a prohibitionist to smile. To the innocent bystander who sometimes stands by a bar it is an interesting indication from a reliable source, the liquor industry, of the abiding strength in this country of what is so well described as dry sentiment.

A WHITE MUSICIAN WHO WANTED TO HEAR Duke Ellington's band, playing for a Negro audience, walked into Turner's Arena in Washington last week—and was promptly shown the door. We know a cause célèbre when we see one and should certainly raise a hue and cry about this wanton persecution of the white race if we hadn't been beaten to the draw. No sooner had the episode occurred than Tomlinson D. Todd, Negro president of the Institute on Race Relations, rushed to the defense of the victim. He "was refused admission because he was white," said Mr. Todd. "Discrimination in the nation's capital must go." If Negroes should ever buy Constitution Hall, ladies of the D. A. R. will either be admitted, like first-class citizens, or find a champion in Mr. Todd.

Why G.I.'s Demonstrate

BOILING their commanding general in a public square of Manila last week, twenty thousand American soldiers set off a worldwide chain of explosions that may have blown to bits the army's badly bungled plans for demobilization. In Yokohama Secretary of War Patterson was greeted by a "hothead demonstration," to quote the officer who threatened its participants with prison terms. In Frankfurt 4,000 men stormed ETO headquarters and were turned back at bayonet point. From Paris came reports of G. I.'s parading down the Champs Elysées chanting, "We want to go home!" And from Mourmelon and Reims came stories of funds of several thousand dollars raised by the men to cover the cost of protest cables to American newspapers and Congressmen. Similar rallies and fund-raising drives were reported from London, from Batangas in the Philippines, from Vienna, from Andrews Field in Maryland, from Calcutta, and from Honolulu, where 1,500 demonstrators raised the slogan "Bust Patterson to a Private."

So far serious violence has been avoided. But the warning is plain. The patience of men who have been through years of agony, loneliness, strain, and insufferable boredom has worn paper-thin. These are not mercenaries or career soldiers; they are citizens of the United States who, willingly or not, left their homes, their families, and their livelihoods to fight a war. They do not see why they should be casually expected to bear the burden of a policing job for which they are poorly prepared. Much less do they see why they should be forced to rot in idleness in countries which are not conquered territory, and in no need of our policing—in France, in the Philippines, in the Caribbean, in China, or even here at home. Their discontent does not spring from "minor reasons" as the New York Times smugly editorializes, nor from the fact that they have "little except self-pity to occupy their minds." By what right do the editors of the Times, or any civilians, lightly assume that these fellow-citizens should without complaint, as a matter of course, add years—or even months—of forced labor to the years of sacrifice they have already contributed?

Somebody, to be sure, must perform the duties of an occupation force, or we stand to lose the very objectives for which we fought. That is obvious, and only the demagogues and the isolationists suggest that we should "bring the boys home," pull into our shell, and write off the war as history. But the need for occupation troops does not, numerically, justify the slowdown in demobilization which touched off the current wave of unrest in the armed forces. It does not explain the retention of large forces in friendly countries.

It does not warrant the use of veteran airmen to fly empty coke bottles over the dangerous "hump" of the Himalayas or to bring tile from Bombay to Karachi to build an officers' club; or the misuse of countless other men in equally galling variants of "polishing the brass." Nor, above all, does it excuse the bewilderingly conflicting statements and counter-statements, policies and counter-policies, which leave thousands of stranded men perpetually on the raw edge of doubt, filled one day with frantic hopes, only to be thrown into despair the next, convinced from first to last that those who have the power to move them about the world like so many pawns lack the slightest idea of what they are doing.

The present strength of the army is 4,100,000, which, despite a commendable speeding up in the discharge process over the past two months, is still 50 per cent of what it was the day our forces joined the Russians at Torgau last spring. The objective for next July, as set by the War Department, is 1,550,000. General McNarney, commanding our forces in the European theater, says that he will need no more than 300,000 men to occupy Germany, and roughly the same number are required by General MacArthur for the Pacific theater.

Why, then, the new order to apply the brakes? Especially since voluntary enlistments to date—and anything but an all-out recruiting effort has been made—total 400,000, of which 89 per cent represent experienced military man-power. What has happened in the two months since an accelerated demobilization was ordered to justify President Truman in warning of "the critical need for troops overseas" and a consequent slowdown in redeployment? And, finally, if a slowdown really is necessary, why, upon receiving word of the demonstrations, does Chief of Staff Eisenhower order all theater commanders to cut man-power requirements "to the minimum" and to return "without delay" and regardless of points all men for whom there is no military need? It is precisely this endless series of quick-change acts rather than the rate of demobilization that is driving our troops to increasingly heated demonstrations in the streets of Europe and Asia.

Statistics aside, a mountain of evidence is piling up to show that unless drastic changes are made, our occupation troops will do more harm than good. There is no space here to recount the voluminous and authenticated reports of the swift decay of our forces through idleness and frustration; of their degeneration from a spirited fighting machine to a loose aggregation of bitter men, thousands of whom have gone over to wholesale peddling on the black markets of the world, to looting and wanton violence. These men were not trained for police duty; they were trained for combat. Irrationally—and characteristically—thousands of men whose training would fit them for occupation duties, whose service should just now be commencing, are eligible for discharge under the same point system as that applied to the men who did the fighting. And, equally fantastic, new men now going through their basic training are given the old G. I. routine instead of being schooled in police work.

As a result of the demonstrations, a new and sweeping revision of the demobilization program is promised, despite Acting Secretary of War Royall's attempt to whitewash the army and Congress and throw all the blame on public "hysteria." Public clamor is a minor factor alongside a Congress that refuses to bear the onus of framing a policy and an army that was able to raise volunteer parachute and submarine units but lacked the foresight to recruit, long ago, an occupation force—small, mobile, highly trained, and willing to see the job through to the end.

Peace in China?

FOR the first time since the split in the Kuomintang in 1927 the prospects for a basic settlement in China begin to look favorable. A last-minute compromise which permitted a "cease-fire" order to be issued a few hours before the opening of the Political Consultative Council enabled that body to get off to an auspicious start. For this achievement considerable credit must go to General Marshall, whose intervention to break a deadlock in the military talks would have been impossible if he had not gained the confidence of both sides. In contrast to the situation a few weeks ago, when the United States was actively cooperating with Chungking in its struggle with the Communists, this country is now playing a valuable and legitimate role as peacemaker. The importance of our influence on the negotiations now underway should not be minimized. The signing of the truce revealed a willingness to compromise on the part of both the Communists and the Kuomintang which has been notably absent in the past. Of even greater promise was Chiang Kai-shek's dramatic announcement legalizing the opposition parties and proclaiming full civil rights, abolition of the secret police, the establishment of local self-government, and the release of political prisoners. As Chou En-lai, the Communist leader, pointed out, these concessions make possible the creation of a genuinely democratic government in China. They represent acceptance of the basic demands of the Democratic League and the Communists; yet they will be welcomed by the people in Kuomintang territory quite as warmly as by those under Communist influence. The desire for democracy and civil liberties has no political boundaries in China.

Although great progress has been made, we must be on guard against excessive optimism regarding an early or complete solution of China's problems. Even where agreement has been reached on principles, there will be differences over their concrete application. All the old stumbling-blocks remain, chief among them Chiang Kai-shek's insistence that the Communist armies be disbanded. While the Communists do not defend the idea of political armies, they have refused to demobilize their forces or to place them under Chungking control until a representative government with a genuine national army has been established, and in this position they are supported by the Democratic League.

Another obstacle to peace has been the question of agricultural reform, which is bound up with the question of village democracy. Heretofore the Kuomintang has demanded that local officials be appointed in Chungking and that the national land laws be generally respected. This would mean the reestablishment of feudal land control in the Communist and guerrilla areas—an impossible condition. Chiang Kai-shek's promise of local self-government based on popular elections from the "lowest strata upward" would seem to offer a basis for resolving this old and stubborn issue, although it is too early to assume that Kuomintang and Communist conceptions of popular local elections will coincide.

But certainly the most important long-range job facing the Political Council is the creation of a central administration body to carry through the reforms agreed upon. A hopeful beginning has been made with a plan to reorganize the State Council which served as the chief policy-making body until the war, when it was superseded by the Supreme National Defense Council. The plan, put forward by Dr. Sun Fo, leader of the Legislative Yuan, with the full support of the government, provides for an all-party coalition. The Communists have accepted the proposal as a basis for negotiations but the actual allotment of posts may prove a difficult matter.

The best hope of a solid settlement lies in the obvious desire of both sides to reach one. Events are moving fast for China. The commission charged with fixing the details of the truce and arranging for the protection of railways and the disarming of the Japanese has already set up headquarters in Peiping. The most important first step after the shooting stops is a demonstration by the government that Chiang Kai-shek means what he says. Compromise by both sides is necessary, but first of all confidence must be established. The enormous influence of the United States, wielded at last by a man whom everyone respects and whose mission has been clearly and publicly defined by the President, can go far to provide the guaranties of good faith that have previously been lacking.

Squeeze on Turkey

QUESTIONED about Turkey in the course of a press conference on January 8, British Foreign Secretary Bevin pointed out that one of the difficulties of the current Russo-Turkish dispute was that "no official claim" had been made. He added "The right way to deal with things is to deal with them and not carry on propaganda and wars of nerves. . . . The past record of that technique has given us great anxiety. We believe that when a war of nerves starts, the Security Council should step in and investigate and not wait until the aggression starts."

Mr. Bevin may have spoken with more bluntness than discretion, but his implied criticism of Russian diplomatic methods was well founded. For since last March, when it denounced its twenty-year treaty of friendship with Turkey, the Soviet government has been employing the classic strategy of a war of nerves. Its price for a new treaty has never been published, but a note presented to the Turkish government in June, 1945, is believed to have contained demands for exclusion of all warships except Russian and Turkish from the Dardanelles, for three bases in the neighborhood of the Straits, and for the cession to Soviet Armenia of the districts of Kars and Ardahan. Turkish rejection of these proposals was followed by increasingly sharp attacks in the Soviet press. Retorts in kind in Turkish newspapers brought accusations of "sword-rattling."

Then at the outset of the recent three-power conference great prominence was given in Moscow to an article by two Georgian professors setting up ethnological and historical claims for the return to the Georgian Soviet Republic of 10,000 square miles of Turkish territory along the Black Sea coast. Turkey has reacted with talk about preferring war to a surrender of any part of its land. Tension is naturally mounting inside the country, and the danger of incidents involving minorities like the Armenians, to whom Russia is giving ostentatious patronage, is growing. Such incidents might provide a pretext for intervention.

The provocative methods which Russia has been employing can hardly be excused; the merits of its claims against Turkey are another matter and one much more difficult to judge. So far as the Straits question is concerned, a new settlement affording Russia reasonable security against the invasion of the Black Sea by hostile navies is urgently needed to replace the out-of-date Montreux Convention. But Moscow's proposals appear to be the equivalent of a demand for exclusive guardianship of the Dardanelles, a demand not compatible with either Turkish independence or the legitimate rights of all nations for the peaceful use of an international waterway. America and Britain, however, are in a rather weak position to press this second argument as long as they maintain their respective holds on the Panama and the Suez Canal.

The problem of the Turkish-Russian boundary districts is very involved. The Turkish view is that the question was amicably settled by treaty after the last war and that until recently there had never been any hint of Russian dissatisfaction with the settlement then reached. Moreover, the Turks say, these lands have been Turkish for hundreds of years and the vast majority of their inhabitants are Turks. Actually this whole area has a very mixed population, and at different times different peoples have obtained temporary ascendancy. The confusion is illustrated by the overlapping claims of the two Soviet Republics, Georgia and Armenia.

But of course national rights are not the real issue. Georgians, Armenians, and the Turks themselves are all pawns in a much bigger game involving Russia's traditional pressure on southeastern Asia and Britain's traditional resistance. Should a conflict be precipitated, it could not be localized. Mr. Bevin's suggestion that the issue be brought before the Security Council is therefore very much in order, provided Britain, which is calling on Russia to put its cards on the table, is ready to display its own imperial hand.

American Industry's Grand Strategy

BY ALFRED FRIENDLY

A staff writer for the Washington Post on labor and economic subjects

Washington, January 13
THE White House statement issued last night announcing that the steel strike had been postponed for one week noted that the union and the United States Steel Corporation would meet again on January 16 for further collective bargaining. But it neglected to point out that the decision of whether or not there will be a strike does not depend on the results of that prospective negotiating conference. The decision will be made in New York, and the attitude of the C. I. O. United Steel Workers will have nothing to do with it. The issue is no longer one of wage increases. It is whether industry will decide to get into production or whether it will plunge this country into an insanely dangerous campaign to repeal what is left of the New Deal.

Hard to prove, but much harder to doubt, is the existence of a wide cleavage in the ranks of America's large financial and industrial interests. On one side, the side whose lunatic fringe was responsible for the "Sentinels of Detroit" advertising, is the crowd that wants a finish fight with government and labor. Like the German General Staff, it seems to have a Plan A and a Plan B. Plan A contains the maximum objectives, to be achieved by several months of strikes and industrial paralysis. By these means, anti-labor legislation is to be crippled, the "ability-to-pay" heresy scotched—at least while profits are rising—and all governmental interference, or even interest, in the subjects of wages, prices, production, and profits removed. Plan B appears to have more limited goals, which are to be won merely by threatening factory shut-downs this winter. It contemplates the extortion of such large price increases that the stabilization program and the OPA will be destroyed. Looking at their long-enduring markets, their carry-back tax relief, a labor-baiting Congress, and an indecisive White House, these interests feel they are in an inordinately powerful position, able to hold out in a long fight.

The difference between this gang and the other faction in industry is mainly one of procedure. The more moderate side is certainly not composed of Henry Wallace converts; its members simply feel that at this stage the financial impetus to settle with labor and thereby step into a world of gorgeous profits offers more certain gains than those that can be won in a dubious battle to move the nation's capital back to New York.

Last week's developments in the steel and General Motors disputes clearly revealed this intra-industry conflict to government officials obliged to carry on negotiations. They disclosed even more vividly the line-up. Leaders of the fight-to-a-finish group, it is now fairly obvious, are the du Pont-Alfred P. Sloan-G. M. financial-control (as distinct from factory management) coalition. Strangely enough, United States Steel leads the rest of the steel industry in the drive to settle up and get to work. The announcement last Friday afternoon by General Motors that it had rejected the report of the President's fact-finding board—an announcement perfectly timed to hit while negotiations were in progress between Philip Murray and President Fairless of Big Steel—was designed to support the hand of other steel companies in pressing Fairless to block a settlement.

Despite their surface differences, the steel and G. M. cases go hand in hand. Or rather, steel leads, and G. M. must inevitably follow whichever course steel takes. Tagging in the rear and bound to the same path are most of the other big manufacturing industries. In none of them is the payment of the 17½ or 18 per cent wage increase—by this time clearly the settlement amount for the C. I. O.—a decisive issue. Steel and G. M. will do for illustrations.

In the steel industry the OPA concluded after a most intensive study that to raise the over-all price ceiling by about $2.50 a ton was a super-generous way of giving the companies a profit on the products they traditionally sold at a loss—in order to keep volume high and make more profits on other items. But because of admitted difficulties in getting definite data on some items in the calculations, and because considerable figuring on future cost and operating factors was necessary, some OPA economists are willing to grant that the amount could be modified by as much as plus or minus $1. Assume for the argument that plus $1 is right and that the price increase should be nearer $3.50. Under terrific pressure from the steel industry Reconversion Director Snyder offered a figure which, although not officially announced, is almost certainly in the neighborhood of $4. He made the offer contingent on a wage settlement acceptable to the union, therefore an increase about 19 or 20 cents an hour. In view of the industry's prospective volume, productivity, tax relief, and even its present profits, it is inconceivable that the $4 would not cover 20 cents and much more. At this writing the union and Big Steel are less than five cents apart, literally a trifle in view of the price increases about to be granted to the companies.

The ability of G. M. to pay the increase of 19½ cents recommended by the fact-finding board is even clearer. No one knows it better than G. M. It has never denied it, even in its enigmatic and subject-changing rejection of the recommendations. Indeed, the disquisition on G. M.'s rich position and lush prospects was the one touch of irony in the altogether honest, convincing, and shrewd report of Dean Garrison and his fellow fact-finders. Their prognosis of G. M.'s future was almost lyrical in tone and should have sent investors scurrying to their brokers with orders in hand, while the SEC considers whether to complain against too glowing prospectus-writing.

No, paying the unions 19 cents more is not of itself the bitter draft that is gagging G. M. and the steel tycoons. Between now and next Sunday, when the steel-strike deadline is reached, their problem is to decide whether they want to make a killing in their profit account—or to kill a potentially progressive economic system. If they abandon hope of promoting industrial civil war, they can still be expected to put enormous pressure on Snyder and the OPA in order to make sure that a higher ante than $4 is put in the price-ceiling kitty for steel and to make doubly sure that a similar price increase is strewn with light and inflationary hand throughout all industry.

If the President wants to stand firm, this is his chance. If he yields, he will never have another.

What Do the People Think of Truman?

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Magazine writer and journalist, author of books on the social and political problems of the Northwest. During the war Mr. Neuberger served with the army in Alaska

Pendleton, Oregon, January 5

IN THE depths of the brick roundhouse locomotives idled rhythmically. A 4-8-8-4 Mallet towered in black grandeur over a pair of bob-tailed switch engines. On a siding a mountain-type waited to take the high iron with fifty-four cars consigned to Puget Sound. The train crew, waste and oil cans in hand, leaned against my coupé parked in the snowy gravel beside the roundhouse. From the radio grille in the car came a twangy voice, the voice of the President of the United States.

The men listened attentively. Once the words were lost as a passenger sped past with a flash of lights and staccato clicks from the switches in the yard. The President finished, and the arrogant voice of the announcer returned. Wrigley's chewing gum was thanked for allowing the President to speak.

The gray-haired engineer gave a hitch to his jumpers and put on a pair of yellow gauntlets. "Been waiting half a year to hear him talk like that," the engineer said. "He shoulda done it last spring. You can't win over them do-nothings in Congress with a free meal. You've got to go to the mat with 'em." A young brakeman, lantern in hand, nodded assent. "He's gotta be a real President, the way F. D. R. was. We don't want a namby-pamby. We want a guy who'll make those fellows sit up and take notice. I hope he stays tough now and doesn't kiss and make up in a week or so."

After the train crew had gone and a highball had been given from the darkness, the yardmaster kept his foot on the running-board of the coupé. "Those trainmen all probably voted for Roosevelt four times," he said. "Me, I'm a Republican. I never voted for him. Yet I think we could use him now. Congress doesn't want to do a damn thing. Democrats and Republicans—they're all gutless wonders. Truman's only chance is to get the home folks to put pressure on every one of them."

When Harry Truman first moved into the White House, his associates may have convinced him that what the voters wanted was relief from war-time controls and from the kind of government Roosevelt had been giving them. On a trip into twenty-two states I found no evidence that people felt that way. Indeed, the contrary seemed to be true. I talked to barbers, taxi drivers, waitresses, bellhops, locomotive engineers, brakemen, dining-car stewards, mechanics, soldiers and sailors, storekeepers, red-caps, and the owners of at least half a hundred farms and ranches, and I would summarize the attitude of the voters as follows: (1) the majority worship Franklin D. Roosevelt's memory; (2) they want the government to break the housing jam if it has to call on the builders of the Alcan Highway and the atomic bomb to do the job; and (3) they feel kindly toward Mr. Truman and hope he will succeed.

With respect to Roosevelt's standing, my judgment is reinforced by the National Opinion Research Center of the University of Denver, which in a recent nation-wide inquiry asked, "In all the history of the United States who do you regard as the two or three greatest men who have ever lived in this country?" Sixty-one per cent of the men and women interviewed named Franklin D. Roosevelt as one of their choices, 57 per cent Abraham Lincoln, 46 per cent George Washington, and 11 per cent Thomas A. Edison. The Denver poll found only resentment against the attempt of the Pearl Harbor committee to smear the late President's name. In Portland, Oregon, senior students of the two largest high schools cast 549 votes for Roosevelt as the First American of all time and 547 votes for Lincoln. The Oregonian, a leading Republican paper, conceded that this decision was "probably indicative of parental opinion as well."

A lawyer in Missoula, Montana, said, "I'm darned if I can understand why my son and his family can't get a place to live. My son was a Seabee in the navy. He tells me the Seabees leveled half the hills on Guam and built airfields and barracks. I wish Truman would call out eight or ten Seabee battalions and have them put up houses." He gestured toward the timbered hills. "They could go into these Montana Rockies and cut enough pine lumber for millions of houses," he added.

In the shadow of Grand Coulee a country editor shook his head dolefully. "Roosevelt put up this dam," he said, "the biggest dam on earth. Truman ought to follow the same principle in putting up houses. The power boys were against the dam. The real-estate boys will be against the houses. But I know that the people want houses just as they wanted the dam."

The engineer at the throttle of the Milwaukee's transcontinental limited, eastbound, before he mounted his cab in a little settlement at the bottom of a gorge in Idaho, said, "I voted for Roosevelt four times because he was on our side. I think Truman's heart is in the right place, but he's got to use a big stick on Congress. Maybe he's going to do it at last. I felt sick when he went on that barbecue with a lot of the Congressmen who are knifing the people. Maybe he's worked all that out of his system now."

As to President Truman's labor policies, the opposition of the leaders of organized labor to the cooling-off period and the fact-finding boards is not apparent among the rank and file. "Seems pretty reasonable to me," said a C. I. O. logger working a sawmill near Portland. "Can't see where it infringes labor's rights," observed one of Dave Beck's teamsters. A longshoreman at Astoria, near the stormy mouth of the Columbia River, thought carefully before he expressed his opinion. "I know Bridges and Phil Murray are against Truman's plan for ending strikes," he said. "I don't agree with them. If labor doesn't accept Truman's plan, the friends of big business in Congress are likely to put labor in a strait-jacket. And what is the alternative to Truman except men like Dewey and Bricker and Taft?"

President Truman

After the death of Roosevelt his enemies exulted that "one-man government" and "federal tyranny" were no more. But a Union Pacific fireman in an Oregon town remarked to me: "We railroad workers are sick and tired of transporting skiers and vacationers and a lot of playboys when the returning soldiers can't get on the trains. Why doesn't the government kick all these people off the Pullmans and put on the soldiers instead? We men have talked of refusing to move a train out of the yards unless it's kept for veterans."

A poll conducted in the Bay area by the San Francisco Chronicle showed a fourteen-to-one majority for continuing price control and the OPA. The lifting of the ceiling price on citrus fruits caused a surge of affection for the OPA in many housewives' bosoms. The sudden spurt in the price of oranges showed them how the cost of the whole breakfast would skyrocket if the OPA were liquidated. Chester Bowles, if much maligned in industrial circles, is a popular figure in many American households. "He's one of the few guys in Washington with guts," is the frequent comment of humble consumers.

The housing dilemma is least understood by our soldiers. Men who have conquered the Axis and built bases from the Arctic Circle to the Equator do not see why they must go without a roof over their heads at home. "It don't make a bit of sense," said a sergeant in the 341st Engineers whom I met in a lunch room in South Dakota. "Our outfit helped build the Alcan Highway. We just got bulldozers and steam-shovels and sailed into the job. Why not call out the 341st and have us build houses? We'd have a place to live in a few weeks."

I replied that the private contractors and the building-trades unions might feel their rights were being infringed if the army engineers erected houses. The sergeant banged down his beer so hard it sloshed on the linoleum of the counter. "To hell with the contractors and the unions!" he exclaimed. "My wife and baby and I need a place to live. My rights were infringed on when I was shipped off to the front for three years. Now to hell with the damn unions and the damn corporations that won't build me a house unless they can make big profits on the deal. I didn't make any profit out of my three years in the army."

No issue seems to hold greater peril for the President than housing. After his radio speech a former gunner in the Eleventh Air Force said, "It took less than a year for the government to have me flying on raids over Paramushiro. I hope the President can get me a house in that length of time."

Roosevelt's greatest political asset was a vague but heartfelt belief on the part of the masses that he was their friend. No propaganda could shake this belief. Out West in the 1936, 1940, and 1944 Presidential campaigns the Republican nominees paraded through districts where working people and small farmers lived amid a silence that was almost embarrassing to us who looked on. In the windows of the houses were pictures of the other candidate for President, usually captioned "A Gallant Leader" or "Our Great President."

Can Harry Truman claim this support? In Butte a Democratic Party official said to me, "Sure, our folks will vote for Truman. But will they work for him? We have thousands of miners in this town for whom Roosevelt was almost a religion. They shoved his literature under doors. At union meetings they got up and hollered for him. They marched in Democratic parades. That's why Silver Bow County went Democratic three-to-one with Roosevelt on the ticket, and Silver Bow can swing the state. Every miner was 99 per cent for Roosevelt. I'd say every miner right now was about 51 per cent for Truman. That may not be enough."

Yet it is quite apparent that the bulk of the people like Harry Truman. A vast reservoir of good-will is still at his disposal. But unless he can prove himself a leader, it may seek some other political channel. Captain Harold Stassen appeals to young voters. Many liberals in the Middle West have expressed agreement with Robert La Follette of the Chicago Sun that progressives should be ready for independent action if the Democratic Party proves an unreliable instrument for reform.

The President's hard-hitting radio talk helped him. "He sounded like a real President, didn't he?" said a soldier back on his dairy farm along the Columbia River in Washington. "Maybe he's going to show us that he and Roosevelt have the same ideas, after all."

"The New Veteran"

[The Nation believes in freedom of expression for its reviewers. Walter Bernstein presented us with a special problem when he handed in his review of Charles G. Bolté's "The New Veteran." For the review was less a report on Mr. Bolté's book than a direct political attack on a veterans' organization. For this reason we considered it essential to allow a member of the American Veterans' Committee to reply, and invited Merle Miller to do so.]

Attacking Mr. Bolté

BY WALTER BERNSTEIN

Formerly staff writer for Yank in Italy and Yugoslavia; now with the New Yorker; author of "Keep Your Head Down"

CHARLES G. BOLTE'S book "The New Veteran" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2) is an account of his "convalescence from a wound suffered at El Alamein, an analysis of veterans' problems, and an indication of their solution. The personal section is brief, gracious, and nicely understated. Bolté is an American who fought as a lieutenant in the British army; he writes honestly about war with the almost complete detachment from its more sordid aspects that only well-bred young Englishmen seem able to achieve. He approaches veterans' problems in much the same way. Bolté is now chairman of the American Veterans' Committee, a small but highly articulate group of—mainly—World War II intellectuals. His book is largely an argument for the AVC.

Bolté's approach to the veteran question is sound in the sense that he realizes it cannot be handled apart from the basic problems of society. The AVC statement of intentions calls for full employment, social security, and active participation in the UNO. It is also the only veterans' organization that is not Jim Crow. "There are many individual veteran's problems," Bolté writes, "but the one overriding veteran's problem is identical with the overriding national problem: how to create a more democratic and prosperous America in a world organized against war. . . . Mass unemployment for the nation means mass unemployment for the veteran who fought for the right to work. Intolerance, discrimination against minorities, inflation, farm foreclosures, factories turning over at half speed in the nation—all these plant at home the seeds of the same fascism which the veteran defeated abroad." There can be no quarrel with this; the words are admirable. It is unfortunate that they do not shake down into an effective program for mass progressive action.

The main reason is that Bolté seems unaware of any organic relation between the intellectual and the mass. He gives no indication that the intellectual's strength and a large measure of his direction can only come from popular movements. Nor is there any hint in "The New Veteran" that a veterans' organization can survive as a healthy force only if it ties up with other healthy forces—in this case, the labor movement. The book is full of talk about "our generation" but shows little understanding of just who make up that generation or what its immediate needs are. The great majority of veterans are wage-earners receiving less than $2,500 a year. They are returning to a country in which the Roosevelt policies have been largely thrown out of the window. The one positive ally of these veterans is the labor movement. There is no recognition of this by Bolté. He does warn against the tendency to use the veteran to smash the unions, but he also returns from a trip to Detroit convinced of "the utterly intransigent and violently opposed attitudes of management and labor."

This leads to a position of aloofness on a basic and vital matter. The intransigence in the General Motors strike is on the company's side. No veterans' organization that presumes to be progressive can equivocate on this question.

This lack of roots in the specific needs of the people leads Bolté to other attitudes that sound liberal but would work out as something else. He calls the bonus a gold brick, saying, "You get it and it's spent and then where are you? On relief. And when you ask Congress for relief . . . it says, 'Oh we gave you that bonus last year, we can't do anything more for you.'" This has the ring of truth, but the hard fact is that our economy simply cannot take care of the veteran today. Mustering-out pay is pitifully inadequate; the cost of living is still way up; full employment is being systematically sabotaged in Congress. The average veteran must have some kind of immediate monetary compensation just in order to get along. In theory the bonus may not be such a noble idea; in fact it is a pressing necessity. Bolté stresses that "the veteran who knows where he is going doesn't need much help." The fact is that too many veterans know where they are going but have not the means to get there.

This habit of thinking from the top down also puts Bolté into some curious positions on foreign policy. He believes the story that Senator Vandenberg abandoned his extreme isolationist position because he suddenly understood that a newer V-bomb might reach even to Detroit, and says he respects him the more for it. He thinks that "the question of admitting Argentina to the [San Francisco] conference was fundamentally one of choosing between a sterile, legalistic formula and following the dictates of ordinary common sense." He says, "We may feel confident that [the atom bomb] will not be used for evil purposes so long as it remains under the control of the present American, British, and Canadian governments." He feels the immediate necessity to "achieve a world order based on law, governed by representatives responsible to all the people, and guaranteeing the rights of all men."

These statements may sound generous, but they work out as either naive or irresponsible. Senator Vandenberg abandoned his old isolationist position all right, but only in favor of a new interventionist position, as shown today in China. The question of admitting Argentina to the conference was a choice between encouraging fascism or fighting it. The expression of confidence in the Western powers alone as guardians of the atom bomb is an invitation for them to continue guarding it alone. The emphasis on immediate world government is a dangerous diversion from the more immediate need for resurrection of Big Three unity, an idea not quite as pretentious as world government but rather more crucial at the moment. Bolté says very little about the specific need for England, the United States, and the Soviet Union to stick together. (Perhaps it is an oversight that his proposed United Nations Veterans' organization does not have a Russian representative.) He is all for world government. But we cannot have any order based on law unless we first have Big Three unity. And before we can start guaranteeing the rights of all men we must guarantee the rights of a few men—say, the few who are working for General Motors or the 12,000,000 American citizens who are Negroes.

Bolté's handling of the American Legion is another example. His analysis of the reactionary leadership of the Legion is entirely accurate, but he omits two vital facts. Whether you like it or not, the American Legion has become an integral part of American life on the community level, and it can offer the veteran better service on his legitimate grievances than any other veterans' organization. Those are the two chief reasons why the Legion is already the largest organization of World War II veterans in the country. It has 600,000 new members now and expects a million by spring. This fact cannot be ignored or rejected. The question is not alone whether these new men can change Legion policy; as a political machine the Legion makes Tammany look like the American Student Union. There is also the question of going where the men go and fighting for their needs with them. A new organization, noble in purpose but lacking roots and positive affiliation, can easily become isolated from the mass of veterans it claims to represent.

There is little need today for an organization of intellectuals to act as a steering committee for the veterans. There is a great need for veterans to ally themselves with progressive forces such as the labor movement on immediate, specific issues. The American Veterans' Committee will become a blind alley if it continues to regard all veterans as young college men who consider the civilian world strange and rather immoral and who feel they can remain "independent." Such people can afford to turn down a bonus or scrap the UNO for a nebulous world government. Most veterans cannot. Such people can also regard as basic the conflict between the old and the new generation. This is another luxury most veterans cannot afford. A veteran on a picket line has more in common with another striker who was in the last war than he has with a veteran from this war who is inside the plant.

No new veterans' organizations can be all things to all men. Sooner or later the time must come when it cannot please Henry Luce and the veterans who are striking in Detroit. Sooner or later it must face the contradiction of being all for a community of nations and yet nodding favorably on our hoarding of the atom bomb. No new veterans' organization can stand outside the fighting within the United States today. It cannot, as Bolté does, set up capital and labor as "two behemoths . . . belaboring each other over which gets the major cut of a pie," with the veteran standing on the sidelines. This is doing just what Bolté warns against—setting up the veteran as a separate class.

The path which Bolté charts for the veteran is well intentioned, but it can be seductive and misleading. His book does not face two basic questions: on whose terms does the veteran return to civilian life, and with whom is the veteran supposed to ally himself in his fight for jobs and peace? Unless these questions are raised and answered, any approach to the veteran question will be superficial and any new veterans' organization will be built on sand.

Rebutting Mr. Bernstein

BY MERLE MILLER

Former editor of the Continental and Pacific editions of Yank; author of "Island 49," a novel

A NEW veterans' organization has emerged from every war which the United States has fought. Charles Bolté's book is an eloquent, factual, detailed account of the beginning and history of the group which at present seems most likely to capture the imagination of the men who fought World War II, the American Veterans' Committee. To tell that story Bolté, quite rightly, has explained how and why he became the first national chairman.

In many ways Bolté is a quite typical member of the generation which fought and won the war. He began as an isolationist; there are few of us who didn't. Even those who had not read Ernest Hemingway, Dos Passos, Walter Millis, or "Merchants of Death" had absorbed the cynicism that followed the First World War; it wasn't necessary to be an intellectual to be convinced that war solves nothing, that it is only organized mass murder. But, again like the rest of us, Bolté changed his mind after, in his case, bumming to the West Coast and back. What he was beginning to think after the fall of France he was sure of on April 24, 1941, when resistance ended in Greece. He wrote an all-out interventionist letter at that time, which was printed on the front page of the Dartmouth College daily.

Bolté had reluctantly decided that we must fight for survival. He had shifted his position gradually, as honest, clear-thinking men are likely to do. He did not wait for the latest communiqué from Moscow and did not make up his mind because of a morning editorial in Pravda.

On July 10, 1941, Bolté and four friends sailed from New York to join the British army. That was not typical. Most of us waited for the draft. At El Alamein he lost a leg, and of his four companions, two "got the limps, two got death." About that, as about war in general, Bolté writes with simple feeling, in somewhat the same deprecating manner in which most disabled veterans, well-bred young Englishmen or not, are likely to describe what happened to them.

On his return to the United States Bolté joined the American Legion, but he soon found that while individual members of the Legion protested vehemently that they wanted "the boys" to take over, there was no practicable way for the veterans of this war to do so; that, in fact, the tight, entrenched hierarchy of the Legion was so organized that an expression of democratic sentiment was impossible. The famous but ineffectual Willard Straight Post of New York had tried and been ousted for its efforts, then later reinstated somewhat chastened. More recently the officers of a Hollywood post were deposed because they dared admit a Japanese American to membership, and earlier in 1945 the national chairman of the Legion's Employment Committee refused to attend the National Conference of Union Labor Legionnaires because, he said, "your organization has no standing in the American Legion and no authority to speak for it."

The whole history of the Legion has emphasized its reactionary national policy, even though, as Bolté points out, its membership, for the most part, has consisted of upper-middle-class business men mainly interested in frequent social get-togethers and an annual spree at the national convention. The Legion was organized in Paris in 1919 by a handful of high-ranking officers who have never let go, though some of the original members have, of course, had to pass on the reins to others. The chief purpose of that Paris group was to combat "bolshhevism"—meaning, as it later proved, the books of such mild-mannered progressives as Harold Rugg and Charles and Mary Beard, meaning in many communities (mine in Iowa, for one) organized labor, meaning quite often the sentiments expressed in the Bill of Rights.

Of course, in one sense things have changed of late. The national officers of the Legion are still fencing with the Bolsheviks, worrying about Russia, and awarding their 1945 Distinguished Service medal to William Randolph Hearst. But the Communists, in the cities where they are active, are joining up in small but enthusiastic numbers. Mr. Bernstein's attitude toward the Legion so exactly reflects that of the Communists that one is led to question his entire handling of Bolté's book.

In any case he seems to have skipped many passages of the book, either through careless reading or for reasons one hopes are his own. For example, he finds Bolté and the American Veterans' Committee too little concerned with labor. He does not mention, though it is clearly outlined in the book, the AVC's fight against Local Board Memorandum 190-A issued by the national Selective Service, the seniority ruling which can be and is being used by employers in an attempt to break unions—witness the full-page General Motors ads deploring the fate of the poor non-union veteran. The American Legion, as well as the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the Disabled War Veterans, has proposed that seniority be given for time in service for the purpose of new employment provided no one is laid off to make room for the veteran, unless—and unless is the significant word—the lay-off is for ninety days or more.

Obviously, Bolté points out, anti-union management could very carefully choose a strong union department, close it for ninety days, then rehire carefully screened anti-union veterans. Organized labor is opposed to any such proposal; so is the AVC. Organized labor is fighting super-seniority for veterans; so is the AVC. Labor has its representatives in Washington to protest in person; so does the AVC.

Bolté may be an intellectual—he has read a book, an apparently criminal offense in Mr. Bernstein's view—but he appeared before Congress to make a strong appeal for passage of the full-employment bill. No representative of the American Legion made any appeal at all—and will not.

True, the AVC has not supported a bonus; this particular member hopes it will not. Anyone who remembers 1932 should know a bonus is the answer to nothing. Jobs are the answer, jobs for everyone, not just for twelve million veterans.

The AVC has never believed that veterans can or should remain "independent"; there is no such statement in "The New Veteran." The AVC is convinced that veterans must ally themselves with labor, and Bolté quite clearly says so. Attempts to divide the two groups—and they are being made constantly—will lead, Bolté says, to "a fight which can end only in a struggle to see which group gets more and more of less and less, for neither can live without the other."

As another example of Mr. Bernstein's treatment of "The New Veteran," consider the sentences he chooses to quote on foreign policy. He picks out the one saying, "The question of admitting Argentina to the UNO conference [in San Francisco] was fundamentally one of choosing between a sterile, legalistic formula and following the dictates of common sense." But Mr. Bernstein does not give the sentences that follow: "The formula won out, in the traditional and disturbing style of the League of Nations between the wars. . . . This was hailed by the American press as a victory over Russia, but to those of us who had fought this war as a war against fascism it seemed a singularly hollow victory." Again Mr. Bernstein quotes, "We may feel confident that [the atomic bomb] will not be used for evil purposes so long as it remains under the control of the present American, British, and Canadian governments." He does not quote the more significant sentences that come immediately after: "We cannot expect other nations to feel the same confidence; we can be quite sure that other nations will take urgent steps to perfect the practical means necessary to apply the known principles of atomic fission. . . . The only way to rob the atomic bomb of its terrible threat is to vest control of it in the hands of some power higher than that of mere nations."

The examples given are typical of Mr. Bernstein's method. Most veterans are not interested in the latest switch in the party line. They are concerned, and mightily, with finding a job, a place to live, with the kind of world organization which will make another war impossible. As for veterans' groups, the significant fact is not that 600,000 veterans of this war have joined the Legion—a claim, incidentally, open to some doubt, for the Legion is as reluctant as General Motors to open its books for public inspection—but that, despite the millions the Legion is spending on its recruiting campaign, most of the five million men already discharged have not joined any organization at all.

Perhaps the veterans' group that will grow out of this war, as one has grown out of every other war in which the United States has participated, is not yet formed. It was nearly a year after the Armistice in 1918 before the Legion got under way. Meanwhile, few of the millions of young Americans who voted for Franklin D. Roosevelt are going to join an old-line, backward-looking, reactionary group of the last war. Socially, they want a club of their own. And even the most naive of us learned from Munich that you can't overcome evil by joining with it; you must fight it. As for a combination of the extreme right and the extreme left, that was part of the trouble in Germany in 1932. It might contain the seeds of an American fascism.

Approximately 500 young veterans of this war are now joining the American Veterans' Committee every week. They are not all intellectuals; very few of them are graduates of either Dartmouth or Harvard; only a handful have even a nodding acquaintance with the five-foot shelf. They are paying their three-dollar membership to the AVC because it represents a hope for the future, a group of men who are not interested in double-talk but who mean certain things, say so, and then proceed to fight for them.

A great many of the fighting men of this war learned that you can't defeat an enemy by boring from within. You have to organize your strength and fight. That conviction will not die easily.

In the Wind

OUR SPECIAL AGENT for UNO affairs swears this story is true. Before the United States delegates left for the UNO conference they asked the British embassy in Washington whether there would be any customs restrictions on the baggage they took. After consulting the regulations, an attaché informed them that "the delegates may bring any amount and type of baggage they desire, except that in firearms they will be limited to one rifle and 500 rounds of ammunition per person."

AFTER SURVEYING Midwestern editorial opinion on the UNO's decision to locate in the East, we can't understand why the United Nations ever passed over the Middle West in choosing a permanent site. The Indianapolis Star of December 30 said the commission obviously hadn't realized one advantage of the section: "The percentage of foreign-born population is low and alien ideologies make little impression on the majority." The Chicago Tribune merely growled that "the United Nations have decided to locate not in an American but in an alien seat."

THE WHEEL HAS COME full cycle. Randolph Churchill's syndicated column from Rome, published here January 2, led off with a "fervent wish for the year 1946" that Italian trains will start running on time again.

UNDERGROUND HUMOR is now coming out of Palestine in the best tradition of the anti-Hitler gags that used to filter out of occupied Europe. Here's the latest: "Why is the British Labor government like a violin?" Answer: "Because it's held by the left and played on by the right."

THE AMERICAN VETERANS' COMMITTEE reported a big week in the January 1 issue of its bi-monthly publicity bulletin. Legislation signed by President Truman liberalizing the G. I. Bill of Rights included several AVC recommendations; the Marine Corps announced acceptance of Nisei enlistments, a result of AVC needling of the Navy Department; and Bill Maudlin signed up as a new member.

AN ARMY OFFICER who taught political warfare to G. I.'s at a camp in the Southwest told us about an examination he gave to 300 prospective trainees. Part of the test was a word-association affair. He says that the three responses most frequently scribbled in reaction to the word "Russia" were "anarchists," "godlessness," and "free love."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Britain and Empire Planning

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

The Nation's London correspondent

London, January 4

CHRISTMAS has come and gone. With so many families united for the first time in years, it was a happy interlude; Santa Claus did his best with "austerity" toys, and the black market in turkeys was broken at the eleventh hour by the public's commendable refusal to pay more than the "control" price. Hogmanay had to be celebrated in most cases without the traditional "dram"; but then, glad though we are to have said farewell to 1945 with its deliverances and disillusionments, there was little inclination to hail the advent of 1946 save soberly. Rosy spectacles are not being worn this chilly winter. Having withstood defeats without despair and achieved victories without vain-glory, the British people view the future with neither fear nor enthusiasm. War weariness, native phlegm, or sound philosophy toughened by experience? One guess is as good as another. What is certain is that John Bull today is more of a realist—unsentimental and a trifle cynical—then he has ever been. With both feet on the ground he has no heroes and few—perhaps too few—hatreds; and he no longer believes in "happily ever after" fairy stories. Had the Moscow conference ended, like the war-time meetings of the Big Three, with an announcement that complete unanimity had been achieved and a road paved to the millennium, Britishers would have shrugged their shoulders in profound skepticism.

Certainly no such claim was made by Mr. Bevin on his return from Moscow: by all accounts he came home with a sore head, and did not disguise from his colleagues his resentment at having been "sold down the river" by Mr. Byrnes. Indeed, the general impression here of the agreements reached is that Mr. Byrnes and Mr. Molotov did a deal very much à deux. With a modicum of face-saving concessions on each side the United States and the Soviet Union maintained substantially their respective claims to spheres of influence in the Pacific and Eastern Europe. On the items in which the British Foreign Secretary was really interested—Persia, the mandate for Tripolitania, the future of truncated Germany—there was neither any agreement nor, it seems, much American support for the British point of view. It is something, of course, that the deadlock which followed the London conference last autumn has been broken. There is now enough superficial collaboration among the Big Three—or perhaps one should say Big Two—to enable the General Assembly of the UNO to go ahead with its program of work. But with so many fundamental issues shelved or postponed, the signal-light given the Assembly is amber, not green.

Meanwhile Labor M.P.'s have been spending the recess in sounding the views of their constituents—always a salutary corrective to the slightly esoteric atmosphere engendered in the closed community of the House of Commons—and in taking a brief rest before facing up to the arduous program of legislation ahead. First comes the Coal-Industry Nationalization bill, tabled by Mr. Shinwell just before the Christmas adjournment. As the first major instalment of the government's plan for remodeling industry, this measure has been getting close scrutiny during the holidays and will lead to tough debates—with some criticism from both sides of the House. So far as the future structure of the industry is concerned, the outstanding feature of the bill is the wide power given to the Minister of Fuel. He will appoint a Board of Management for the mines consisting of nine experts chosen without reference to any organized interests. The board will have full responsibility for the day-to-day running of the pits, but the Minister, advised by two councils representing domestic and industrial users of coal, will give the board "general directions." This may, in practice, mean a lot, for the Minister will decide what repayments the industry is to make to the Treasury in respect both of the $600,000,000 which it is now to receive for reequipment and of the compensation liability which the state assumes toward existing owners. On his decision will largely depend the industry's ability to pay the needed better wages without raising coal prices to a level which would make British manufactures non-competitive.

Mr. Shinwell enjoys, and deserves, the party's confidence, and there will be no disposition to quarrel with the extent of the authority delegated to him. The really controversial issue is the amount of compensation to be awarded to the colliery companies and the method of its payment. Over the past eighteen years the mining industry made average annual profits of $27,500,000. An Arbitration Tribunal is now to decide what would be the industry's "reasonable net maintainable revenue" if it were not nationalized, and to say how many years' purchase of the annual figure thus estimated would represent fair compensation. Since future costs and selling prices are problematic, this is a tough conundrum for the Tribunal; and its task is immensely complicated by a second instruction, namely, to value the industry as if it were being transferred on normal commercial terms from "a willing seller to a willing buyer." This basis of valuation is regarded by many Labor M. P.'s as an act of appeasement to the companies owning pits which have for years suffered losses and recouped them out of the "equalization" levy on pit-head prices. How can there be a hypothetical "willing buyer" of pits whose future "maintainable revenue" is a minus quantity?

The Tories, well enough pleased at the arbitration machinery, are up in arms against a proviso in the bill giving the government the right to make non-marketable the government stock which will be handed over in compensation.

True, this salutary clause—aimed at preventing flight of capital into, say, a Wall Street boom—can be got over, as the bill stands, by the simple device of putting an ex-coaliery company into voluntary liquidation. But the financial district detects the thin end of a wedge driven into the sanctity of free ownership of capital, and Tory M. P.'s will fight the clause tooth and nail. What the average Labor voter would like to know is why expropriated shareholders in coal mines or any other nationalized industry should receive more than annuities terminable in, say, fifteen or twenty years. If, as seems likely, compensation is inflated and equity shareholders are given bonds representing a perpetual lien on the community, the process of nationalization may easily lead to a revival of agitation for a capital levy. Otherwise the rentier, removed from the shoulders of this or that particular industry, will weigh as heavily as ever on the back of the producer in general.

After coal will come national insurance—another big bill scheduled for the early spring. Our legislators will have plenty on their hands, but they will have to spare some time from bills to consider a question which the dollar loan and the entry into Bretton Woods have made fundamental and urgent—the development of Britain's foreign trade. There is little point now in rehearsing the unresolved doubts and disquietude with which Parliament reluctantly indorsed the Washington agreements. Britain has taken its decision, and, subject to the attitude of Congress, there can be no going back on it. But this perhaps is worth saying, to avoid misconceptions on your side of the Atlantic: the opposition to the loan was based, not on the fact that the interest was fixed at an "ungenerous" figure—the service of the loan need not be in itself an unduly heavy burden—but simply and solely on the loan's subsidiary conditions vetoing "discrimination" and "bilateral reciprocity" in foreign trade. It was not love for the commercial devices of Dr. Schacht but genuine inability to see how Britain can survive in a laissez faire "mutilateral" world dominated by the great and highly discriminatory customs unions of the United States and the Soviet Union that motivated the critics of the Washington pact. The question which is posed sharply to Labor M. P.'s is, what are we to do about it?

Everything depends on our ability to achieve a volume of exports 75 per cent greater than in 1938 before the American line of credit is exhausted. Unless we can reach that export target we shall be forced into so restricting imports and internal purchasing power as to make nonsense of full-employment policy. Can we reach it? Since we are no longer exporters of coal and will have little enough to spare in the way of other raw materials or foodstuffs, we shall be compelled practically to double our exports of manufactures, valued in 1938 at $1,460,000,000. What markets are there to absorb these increased shipments? Europe's purchases, except on extended credit terms—which we cannot afford to give—are likely to be smaller, not greater, than before the war, and in the Latin American and Far Eastern markets British goods will be up against formidable United States competition. It follows that the bulk of the necessary expansion of British exports must be achieved within the Empire and in trade with such "sterling-area" countries as Egypt, and this task will be made more difficult if imperial preference is to be reduced in exchange for tariff reductions elsewhere, whose result will obviously not be a specifically British gain.

Faced with this problem, many Labor M. P.'s are turning their minds to the possibility of increasing inter-Empire trade along lines of planned long-term, bulk-purchase contracts with prices settled for a number of years ahead. Admittedly the Washington agreements contain a formal ban on "reciprocal" trade bargains, but many persons here hold that this means simply a veto on imports with definite strings on them. There is nothing in the letter of the agreements to forbid two countries freely entering—with no compulsion exercised by either party—a mutual trade pact to buy from each other x tons of such and such goods at stated prices. Such a system would, of course, imply close state control—perhaps approaching a monopoly—of import-export transactions, but no Socialist would quarrel with that principle. Moreover, there is much to be said, from Britain's standpoint, in favor of agreements designating the kind of goods we want to exchange with the dominions and our other sterling creditors. If production within the Empire is to be reasonably "complementary"—as opposed to a competitive scramble between secondary industries here, there, and everywhere—and if there is to be orderly development of the backward colonies and Middle East countries, physical planning of Empire resources is just as logical and necessary as planned location of industries in Britain. That, at any rate, is a line of thought of which more is likely to be heard as the consequences of our entry into Bretton Woods are fully weighed.

Réveillon in Paris

BY IDA TREAT

An American writer who has lived in France for many years; author of "The Anchored Heart," the story of a Breton island under the Germans

Paris, January 4

IN A way we were all survivors. Even Jeanne's mother, home that day after five years' exile in a mountain village—a floor of beaten earth, water one hundred yards down the slope, and no one to chop wood for her. Eighty-two, and her joints swollen with rheumatism. "I have lost the habit of society," she said. There was André, back from six years' fighting on the sea; Pierre, on leave from the Rhineland after two years in the maquis, a Gestapo prison, and the campaigns of Alsace and the Danube. There was Charles, Jeanne's husband, whose prisons had all been in France; Jeanne, who had toiled in the underground month after month; our Martha, who was cooking the dinner. And there was the girl from Auschwitz.

For all of us it was our first Réveillon in Paris since 1939. Jeanne warned us, it would not be a feast. The chicken promised from the country had not arrived; the family meat ration would have to stretch for seven. There would be vegetable soup, a salad, and she had made an apple tart. And she was afraid dinner would be late—she had had to take her weekly page to the printer's and she had been late getting back.

We sat in a circle about the sawdust-burning stove—the furnace had not been lighted for five years. Two bottles of red wine stood warming beside it. Through the open door the heat filtered into the dining-room. Out in the hallway the thermometer stood at freezing, and in the kitchen by the gas stove—Jeanne had tied an apron over her fur coat—it was only a degree or so higher. Condensed steam ran in rivulets down the walls and gathered in pools on the tiled floor. Poor Jeanne, we said, and pulled our chairs closer to the fire.

"Go easy with that," Charles warned, as a Directoire armchair creaked and wobbled. "It's the last of three to survive the occupation. Those delicate old things haven't much resistance."

Someone remarked—apropos of "resistance"—that certain words had become so associated in our minds with one distinct theme that they sounded almost startling when used in any other connection. "Like 'collaboration.' Could you imagine asking anyone to 'collaborate'?"

Pierre said that reminded him of his amazement on reading a notice in a taxi in pre-war Berlin: "Don't open the windows without permission of the Führer." Even those of us who knew no German got that one. Mlle Kahn, the girl from Auschwitz, did not laugh; probably she hadn't listened. She looked up frowning. "It's like the word 'selection.'"

Nobody spoke for a moment. We had all heard of the grim "selections" in the death camps; we also knew what had happened to her parents and her sister.

Charles asked if she had received any news of her flat. What were the chances of her getting it back?

"Not very good. The man Vichy put there has four children. You can't put them into the street. And after all, what would I do with eight rooms?" It was her father's flat, she explained.

Even the bergère in which she sat looked much too big for her. She filled about one-third of it. Mlle Kahn was the only deportee I knew who had put on no weight to speak of since her return. I found myself looking at her hands—delicate artist hands, almost transparent. Of the four women she was the only one to wear new clothes. Given the Paris prices, her knitted suit and fur-lined shoes must have cost a fortune.

She seemed suddenly conscious of our concerned faces. "I can't help thinking what all this would have meant a year ago—to be warm and clean and among friends. I'm afraid I should have put it in just that order."

"I couldn't have endured the filth," said Jeanne from the doorway. "The only time I was arrested, they wouldn't let me take anything with me, not even a handkerchief. They said I would be home by night; they only wanted to ask me a few questions. You can imagine what I looked like when they let me out—after nine weeks at Fresnes."

I asked Mlle Kahn how long she had been at Auschwitz.

"Two years."

"It must have been a grand moment when the Russians came," said Charles.

Mlle Kahn nodded. "They gave us what food they could—salt pork and flour—and they brought us water. The battle was all around us. Most of us were too far gone for enthusiasm."

Jeanne's mother woke out of a doze to ask abruptly, "Was it a Russian who broke your wrist?"

We stared, and Mlle Kahn said patiently, "No, that was a fellow-prisoner, a Pole. You see, I was dipping up snow to make drinking-water for the children, and he wanted the pail."

"Speaking of the prisoners," Pierre began. But Jeanne's mother spoke again. Either she had not caught the reply or she had lost interest. Smiling a little childishly, she looked from one face to the other and in the tone of a lady-in-hersalon asked: "Isn't anyone going to sing?"

Perhaps we needed that shock to sound the gulf separating this Réveillon, 1945, from the others. In other days Charles or a fellow-southerner would have given us a Gascon carol—a gay old thing, its Christmas theme embellished with allusions to forgotten controversies. Jeanne's mother or the soldier son would have replied with a carol from the Alsatian border, and Jeanne herself after much urging would have sung one of the old Protestant hymns of Franche Comté. It wasn't only the missing voices, or that the old intimacy was lacking, or that we all felt, unquestionably, older. The fact was there—after the years France and Europe had lived through, you didn't sing.

Disappointed in her hopes of music, the old lady dozed again by the fire while the talk surged on. Beyond a brief reference to the devalued franc and the return to the bread ration there was little talk of France. Or of personal problems in the immediate future, though they loomed big for most of us. Peace—the Moscow conference—America and Russia—world peace: it brought us back inevitably to the problem of Germany, the ghost that sits in permanence at every French hearth. How were we to lay that ghost?

Pierre, military governor of a small German city, said he wasn't over-optimistic. He felt convinced that the Russians too thought little could be done with the present generation of Germans, those from eighteen to fifty; that they based their policy on that belief and acted accordingly. "They don't waste their time sorting out the little sheep and goats.

Every German today is an anti-Nazi if you take him at his word. I'm not sure the Russian method isn't the right one. On our side we back the church. Alles für Deutschland; Deutschland für Christus. There's still too much 'Deutschland' in all that, to my way of thinking. Over and over I tell them, 'You can't be a nation yet. You've got to learn all over, learn to live. Later on, we'll see.'"

"Still we have to count on someone. Who but the anti-Nazis?"

"Agreed," said Pierre. "I'm with you. We'll back the anti-Nazis. But here's a case in point—my chief of police. He offered all the guaranties: escaped from a K-L in '34; International Brigade in Spain; enlisted in the French army in '39; handed over to Nazis by Vichy. The right sort, indubitably the right sort. But from the day I made him chief of police, he changed. Changed overnight. A little authority, and there you were. The old Prussianism in all its glory. I had to replace him."

I asked the girl from Auschwitz, had she seen Martin-Chauffier's article about the behavior of German prisoners in the death camps? One heard so many stories. Were they as bad as all that?

"Some of them," she admitted. "Particularly the 'supervisors.' " A German fellow-prisoner, a woman, had heaved rocks at her when the stones she was lifting slipped from her numbed fingers. (A long red scar showed through the meshes of her stocking.) But another German woman had saved her twice from the "selections" and had risked her life to do so—she wasn't a Jewess either. "You mustn't generalize. The records of all the nations in camp were just as mixed."

She leaned forward in her chair, her long hands clasped about her knees.

"Isn't the problem bigger than just Germany? So often at night when the camp was still—snow outside on the frozen marshes, and the chimneys of the crematory sending up great flames among the stars—I used to think, if this can happen here, or anywhere on this globe, isn't it a sign that something is wrong with all of us? Perhaps with man himself? I—I used to despair," she added in a low voice.

"It's worth while pondering," said Charles. He glanced at his watch and switched on the radio. A thin treble of children's voices came over the air. Il est né, le divin enfant. . . .

Mlle Kahn hitched her chair nearer.

"The children," she whispered. "When I hear that, I think—you know, generally they didn't use gas. They forced us to undress them—they forced women to do that. And, afterward, to wheel the go-carts to the storehouse. One hundred women, pushing the empty baby-carriages. And we didn't refuse; we wanted to live. Isn't that enough to brand us?"

As the carol ended, we heard the bells over Paris. They roused Jeanne's mother. She smiled sleepily.

"Peace on earth."

"To men of good-will—if and where we find them," Pierre completed. "Which doesn't mean we won't keep our eyes open. What about it, Mlle Kahn?"

"I'm afraid I'm a poor one to judge," murmured the girl from Auschwitz. While Jeanne called from the dining-room: "Minuit, Chrétiens! And the soup's on the table."

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Wall Street Fireworks

AFTER a short, minor post-Christmas recession the Stock Exchange appears to be gathering momentum for a bigger and better boom. On January 8, following news that steel prices would be raised, stocks resumed their upward trend in "a broad and buoyant" manner, as the financial reporters put it, despite the fact that business was handicapped by the Western Union strike. The next morning my Wall Street watchdog phoned to say that the market was "terrific," with buying orders pouring in for every kind of stock.

It is now nearly four years since the present bull market started. The turn came in April, 1942, and while there have been a number of reactions since then, the "averages" have always taken two upward steps on the chart for each downward one. The last sizable setback was in the summer of 1945, after which the forward movement became increasingly vigorous. In fact, more than 40 per cent of the rise in the Dow-Jones industrial average since April, 1942, has occurred in the past six months. The volume of business on the New York Stock Exchange last year was the greatest since 1937, and the Curb Exchange had its biggest year since 1930. For the first time since the depression the public is taking a big hand in stock speculation. Market tips are once more being widely circulated; Wall Street gossip is again a dinner-table topic.

While all this profitable activity is so much sunshine to Wall Street brokers and bankers, the men in Washington who are trying to hold the lid on inflation regard it with grim displeasure. They would like to curb the stock boom before it gets out of hand, but it is a little difficult to see what they can do about it. The Federal Reserve Board exercises authority over credit facilities for stock trading, and last summer it ordered the raising of margin requirement to 75 per cent. In other words, a man who wants to buy $10,000 worth of securities must put up at least $7,500 cash. This is a far cry from the 15 and 20 per cent margins which were available prior to the 1929 crash and effectively cuts out shoe-string speculation. Moreover, this safeguard has been reinforced by New York Stock Exchange rules which prohibit any margin trading in stocks selling under $10 and require any account under $1,000 to be on a cash basis.

Such measures, however, have in no wise checked the exuberance of the stock market, for today's speculators have an abundance of ready money to back their fancies. In fact, the current steep margin requirements have increased the solidity of the market and serve in some ways to minimize the violence of reactions rather than to discourage buying. In the old days a spell of selling was likely to uncover a number of thinly margined positions and thus lead to further weakness. Today stocks are abundantly cushioned against the shocks of margin calls.

It is doubtful, therefore, whether even the total prohibition of margin trading would do much to slow down the current boom. A more drastic proposal, which has been aired in Washington from time to time, is a steep increase in the tax on capital profits. At present profits on securities held for less than six months are taxed as ordinary income, but those obtained after longer periods are subject to a maximum levy of 25 per cent—a concession which has been an immense boon to security traders. It has been suggested that a longer holding period might be required before security profits qualified for the lower rate, or that a much steeper rate might be applied. Congressional opinion, however, is not thought to be very receptive to such ideas. In addition, it is by no means certain that increased taxes, unless absolutely punitive, would serve to reduce the upward pressure on security prices. They might tend to make the market more of a one-way street than ever by encouraging people to postpone sales in the hope of an eventual revision of the levy.

Even if the present boom in stocks could be damped down, the results might well prove disappointing from the point of view of reducing inflationary pressure. For the boom is much more a symptom than a cause of inflation. Some security buyers believe that a period of unprecedented profits is ahead as the public gets an opportunity to exercise its pent-up purchasing power; others fear that a rising price level will reduce the real value of their bank accounts and bond-holdings, and they seek equities as a hedge. In so far as investment in stocks diverts funds from current consumption of goods, it is an anti-inflationary factor. When it results in the transfer of idle bank balances from buyers to sellers, its effect is neutral. What could make the boom acquire inflationary force in its own right would be the large-scale transfer of money invested in war bonds to the stock market. For if the encashment of bonds should exceed new purchases, the Treasury would probably be forced to increase its bank borrowings and thus add to the total volume of liquid funds in the country.

There is no definite evidence at this time of any such switching from savings bonds to stocks, though encashments of bonds have increased sharply since V-J Day. But there is undeniably danger of a development in this direction if blazing security markets continue. The increased interest of small-time speculators in stocks has been shown by the popularity of the "cats and dogs"—the low-priced issues of doubtful value—on the New York exchanges and of the "penny" mining stocks in such centers as Salt Lake City. SEC officials have publicly deplored gambling of this sort, and Emil Schram, president of the New York Stock Exchange, was recently quoted as saying: "People who are unable to judge values or have a competent adviser judge for them have no business buying securities. Those who scorn factual information and who conduct their operations on the basis of tips, rumors, hunches, and impulses are misusing our facilities." But solemn lectures of this kind are apt to be buried in small type and overlooked. If the Stock Exchange really wishes to discourage the market dabblers it should publish such warnings as advertisements and see they are given at least as much prominence on the financial pages as the offers of tipster sheets which are again becoming so plentiful.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

COUNT CIANO'S story of the war makers, just published in the United States,* reveals the dry rot that infected the fascist era. The most familiar actor of this drama, which covers the years from 1939 to 1943, is the author himself; his self-portrait, as it emerges from these pages of political commentary, adds little to earlier pictures of the man. Here is the well-known play boy of international diplomacy, intelligent, unscrupulous, adroit. He would have made an amusing ambassador in another time, but to the world's misfortune he was called to serve as Foreign Minister through the most decisive period of Italian history.

Perhaps the most striking feature of the Ciano diary is the utter cynicism with which it exposes the back-stage life of a decadent regime that once had its admirers even in the democratic countries. As might have been expected, King Victor Emmanuel cuts a pitiful figure. Those who are intriguing in Italy and abroad to save the House of Savoy may find here and there a chance remark that helps their cause. But taken as a whole, Ciano's descriptions of the King and his heir, the Prince of Piedmont, establish beyond doubt that this was a corrupt dynasty in the service of fascism. The King's widely heralded opposition to Mussolini is reduced to polite drawing-room disapproval. When he disagrees with the Duce it is never on major questions; he fights bravely for the title of Supreme Commander or haggles over the privilege of reviewing the divisions returning from the front. His opposition to the war is equally feeble. Victor Emmanuel is a pacifist—when the war goes badly. But at the slightest sign of improvement on the battlefield, he puffs out his diminutive chest again and assumes a warrior's stance. While His Majesty is strongly anti-Hitler, it is envy rather than ideological differences which motivates his hatred of "those ugly Germans." What he resents most is being obliged to add the precious Collar of the Annunziata to Göring's hoard of decorations. The Nazi Air Marshal is a particular source of irritation to the King—why, on his visits to Rome this fat, vulgar plebeian has boasted of a jewel collection surpassing that of the House of Savoy!

Above all, let no one accuse the King of playing favorites; he is impartially disloyal to the Duce, the generals, and the Italian people. A single idea obsesses him: to retain the few prerogatives which fascism, in order to create a good impression abroad, has left to the Crown.

The Duce appears in almost every entry of the diary. As a member of the family, Ciano offers the reader a glimpse into the private life of the Italian dictator with references to escapades at Cammillucia (the residence of his mistress, Clara Petacci), his stomach ulcer, aggravated by the reverses in Libya, and his unconcealed contempt for the King. "After the war is over," Mussolini confided to Ciano, "I shall tell Hitler to do away with all of these absurd anachronisms in the form of monarchies."

Though Ciano speaks of the Duce with respect and affection, he unwittingly reveals the instability and vacillation that marked the dictator's character. As early as September 24, 1939—three weeks after the war started—Mussolini is already revising his first optimistic judgments of German strength. As the Red Army moves into eastern Poland, he begins to feel that "Hitler is bottled up" and to anticipate the possibility of Russia's eventual entrance into the war. It is the old Socialist of 1911 who comes to the fore now, accurately assessing the fighting spirit of the Red Army and the revolutionary ardor of the Russian people. But eight months later Mussolini, carried away by the news from Norway, emphatically reaffirms his conviction that Germany will win. His impatience to get into the war deepens with each Nazi success in the West; by May 13, 1940, he is proclaiming, "We Italians are already sufficiently dishonored. Any delay is inconceivable."

In the three years that followed, Ciano faithfully recorded the ups and downs of Italy's fortunes. The last real entry in the diary is dated February 8, 1943, the day on which he relinquished the reins of the Foreign Office to become ambassador to the Holy See. Thus we are deprived of a first-hand account of Mussolini's reactions in the last critical months before defeat and, even more important, of the Vatican's role in the war. But there is enough here to indicate the Duce's hysterical nature. One day he sees himself as Napoleon atop the Pyramids of Egypt announcing the downfall of the British Empire. A few days later he is depressed and infuriated by the failures in Libya. At times like these he invariably vents his wrath on the generals, on Graziani, "who has always been seventy feet underground in a Roman tomb at Cyrene while Rommel knows how to lead his troops with the personal example of the general who lives in his tank." On May 9, 1942, he pins his only hope on Rommel, "who will arrive at the Delta unless he is stopped, not by the British, but by our own generals."

The first section of the diary, "Memoriale di gabinetto per l'anno 1939," sheds new light on Italy's participation in the Spanish war. On January 4 Ciano writes, "In Spain we are going ahead at full speed. Gambara has executed a very brilliant maneuver, attacking the Reds on their flanks and producing a very serious crisis." The following day he observes, "The only danger in sight is a possible mass intervention of the French coming through the Pyrenees." (Actually the French did not need to cross the Pyrenees; they had only to lend the Spanish government the 150,000 rifles, 3,000 machine-guns, and two batteries of light artillery for which I pleaded in vain with Daladier.) By January 12 Ciano is reassured—no danger of intervention in Spain by the Western powers. He has just conferred with Lord Halifax in the Palazzo Chigi: "I repeated to him," says Ciano, "our point of view and he gave his. But he does not seem to be very convinced, and at heart I think he would be happy if Franco's victory were to settle the question."

DEL VAYO

* "The Ciano Diaries, 1939-1943." Doubleday and Company. $4.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

A YOUNG BRITISH OFFICER who spent three and a half years in a Japanese prison camp recently wrote to the editor of the London Spectator asking for a list of the more important books published during his exile, particularly those concerned with the humanities. Harold Nicolson answered the query in his weekly page, Marginal Comment, and I had just read his small catalogue with interest—lists of books are always fascinating—when a similar inquiry was put to me by a young American officer just returned from the wars, though not, fortunately, from a prison camp. There must be many others who are wondering which books, of the thousands published since they went away, are worth their attention. Using The Nation's annual book list as a base to work from, I have made a small selection. Like Mr. Nicolson's it is limited to the humanities—after all, there's a war off.

Some of my categories are a bit arbitrary—categories always are. And in these days there is so much overlapping of the various approaches—literary, social, anthropological, and so on—in single books that the problem becomes insoluble anyway.

LITERARY CRITICISM, BIOGRAPHY

- "Samuel Johnson," by Joseph Wood Krutch.
- "E. M. Forster," by Lionel Trilling.
- "Henry James: The Major Phase," by F. O. Matthiessen.
- "The Question of Henry James," Edited by F. W. Dupee.
- "The Trollopes," by Lucy Poate Stebbins and Richard Poate Stebbins.
- "W. B. Yeats," by Joseph Hone.
- "The Aesthetic Adventure," by William Gaunt.

"On Native Grounds," by Alfred Kazin, is a useful work in that it brings together a great deal of information about American literature since 1890, but the book is far too long and the writing arouses, and frustrates, all one's editorial instincts—so many sentences fray at the ends like unwhipped ropes.

CULTURAL CRITICISM

- "Mythology," by Edith Hamilton.
- "The Roots of American Culture and Other Essays," by Constance Rourke.
- "Democracy in America," by Alexis de Tocqueville.
- "The American Language. Supplement I," by H. L. Mencken.

I include De Tocqueville because his analysis of democratic culture seems to me as relevant today as it could ever have been (I shall discuss it at length one of these days). Perhaps Mencken's Supplement does not belong in this category, but it is difficult to place. "The Psychological Frontiers of Society" by Abram Kardiner and associates should be mentioned here for the benefit of those whose "faculty of attention" is well developed and who can understand the technical language of psychology and anthropology.

ETHICS, PHILOSOPHY, EDUCATION

- "The Nature and Destiny of Man, II," by Reinhold Niebuhr.
- "The History of Western Philosophy," by Bertrand Russell.
- "The Hero in History," by Sidney Hook.
- "The Teacher in America," by Jacques Barzun.
- "Everybody's Political What's What," by Bernard Shaw.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND PERSONAL TESTAMENTS

- "The Unquiet Grave," by Cyril Connolly.
- "Black Boy," by Richard Wright.
- "Heathen Days, 1890-1936," by H. L. Mencken.
- "Persons and Places: The Background of My Life," by George Santayana.
- "Sunday After the War," by Henry Miller.

BIOGRAPHY

- "Admiral of the Ocean Sea: A Life of Christopher Columbus," by Samuel Eliot Morison.
- "William the Silent," by C. V. Wedgwood.
- "No Man Knows My History: The Life of Joseph Smith, the Mormon Prophet," by Fawn M. Brodie.

HISTORY

- "The Year of Decision: 1846," by Bernard De Voto.
- "The Age of Jackson," by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.
- "Saints and Strangers," by George F. Willison.
- "Angel in the Forest," by Marguerite Young.
- "The French Revolution," by J. M. Thompson.
- "The Age of Jackson" could just as well be listed under Cultural Criticism, since Mr. Schlesinger discusses all the aspects of the Jacksonian era. "Angel in the Forest" is a combination of history and belles-lettres.

Arthur Koestler's "The Yogi and the Commissar" belongs on the list but fits into none of my categories. Likewise "The Crack-up," edited by Edmund Wilson, which contains uncollected pieces, letters, and notebooks of Scott Fitzgerald, as well as commentaries on his life and work by others.

I'd suggest three books in the musical field—"Music for the Man Who Enjoys 'Hamlet,'" by B. H. Haggin; "The Musical Scene," by Virgil Thomson; and Tovey's "Musical Articles from the Encyclopedia Britannica."

The novels that seem worth a backward glance are very few despite all the stories that have been told these past four years, and the best book on the list is "The Bostonians," by Henry James, which I include because it is in print again for the first time since 1886.

FICTION

- "The Seed Beneath the Snow," by Ignazio Silone.
- "Home Is the Hunter," by Gontran de Poncins.
- "Arrival and Departure," by Arthur Koestler.
- "At Heaven's Gate," by Robert Penn Warren.
- "The Leaning Tower and Other Stories," by Katherine Anne Porter.
- "The Hunted," by Albert J. Guerard.
- "Prater Violet," by Christopher Isherwood.
- "The Bostonians," by Henry James.

Against seven novels, put at least twenty books of poems worth keeping. It is extraordinary—but it confirms a private theory of mine that the quality of poetry remains high, as compared to that of fiction, partly at least because the poet is less subject to corruption than the writer of fiction. He is not distracted by the hope of writing a best-seller or of getting a movie contract. And while he remains obscure (sometimes in a double sense) he also remains pure.

POETRY

- "Blood for a Stranger," by Randall Jarrell.
 "Awake! and Other Wartime Poems," by W. R. Rodgers.
 "Ruins and Visions," by Stephen Spender.
 "Parts of a World," by Wallace Stevens.
 "Notes Toward a Supreme Fiction," by Wallace Stevens.
 "Le Crêpe-Cœur," by Louis Aragon.
 "Sacred and Secular Elegies," by George Barker.
 "Four Quartets," by T. S. Eliot.
 "Person, Place, and Thing," by Karl Shapiro.
 "1 x 1," by E. E. Cummings.
 "The Summer Landscape," by Rolfe Humphries.
 "Land of Unlikeness," by Robert Lowell.
 "Nevertheless," by Marianne Moore.
 "V-Letter and Other Poems," by Karl Shapiro.
 "Selected Poems, 1923-1943," by Robert Penn Warren.
 "The Collected Poetry of W. H. Auden."
 "Little Friend, Little Friend," by Randall Jarrell.
 "Short Is the Time. Poems, 1936-1943," by C. Day Lewis.
 "Springboard, 1941-1944," by Louis MacNeice.
 "Selected Poems," by John Crowe Ransom.

Oh, My Name It Is Sam Hall

Three prisoners—the biggest black—
 And their one guard stand
 By the new bridge over the drainage ditch.
 They listen once more to the band
 Whose marches crackle each day at this hour
 From the speakers of the post.
 The planes drone over; the clouds of summer
 Blow by and are lost
 In the air that they and the crews have conquered.
 But the prisoners still stand
 Listening a little after the marches.
 Then they trudge through the sand
 To the straggling grass, and the castor bushes,
 And the whitewashed rocks
 That stand to them for an army and Order
 (Though their sticks and sacks
 And burned slack faces and ambling walk—
 The guard's gleaming yawn—
 Are as different as if the four were fighting
 A war of their own).
 They graze a while for scraps; one is whistling.
 When the guard begins
 Sam Hall in his slow mountain voice
 They all stop and grin.

RANDALL JARRELL

Science and the State

SCIENCE AND THE PLANNED STATE. By John R. Baker. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

IN ENGLAND more than in this country state planning of scientific research has received vigorous support from several men who can wield the pen as powerfully as they can prosecute experiments. Bernal, Levy, Haldane, and Crowther want to adopt in toto the methods devised by the Soviets. Dr. Baker, a member of the Zoology Department at Oxford, takes issue with these men. To him totalitarianism, whether of the German or the Russian variety, is precisely the form of government that is least in accord with scientific principles, "for scientists accept the authority of no one and recognize the necessity of liberty."

As Sir Roger would put it, there is much on both sides of the fence. Fundamental discoveries, made by men of genius, usually require for their attainment complete freedom for the individual—freedom of thought and freedom of action. It is hardly conceivable that the Curies would have discovered radioactivity or that Fleming would have stumbled on penicillin had they been soldiers in a regiment of scientific workers under orders from a colonel with political affiliations. And granted even that a favored few might be given a modicum of freedom of action and of thought in a totalitarian state, would a geneticist such as Morgan last long if he announced that his studies proved that heredity in its influence upon the individual was more powerful than environment?

However, when we leave fundamental discoveries and turn our attention to what might be called the "application" of these discoveries, then organized research is to be favored. For here the problem is to improve, to expand, and to apply some one discovery. Here talents of the second and third orders are usually sufficient. For what is needed is systematic investigation, usually on a large scale, of some phenomena already observed and described.

The development of the atomic bomb is an admirable illustration of this point. When the American government undertook to exploit atomic energy, it was only after the basic discoveries had been made. For some of us it was rather sad to contemplate that only a crisis in war could have made such work possible.

Fleming's discovery of penicillin, followed by large-scale production, would have been another admirable illustration but for the fact that here the government did not undertake to manufacture the substance but "sublet" to pharmaceutical houses. Incidentally, the manufacturers made—and are making—millions, while the three men primarily responsible for the basic discovery made $30,000 among them—the present value of a Nobel prize. This is not necessarily an argument for more money for the Nobel prize-winners, but it is an argument in favor of more rigid government control so that sufferers can get penicillin at the least possible cost.

In totalitarian countries government supervision of scientific work sometimes—though not always, as Dr. Baker seems to think—leads to disaster. The outcome depends upon the kind of problem. If an atomic bomb or a penicillin is involved, the Russian government can do a magnificent job, provided that the necessary men and the material are available. On the other hand, if the task is one which impinges upon Soviet philosophy, the result may be tragic. Dr. Baker, for example, refers to the case of Lysenka, a Russian biologist who was for a time at least favored by a powerful group of Soviet officials because he had declared that he did not consider "formal Mendelian-Morganist genetics as a science." Dr. Baker also points out that in the Soviets' five-year plan for science Item 7 reads: "The provision of the historical and social theory for combating the ideas of capitalism . . ."; here instructions are given not only as to what shall be investigated, an excellent idea in principle for competent workers rather than for men of genius, but as to what the results shall be—which is precisely the antithesis of everything the scientist holds dear.

However, in this field of political theory, not ordinarily included under the heading of "science," the United States and England and other democratic countries are guilty too. It is true that we have no such government plans, but we do have programs adopted by powerful political groups—such as chambers of commerce—which are as intent on disproving the value of communism as the Soviets are on disproving the value of capitalism. In both cases we see an excellent example of emotions at work; and in both a complete absence of the scientific approach.

BENJAMIN HARROW

BRIEFER COMMENT

Wanted: A Literary Consciousness

THE SECOND VOLUME of "Cross-Section" (L. B. Fischer, $3.50) is so poor, so much poorer even than the first, that the editor must be in part responsible. Edwin Seaver has in the past produced fiction and criticism superior by far to much that he has collected here; it is possible after some fifteen years to remember a brief review by him of a book by William Faulkner. Thus if the fault is chiefly with the editor, the reason must be that he has been involved in the same degeneration of literary values as his authors. Fifteen years of depression and war have brought about an insensitivity to literary values which could have been avoided only if strong literary traditions existed in America as they do in France; for it is certainly not clear that fifteen years of prosperity and peace would have produced a renaissance. But to blame the social process is also too general, when it is obvious that Mr. Seaver's selections are often determined by what was once known as social realism and should have been known as doctrinaire realism. In the editor's introduction and in many of the stories the working principle is that the subject matter is important, hence the work is important. It is enough to write about social injustice, to be concerned with "the staggering inhumanity humanity is capable of," Mr. Seaver's staggering phrase. And this doctrine, a perennial pitfall for literary effort, is all the more pernicious because it is close to the truth that all literature must base itself on the real world, whether through fantasy, like Swift and Kafka, or through observation, like

Only the complete and unabridged

CIANO DIARIES

fills the gaps in your background knowledge of the war started to exterminate your way
of life

SUMNER WELLES says:

"To some who have read mutilated passages previously syndicated the Diaries have proved a disappointment because of their lack of those sensational revelations which they had apparently anticipated. But those who will read them in the complete text . . . will find a hitherto unrevealed picture . . ."

616 pages,
ten times as long as any newspaper abridgement. By COUNT GALEAZZO
CIANO. Introduction
by SUMNER
WELLES. $4.00

At your bookseller's

DOUBLEDAY

Balzac and Proust. To condemn a collection like this is to say, in the end, that these authors do not realize any of the many possibilities made manifest by other literary works: it is pointless to read most of these stories when one might read Chekhov or Katherine Anne Porter; and with the exception of Millen Brand and Jane Mayhall the poets here hardly seem to be practicing the same art as Robert Frost and Wallace Stevens. There is a good deal of talent in America, and some of Mr. Seaver's authors show real ability. The talent and the ability would not be frustrated and confused if there existed a genuine literary consciousness, a consciousness which can only be created and sustained by an active body of critics who know what literature can be because they know what literature has been.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

Life at Wide Ruins

IN "SPIN A SILVER DOLLAR" (Viking, $3.75) Alberta Hannum has written a book about a great many individuals and two distinct ways of life, made harmonious and mutually enriching by good-will, good humor, and intelligence. It is partly the story of Sallie and Bill Lippincott, who had the sense to recognize their "native land" in the Arizona desert and the enterprise to make it their home until the war uprooted them. How they acquired the run-down Indian trading post at Wide Ruins and how they created a successful business and a life of comfort for themselves provide the framework for the book. But its essential value lies in the picture of the Navaho Indians—their pride and dignity and wisdom, their perversities and their wives, all the inconsistencies and weaknesses and nobilities that make them human and enduring. The Lippincotts had the insight and sympathy that enabled them to see the Navaho way of life as valid and reasonable for Navahos, and, in fundamental matters, not inferior to the life of the white man. That they could convince the Indians of this sincere respect and thus win their trust, without conceding a single principle or custom that was important to them as whites, is a tribute to both the Lippincotts and the Navahos.

Binding together the incidents of life at Wide Ruins is the story of Jimmy, young son of the Lippincotts' handy man. Bill and Sallie found Jimmy scratching pictures on the side of a rock and thereafter kept him supplied with drawing materials and a quiet working corner in their home. Jimmy rarely spoke to them, but regularly left his drawings on the kitchen table when no one was looking. The color reproductions of Jimmy's work that illustrate the book leave no doubt that he already ranks among the most notable of the contemporary Indian painters. And if the illustrations lack some of the luminosity of color that marks much of Jimmy's original work, they are nevertheless a publishing triumph in a day of undependable inks and paper. Here are the characteristic elements of the best Navaho painting—the fine, delicate line, the subtly soft yet vivid color, the sparing, suggestive use of a single plant or falling leaf, the endowment of each stylized animal with a personality of its own. Although the Lippincotts wisely insisted that Jimmy be allowed to develop in accordance with his tradition, some of the paintings reveal an alien use of modeling and perspective.

Alberta Hannum has told the story of Wide Ruins with humor and a light touch which in no way obscures the fact that she, like the Lippincotts, has an eye for the special beauties of the Southwestern desert and a deep appreciation of the greatness of the Navahos.

JANET ROSENWALD

When Labor Bargains

AS A POPULAR EXPOSITION of the problems of labor relations "Trends in Collective Bargaining" by S. T. Williamson and Herbert Harris (Twentieth Century Fund, $2) ranks very high. Fourteen chapters are devoted to an examination of the "processes, problems, and issues of collective bargaining." There follows the report by a special committee appointed by the Twentieth Century Fund. Both sections deserve close study by all who desire to understand one of the more knotty problems of our time. Collective bargaining exists when workers "or their representatives negotiate and adjust conditions of their employment with one or more employers." Quickly sketching recent developments, the authors examine the making and contents of collective agreements and the problems that frequently arise in the administration of union contracts. Difficulties that may appear during negotiations or during the term of the contract are recognized, but the authors assume that reasonable men can resolve them. This is perhaps a bit over-optimistic, since leaders in labor and in industry are not altogether objective thinking machines, and, moreover, are frequently subjected to outside pressures which may force upon them attitudes they do not hold.

The Report and Recommendations of the Labor Committee contains many useful observations, though its discussion of the "economics of collective bargaining" is not very revealing. It is true that American labor is not anti-capitalistic, but it has not defined a fair profit. The committee indorses summoning forth "the utmost use of our resources" but does not say much about the means of doing it.

The indorsement of industry-wide collective bargaining draws a dissent from one member of the committee. It seems to the reviewer that his objections are valid. If the economy can be paralyzed by successive stoppages in strategic industries, some answer to these serious disruptions will be imperative. The emphasis of the report is on voluntary settlement and a minimum of government intervention. The committee recognizes a danger in the rise of powerful labor barons, but the members do not agree on remedies.

While intended as a popular study, this volume will be useful to both the layman and specialist.

PHILIP TAFT

Flash! 1. Genuine book value: THE GRAVE-DIGGERS OF FRANCE, by Pertinax, original $6.00 D. Doran edition—send only $1.50.

2. Bonus Book: With each purchase of the two-volume Complete Writings of Thomas Paine by Foner for $6.00 (2236 pp.) we will send free of charge your choice of H. Fast's Freedom Road or Freud's General Introduction to Psychoanalysis. The 2nd Volume of Foner's Work is $3.50.

3. Book Service: We mail everywhere the books reviewed and advertised here and elsewhere. Downtown Book Bazaar, 212 Broadway, New York City 7.

For Your Convenience

THE Nation

☐ with Harpers Magazine $6.50

You save $2.50

☐ with Consumers Union $7.00

You save $1.50

☐ with Harpers Magazine
and Consumers Union $9.00

You save $3.50

☐ with Free World. $7.50

You save $1.50

☐ with Saturday Review $8.50

You save $1.50

All club combinations listed ~~are~~ for ~~one~~ year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself:

☐ One Year $5 ☐ Two Years $8 ☐ Three Years $11 ☐ Servicemen's Rate $3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

SPECIAL NOTICE TO READERS

To Subscribers:

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please cooperate by renewing your current subscription on receipt of the first notice of expiration.

To Newsstand Readers:

The only certain way of getting The Nation regularly is to enter a subscription. By doing so you will not only insure prompt receipt of your copy, but you will make a considerable saving in money over the newsstand price.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
59th ST.
N.Y. LEX.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RIKO NOW

"An Absorbing Screen Drama"—N. Y. Post

MERLE CLAUDE CHARLES
OBERON • RAINS • KORVIN

'THIS LOVE OF OURS'

Based on LUIGI PIRANDELLO'S Play

—AND—

'PURSUIT TO ALGIERS' BASIL RATHBONE
NIGEL BRUCE

"Distinguished and Dramatic Biography"—N. Y. Sun

'RHAPSODY IN BLUE'

The Jubilant Story of
GEORGE GERSHWIN

—EXTRA FEATURETTE—

FRANK SINATRA

"The House I Live In"

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island
Queens
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
Manhattan
COLONIAL

"One Picture has truly, deeply caught the tempo of our times!"

A WALK IN THE SUN

A Lewis Milestone Production

Starring

DANA ANDREWS

with

RICHARD CONTE

20th CENTURY-FOX

Now
Playing

VICTORIA

B'way at
46th St.

Doors Open 8:30 A.M.

B. G. DeSylva presents BETTY HUTTON in 'THE STORK CLUB'

—with—

BARRY FITZGERALD
DON DE FORE

Robert Benchley • Bill Goodwin
Iris Adrian • Mikhail Rasumny
Mary Young

and introducing ANDY RUSSELL
Midnight Feature Nightly

NOW
PLAYING

PARAMOUNT

TIMES SQUARE

In Person
WOODY
HERMAN
and his
ORCHESTRA

—featuring—
FRANCES
WAYNE

—plus—
DOROTHY
KELLER

Extra added attraction

BUDDY

LESTER

Don Baker at the Organ

One Flash

I CAN SEE NO REASON why a Nation subscriber should read "The House of Europe" by Paul Scott Mowrer (Houghton Mifflin, $3.75). It is a bad instance of that pathetic fallacy which leads many foreign correspondents to suppose that the factual record of their lives has a vital interest for others.

Not until page 328 does Mr. Mowrer finish with the First World War, about which he has nothing new to say, and no very significant or suggestive opinions. Nor has his account of "Balkanized Europe" anything original about it; so that by the time one reaches those pages in which the author sums up his own conclusions about the world, one is not in the mood to listen to his defense of the balance-of-power principle. With eleven chapters of exception, the whole of this long book, which closes with the year 1934, can be ignored by both the student of foreign policy and the man who takes pleasure in a "good reading book." Part Six, however, Moroccan Interlude, gave me a real pleasure that did not derive solely from an old interest in North Africa. In these chapters Mr. Mowrer has done well with his visit to Abd-el-Krim at the time of the Riff wars. There is one superb moment. "Who planned the Riffian victory at Annual?" the author asked. "God planned it; but I was present," Abd-el-Krim replied. That flash, fairly well supported by the narrative, made the effort of reading this interminable book worth while.

RALPH BATES

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents

MAURICE EVANS In His New Production of Shakespeare's HAMLET

Columbus Circle Thea. B'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
Eves. 8:30. Mts. Thu. & Sat. 2:30

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by Music by
DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE B'way at 53rd St. Mats.: Sat. & Sun. Eves. Incl. Sun. 2:30 & 8:30

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times

Rodgers and Hammerstein present

MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account" • RICHARD BISHOP
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4638
MUSIC BOX Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp.

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present

DEEP ARE THE ROOTS

A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW

Staged by ELIA KAZAN

FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of
Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings: 8:40, $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Matinees
Wednesday and Saturday, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

"A VERY BIG HIT!"—Walter Winchell
KERN AND HAMMERSTEIN'S

SHOW BOAT

Musio by JEROME KERN. Books and Lyrics by OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd.
Based on the novel by EDNA FERBER • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
ZIEGFELD THEA. 54th Street and Sixth Avenue. Cl. 5-5200
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mts. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

ONE of the characters in "Dunnigan's Daughter," S. N. Behrman's new play at the Golden, is a Mexican painter of peasant origin who seems intended to represent either the complexity of the simple or the simplicity of the complex. He wanders persistently about the stage, but nothing ever happens to him, and so, I suppose, his function is that of raisonneur. In any event he makes, not long before the final curtain, a casual entrance for the purpose of remarking more or less to himself that most of the evil in the world is the work of frustrated people and that there is probably more truth in Freud than there is in Marx.

Luther Adler, who plays the role in question, drops these two obiter dicta with an air of embarrassed distaste which may indicate merely that he finds it difficult to make them sound probable as part of anybody's conversation or, possibly, that he wishes as far as possible to dissociate himself from the judgments. I, however, picked them up carefully and took them home in the hope that if I examined them in connection with the play I might later be able to explain to my readers what I was not, at the moment, understanding very well. Unfortunately I am now compelled to report, after several days of meditation, that "Dunnigan's Daughter" still seems to me very feeble and very confused as an illustration of either the thesis announced above or of any other thesis I can think of. Since the days when "The Second Man" first introduced a new comic writer, Mr. Behrman's plays have seldom failed to delight me. At the very least it seemed safe to assume that he would never be either pretentious or dull. "Dunnigan's Daughter," I fear, is both.

The story concerns a ruthless strong man engaged at the moment in stealing water from starving Mexican farmers in order to use it in one of his mining operations. A young idealist from our own State Department is on his trail, and, rather surprisingly, the only really dramatic scenes are those in which, briefly and in no very original way, the issue is drawn between the philosophy of the robber baron and that of the social-minded liberal. Mr. Behrman chooses, however, to keep the purely economic and social aspects of the conflict pretty well in the background and to focus his attention upon the strong man's wife and upon his daughter by a former marriage, both of whom have been hypnotized by the strength of his personality. The wife, a woman of humble origins, is now something of a bird in a gilded cage, and the daughter, because she has been dominated by her father, is in the incipient stage of nymphomania. Fortunately the young idealist falls in love with the daughter and stays there just long enough to free her from her obsession before proceeding to the mother, who as the last curtain falls has eloped with him, thus assuring not only her own happiness but also the psychological defeat of the tycoon.

Quite possibly this story might be told in some convincing and interesting way. It is, however, certainly not an easy one, and I suspect that I have made it clearer than Mr. Behrman ever does. As he unfolds it the motives are not any too distinct and the issues never seem very important. None of the characters are very real, and most of the psychological conflicts seem like exhibitions of shadow-boxing desperately prolonged until 10:50. What it all comes down to is a great deal of attitudinizing and a great deal of very fancy talk about inner freedom, self-realization, etc., which goes round and round without ever seeming to come out anywhere. Wiser casting might have helped some, for Dennis King—who seems to lip—is no more convincing as a captain of industry than Luther Adler is as a Mexican, and June Havoc is more suited to hoydenish roles than to play the part of even a not quite genuine grande dame. But I doubt whether the best acting in the world could make the wordy self-examinations of these characters very real.

It may be that "The Second Man," which was the most debonair and worldly of Mr. Behrman's plays, was also his best, but I am one of those who think that in some of the later pieces he solved very successfully the difficult problem of writing comedy which acknowledged the existence of problems so desperate that in the face of them the comic spirit is helpless. In "Dunnigan's Daughter," however, the element of comedy has almost completely disappeared, and the psychological analysis which is intended to replace it fails to convince one of either its reality or its importance. The spiritual problems of the heroine are chic and becoming. They are as well suited to her personality as the clothes she wears and the house she lives in. But I found it difficult to believe them worthy of much deeper interest. This, I kept saying to myself, is evidently the way the well-dressed woman will fret in 1946.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

Best of 1945

ON TWO previous occasions I have conducted something of an open wake, here, over the best films of the year just ended. I see no point in going through with it again. The past year was distinguished by two extremely fine pictures, which I expect to hear respectfully mentioned twenty years from now, if anyone is at that time free to express an honest opinion, or alive to express any opinion at all. Aside from these two pictures I see nothing to get particularly hopeful about—or any more despondent about than usual, for that matter.

Major John Huston's "San Pietro" was the finest of the several movies made during the course of the war which have proved what men of talent, skill, and courage can do if even one hand is untied from behind their backs. It is worth remembering, however, that this film was released to the civilian public something like a year late, and was censored at that; was then slowly and so far as I have heard thinly accepted by exhibitors; and was neglected by such sincere and intelligent people as the members of the National Board of Review's Committee on Exceptional Films, in favor of the showy, skilful, far less fine "The True Glory," which was called the best film of its year.

The war is over now; I doubt that we shall see many more American factual films of anywhere near the quality of "San Pietro."

Even more wonderful, in a sense, was William Wellman's less nearly perfect film, "Story of G. I. Joe," for it proved what can be done, even now, in the middle of Hollywood, when men adequate to a noble subject are not drawn and quartered by their bosses. But it proves nothing, of course, about the chances a hundred other able people are going to get.

Neither does Jean Renoir's "The Southerner," though it too is a film which could hardly have been made except by grace of unusually disinterested producers. If I were a "constructive" critic—that is, able to believe that "A Song to Remember" is a film to be praised because it brings Chopin to the juke-boxes—I might see in these two films what is called a hopeful trend. I will wait, instead, and see how many producers and investors allow how many good artists to do work worth doing in 1946. And I will remember that although Haydn was almost too well fixed with the Esterhazys for his own best interests, that was no help to Mozart.

I won't try to go on with this discussion, even in this superficial way. Among the other best films of 1945 I would particularly mention, in roughly the following order of preference, the very pretty, very talented, rather velvety "The Clock"; the very hard-surfaced, bright, superficial "The Lost Weekend"; the hard-worked, exciting "Objective Burma" and the equally hard-worked, more doggedly humane "Pride of the Marines"; the charming but equivocal and overrated "Colonel Blimp," now cut to bits; the fitful, sometimes very encouraging "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn"; the cellophoned aspidistra "On Approval"; John Ford's visually beautiful, otherwise not very interesting "They Were Expendable," with Robert Montgomery's unimprovable performance; the somewhat poky yet very able "The Way Ahead"; the sometimes corny, always impassioned "The Last Chance." Other good pictures to see, and some of them better than that, are the tawdry, bitter "Mildred Pierce," with Joan Crawford's return, and her best performance; Herman Shumlin's intense, faithful "Confidential Agent"; the clever, nasty little comedy "Practically Yours"; some angry, hard-focused scenes in "A Medal for Benny"; the easy, sunny "Anchors Aweigh"; "State Fair," for pleasant tunes and a few pleasant scenes; Val Lewton's "Body Snatchers" and "Isle of the Dead," too pedagogic and verbal at times, but still showing some of the most sensitive movie intelligence in Hollywood; Robert Siodmak's visually gifted melodrama "The Suspect"; "Fighting Lady," a well-made and spectacular film which looks to me more and more like a magnificent box of chocolates filled with plasma; the bustling "True Glory," which also loses value in retrospect; and Fred Allen's rowdy "It's in the Bag." To people who share my near-adoration of the intricately wrong I also commend "Kiss and Tell," "The Three Caballeros," and "A Song to Remember," high among the unforgettable films of the year. While I am about it, too, I had better place near the top of the year's list "Salome Where She Danced." I merely enjoyed it when I saw it, and was slow to realize how much of it must have been meant for that kind of enjoyment. I now gratefully salute it as the funniest dead-pan parody I have ever seen; and if by unlikely chance any Merton Gills are hurt by this, I am much sorrier than I know how to say.

If you are content to be merely realistic about it—to use a strangely perverted word in the only meaning it seems to carry today—I suppose that it wasn't exactly a bad movie year. Those who are satisfied with it are welcome to it. So far as I am concerned, I am grateful that a few of the many people of ability and integrity who work in Hollywood managed, with God knows what bloodshed and heartbreak, to get on the screen something more than a split-second glimmer of what they have in them to put there. And I am grateful for hundreds of split-second glimmers, which I wish I had room to specify. But the desire of any critic, like that of any artist, who has a right even to try to defend or practice an art—as perhaps of any human being who has a right even to try to defend or practice living—cannot be satisfied short of perfect liberty, discipline, and achievement, though the attempt may be wholly loved and honored.

I see little if any more to love and honor for the attempt, in films, and little if any more substantial chance even to make the attempt, than at any other time during the past fifteen years.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

SOME further observations have occurred to me concerning the Budapest Quartet. A discriminating listener will of course hear in its playing the phraseological inflection that one hears in no other quartet performances, and in this the operation of musical powers beyond those of any other group. He will, however, be aware of these powers operating to produce this inflection in some Budapest performances nowadays in which there are almost incredible technical defects like scratchy tone and faulty intonation, and evidence of a lack of the intensity of involvement, or even of the mere interest in the occasion, that is essential for certain important qualities of ensemble performance. And he can appreciate when another group, though it does not exhibit the operation of such musical powers in phraseological inflection, plays nevertheless with fine musical insight in its phrasing, with perfect intonation and beauty of sound, and with a life in the ensemble execution that is produced by keen interest and pleasure in the concerted activity.

Most of the people who crowd in to hear the Budapest Quartet these days are not discriminating listeners for whom the playing of the group at its best is a standard which enables them to know when it is playing at less than its best, or to appreciate good playing by another group. They take the name Budapest as assurance of perfection; and perfection, therefore, is what they hear even when what the quartet is producing is imperfection. And not only does that name prevent them from hearing the defects of tone and intonation, the lifelessness of certain performances, but another name would prevent them from appreciating the beautiful tone, the perfect intonation, the vitality of the performances of another group—for example the quartet of Boston Symphony players whom I heard play Fauré at Harvard.

I am describing attitudes that I have observed in what people have said at the concerts, and what some of them have said in print. There was a New Friends of Music concert this season at which the Budapest Quartet was replaced by an assembled group of experienced string-players who performed the Brahms B flat Trio and Schubert's "Trout" Quintet with the pianist Webster Aitken. The Herald Tribune reviewer, Jerome D. Bohm, seems to have had his ears and mind open to whatever might happen, and to have heard what actually did happen: he found it remarkable that musicians who were not members of a permanent ensemble could produce such "well-integrated, carefully proportioned" performances; and he went into detail about the performance of the Brahms Trio, pointing out, among other things, that "Mr. Aitken set forth the difficult piano part not only with technical assurance but with unerring musical perceptiveness, blending the piano part so skilfully with the strings that they were never overweighted"—something, I might observe, that an experienced person would know could have been achieved only by long and careful rehearsal. The Times reviewer, on the other hand—the particular initials of Times reviewers don't matter—knew what a person of discernment should hear, and heard it: performances that "lacked the unity of style which might have been expected of the Budapesters"—that is, of two or three members of the Budapest Quartet playing with a pianist and a string bass-player outside of their group and with styles different from their own; in particular "a rough-and-ready rather than a carefully studied performance" of the Brahms Trio.

Bruno Walter's Saturday afternoon broadcast of Mahler's Fourth Symphony with the Philadelphia Orchestra renewed my impression of the unflinching alertness and attentiveness of Mahler's mind, which keeps the discursive, long-winded progression freshly interesting with detail after detail that is contrived with originality and subtlety. And after hearing what Burgin failed to do with the work in a Boston Symphony broadcast last year, I was able to appreciate how wonderfully Walter's changes of pace bound together into coherent sequence the episodes that otherwise would have fallen apart.

The performance was cut off, at the end of the hour, before the conclusion of the work; and this happened because at the beginning of the hour Harl McDonald used up several minutes with preliminary talk—not even an explanation of the scheme of the Fourth Symphony, but chit-chat about Stokowski's famous performance of Mahler's "Symphony of a Thousand" many years ago. It was a perfect example of the pattern of American broadcasting, which represents the inability of the American broadcasting mind to conceive of anyone listening to a broadcast of music out of interest in the music, and of a symphony being broadcast with nothing more than a statement of what symphony it is and who is performing it.

There are worse examples—the worst being what a reader once described as "the six-ring circus the Metropolitan has become under commercial sponsorship." In addition to the quiz there are two new entertainment features this year. One is a forum, on which I cannot comment since I could no more listen to Messrs. Downes, Spaeth, Bagar, and Lawrence in serious discussion than I could listen to their frolicsome answers to questions. The other is called, I believe, "Opera News of the Air," which turned out—the first two times—to be better than its title. That is, Mr. Boris Goldovsky not only made instructive points about opera as a musical form, but he did the thing that is rarely done and that must be done: he sang and played passages of music which gave real meaning to his words for the listener. If Mr. Goldovsky had had ten minutes in which to develop his ideas by speaking and illustrating, he would have accomplished something valuable. But in accordance with American broadcasting practice he presented his ideas in an entertainment pattern—a dramatization in which he brought Mozart back to life for conversation with two Metropolitan singers and himself; and in this pattern the ideas were robbed of time and of the listener's attention by the drama.

At the third session, the last I heard, the guest composer was not Mozart but William Schuman; and instead of the music of "Die Meistersinger" being used to teach radio listeners something about opera, the story was used to teach them the attitude Mr. Schuman would like them to have toward music like his. By all means let radio listeners be receptive to the new in music; but let me assure them that composers like Mr. Schuman have not been victims of the intolerance that is the subject of "Die Meistersinger." Excessive tolerance has enabled some of them to get away with murder.

In Short

"The East India Company and the British Empire in the Far East," by Marguerite Eyer Wilbur (Richard R. Smith, $7.50). Trade does not always follow the flag; sometimes the flag follows trade. It was with no thought of territorial expansion that the East India Company was launched as "a joint venture" in 1599 by a group of London merchants who wished to share in the profits of the spice trade, then monopolized by the Dutch and Portuguese. But from this modest beginning there grew the empire which is becoming the sharpest thorn in the British crown. Mrs. Wilbur has reexamined this astounding story as a scholar but presents her findings with an eye to the general reader. Her earlier chapters are the best. In writing of the company's later years, when the skeins of history become extremely tangled, she tends to follow the line of the conventional apologists for imperialism.

"League of Nations and National Minorities," by P. de Azcárate (Published by Columbia University Press for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, $2). Ever since the rise of nationalism, the problem of national minorities has disturbed international relations. Between the wars it became a chronic cause of tension, and today, even though the problem has been ruthlessly solved in some countries, it remains among the most challenging issues facing the United Nations Organization. We have reason to be grateful, therefore, to Mr. Azcárate, the distinguished ambassador of the Spanish Republic in London, for his dispassionate review of the only systematic attempt to develop an international therapy for inflamed minority situations. As director for twelve years of the Minorities Questions Section of the League of Nations, he writes with unrivaled authority on the subject.

"Trail to California: The Overland Journal of Vincent Geiger and Wakeman Bryarly." Edited with an introduction by David Morris Potter (Yale, $3.50). Professor Potter selected this diary for publication from the large number of manuscript journals of the overland route which form part of the Coe collection of Western Americana in the Yale University Library. It was a worthy choice, for the two diarists, who were members of a well-organized company from Charleston, Virginia, provide a detailed, sober, and straightforward account of their journey. The introduction and ample annotation, which stress the organizational problems of travel on the overland route rather than its romantic aspects, give proof of the editor's sound judgment and assiduity in research.

"Benjamin Franklin's Autobiographical Writings." Selected and edited by Carl Van Doren (Viking, $5). Franklin's "Autobiography" is a wonderful book, but it is a fragment. It not only stops short thirty years before its author died but gives a far less full account than we would like of much of his early life. The innumerable admirers of the Grand Old Extrovert have reason to be grateful, therefore, to Mr. Van Doren, who has extracted from Franklin's works and correspondence a mass of supplementary autobiographical material. Some of his selections are familiar; others are published for the first time. The whole makes a bulky volume which can be warmly recommended either for consecutive reading or for dipping into at odd moments.

K. H.

Crossword Puzzle No. 144

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Opera Wagner finished with a broad smile
- 6 Strange getting a cable from an enchantress with a masculine name
- 9 Will make your tires last longer
- 10 Denoting a number of Ural men
- 11 A final remark from McCulloch
- 12 Greek island which produces lemons and melons
- 13 Stories which may be preferred on the golf course
- 15 Calvin Coolidge was, in a manner of speaking
- 16 Price of a communal measure of corn in Russia?
- 18 A self-evident truth
- 20 Exclusively American spectacles
- 23 Spot
- 24 Thwarted maliciously
- 25 Where more downright lying goes on than anywhere else
- 28 It's real, by gar!
- 29 This we dug for victory (4 & 3)
- 30 Flog, and what to use to do it
- 31 Colossus ----- the entrance to the harbor at Rhodes

DOWN

- 1 The famous movement from Handel's Messiah
- 2 Tool which suggests what to do with a nest-egg
- 3 Etui (6 & 4)
- 4 Timed run (anag.)
- 5 One abbreviated non-commissioned officer within another

- 6 Gets struck, after being so accommodating!
- 7 Day of the movies
- 8 This Dickens' character was no Sweet William (4 & 5)
- 14 Meteorological extremes in the neighborhood of Bath (3, 3 & 4)
- 15 This London promenade can't be so bad, for wasn't it originally "Route en Roi"? (6 & 3)
- 17 New England poet who apparently was more amusing than Dame Whitty
- 19 Sup a pal in a Swedish seat of learning
- 21 Cook follows me up
- 22 Bright young things
- 26 Men of color
- 27 A go-getter's eager start

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 143

ACROSS:—1 RACON; 4 CIVIC; 7 OSTRICH; 10 RAZOR; 11 IMPEL; 12 MAILVAN; 13 SANS; 16 BRIE; 18 AGENT; 20 SWINGE; 21 TWINED; 22 LENSES; 24 ATTILA; 25 STYLE; 26 OMAR; 28 DUST; 31 BAGPIPE; 33 BURMA; 34 ARIEL; 35 RODENTS; 36 TASTE; 37 EVERY.

DOWN:—1 BIRDS; 2 COZEN; 3 NORM; 4 CHIN; 5 VIPER; 6 CHLOE; 8 TWINGE; 9 INVENT; 14 ABSALOM; 15 SPINNER; 16 BANDIED; 17 INDIANS; 18 AGNES; 19 TWITE; 23 STAGED; 24 ALBION; 26 ORBIT; 27 ACRES; 29 UNITE; 30 TALLY; 31 BARE; 32 EASE.

CONTRIBUTORS

RANDALL JARRELL, who contributes a regular Verse Chronicle to The Nation, is the author of two books of poetry, "Blood for a Stranger" and "Little Friend, Little Friend."

BENJAMIN HARROW is professor of biochemistry at the College of the City of New York.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ is the author of "Shenandoah," "In Dreams Become Responsibilities," and "The Imitation of Life and Other Problems of Literary Criticism."

JANET ROSENWALD, an editor on the staff of the Institute of World Affairs, has collected and exhibited contemporary Indian painting from the Southwest.

PHILIP TAFT is a member of the Department of Economics at Brown University.

RALPH BATES is a close student of politics. He helped organize the International Brigade and fought with it in Spain for three years. Among his books are "Sirocco," "The Fields of Paradise," "Rainbow Fish," "The Olive Field," and "The Undiscoverables."

RESORTS

INVITATION TO RELAX

Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, roaring fireplace, delicious food — and fun. Only 55 miles from New York.

MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY
plum point
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4279

SAMUEL SCHAFER

"A Country Retreat With Homelike Atmosphere"

45 miles from N. Y.

WINTER SPORTS

CENTRAL VALLEY

NEW YORK

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477
Delightful...skating on private lake. Open fireplace.

Different...the colonial atmosphere.
Delicious...our unexcelled cuisine.
Diverting...recordings for listening & dancing.
All this only 53 miles from New York City.
A Resort for Adults Only

★ ★ ★ ★

Buy a Ticket to Victory...

Buy another Bond today

★ ★ ★ ★

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 26, 1946

NUMBER 4

The Shape of Things

IT IS INTERESTING, IF DISHEARTENING, TO speculate on what the government's action would have been in the steel and General Motors cases if it had been the C. I. O., and not the companies, which slapped the Administration in the face by rejecting government-proposed settlements. The screaming in Congress and the roaring in the White House against the unions would have been deafening. But by last week-end, in the present situation, there had emerged from the President's office nothing more than a somewhat sorrowful complaint that efforts to avert the steel strike were unavailing. No attempt was made to fix the blame; if Truman was even mildly irritated by United States Steel's rejection of his proposal, his vacuous statement of last Friday showed no sign of it. More important, it failed to set the stage for the dynamic, fighting action which he must take—not merely to promote reconversion but also to prevent the outright wrecking of the stabilization program and the government's regulatory role in post-war economics. As a first step the President must make plain to the people the nature and aims of the industrial conspiracy which, as Philip Murray accurately noted, has "deliberately set out to destroy labor unions, to provoke strikes and economic chaos, and to hi-jack the American people through uncontrolled profits and inflation." Despite his weak statement, there is some hope that the events of the past week have finally convinced Mr. Truman that he is dealing with something much more sinister than a wage fight. And there is also some hope that by clever, prompt, and pugnacious campaigning he can effect a collapse of the "finish-fight" gang. If not, the President must proceed with seizure of the steel industry and installation of the wage increase he proposed, despite the dangers and inordinate difficulties of such a step. But in either case Mr. Truman must begin by turning on steam—hot, and lots of it.

★

BARELY OUT OF ITS SWADDLING CLOTHES, the UNO has been confronted with the very adult problem of the rights of a small state unfortunate enough to lie within the security zones of two major powers. The Iran government has lodged a complaint with the Security Council alleging Soviet interference in the internal affairs of Iran. Having attempted without success to enter into direct negotiations with Moscow, it has informed the Council that a situation "which may lead to international friction" has arisen and has asked that an investigation be made in accordance with Article 35 of the charter. As we write no official reply has been made by Russia, but it is understood that the Soviet government claims that the Azerbaijan rebellion was spontaneous. It justifies its refusal to permit Iranian troops to enter the province on the ground that the ensuing civil war would have created complications for the Red Army forces which are occupying Azerbaijan in accordance with the Anglo-Soviet-Iranian treaty of 1942.

★

THESE EXPLANATIONS ARE PLAUSIBLE BUT not quite enough so to banish suspicions of ulterior Russian designs on Iran, particularly in view of Moscow's persistent and unexplained refusal to discuss the situation with Teheran. We hope therefore that the Soviet representative on the Security Council will be instructed to make a frank effort to reestablish confidence by assisting rather than blocking an investigation. For should the Russian veto be employed as a means of nullifying the right of appeal of a small power, the UNO would be off to a very bad start indeed. A crisis, however, is not inevitable. The Council undoubtedly will seek a method of dealing with the dispute which Russia can accept. And Russia, surely, will not be anxious to incur the odium which would attach to the first great power resorting to the veto. One possible action would be the dispatch of an investigating commission to Iran. Admittedly this might seem like a stall, but the facts in the case are far from clear and an authoritative exposition of them would be helpful. In any case, we imagine, the Security Council will urge another effort at direct negotiations. Realistically speaking, these would have more chance of success if Britain were included, for the root of the trouble in Iran is Anglo-Soviet rivalry. Both Britain and Russia have agreed to respect Iran's independence, but this guaranty is of little worth while they vie with each

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	85
It Has Happened Here	88
They're Off!	89

ARTICLES

Salute to Symington by I. F. Stone	90
The Ghosts of Geneva by Aylmer Vallance	92
Wanted: A Plan for Germany by Vera Micheles Dean	93
Philippine Aftermath by Mildred Adams	95
Memo on the Mormons by Carey McWilliams	97
A Southerner Goes Home by J. Mitchell Morse	99
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	100
The People's Front by Del Vayo	101

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

In the Doughface Tradition By Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.	102
American Solution by Stefan T. Possony	102
The Age of Giolitti by Paolo Milano	104
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	105
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	108
Art by Clement Greenberg	109
Records by B. H. Haggin	110

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 111

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 145 112

by Jack Barrett

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:

Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $5; Two Years $9; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

other to establish influence over its government. Unless both agree to keep hands off, there can be no lasting solution of the problem compatible with Iranian independence.

✱

DE GAULLE HAS ONCE AGAIN RESIGNED AS interim President of France and this time he insists that his decision is "irrevocable." Perhaps it will prove so: at least he is unlikely to come back except on his own terms. The immediate cause of his resignation appears to have been a new dispute over appropriations for the army to which De Gaulle wished to give priority despite the desperate economic situation. But this was only one of his many conflicts with the left parties underlying all of which was the fundamental issue of whether the new constitution should emphasize a strong and independent executive, as he desired, or should be based on sovereignty of the Assembly. Joint opposition to De Gaulle does not mean, however, that the Communists and Socialists would find it easy to work together in office. The Communist Party is making a bid for leadership of a new administration but it could not construct a Cabinet without the support of the Socialists. And an attempt to form a close alliance between Communists and Socialists might well split the latter in two. Another possibility, a government headed by a veteran, middle-of-the-road Socialist such as Vincent Auriol with equal representation for the Communists, could hardly prove lasting if the Communists insisted on exercising the right of opposition from inside the administration. The real difficulty is that while Communists and Socialists have some planks in common, mainly in the field of domestic economy, they differ acutely on other issues and particularly on foreign policy. Moreover they are in fierce competition for the support of the workers and the next election is not far off. In these circumstances the political crisis is unlikely to be speedily resolved and De Gaulle may be counting on the spectacle of the ship of state drifting in dangerous waters to arouse public demand for his return to the helm.

✱

IN THE LONG RUN THE DE GAULLE CRISIS cannot affect the decision of the National Constituent Assembly to force a showdown on the Spanish issue. By adopting unanimously last Friday its recommendation to the government to break with the Franco regime only a few hours after the Foreign Minister Bidault had announced "that France will act only in agreement with the United States and Great Britain," the Assembly showed clearly that it is in no mood to accept any new excuse for delay. The people of France doubt the determination of the United States to finish with fascism in Spain, and their skepticism regarding the British is still greater. The French press reacted violently to Mr. Bevin's incredible statement two weeks ago that there are enough troubles already in the world without taking on new ones in Spain. One hundred and fifty thousand Spanish refugees mingling everywhere in France with the resistance elements constantly exercise both a sentimental and a political pressure on the French people. This pressure is in turn reflected in the parties and in the Assembly and no government can resist it very long. Significantly enough, the resolution passed by the Assembly, very strong and clear-cut in its demand for a break, was much more circumspect in its reference to eventual recognition of the government-in-exile. It confirmed once more the weakness of the Giral Cabinet, and meanwhile a cable from London to the New York Times reported that Allied leaders were continuing their informal conferences with the former Prime Minister, Dr. Juan Negrín.

✱

GENERAL EISENHOWER HAS INJECTED SOME measure of order and stability into the demobilization process, but his intervention clearly fails either to make any fundamental change in an ill-conceived system or to bring any comfort to its victims. The General is probably not to blame. Too much has already happened that cannot readily be undone. Convinced of the danger that he will too soon "run out of army," he cannot, for example, undo the harm caused by General Marshall's unfortunate assurance of three months ago that all men with two or more years of service would be eligible for discharge in March. He cannot restore the morale of men who had every right to expect their freedom, on points, in February and who are now told that they must idle away another six months of their lives. Nor can he alone make the sweeping change in the entire demobilization system that was officially hinted at when the G. I. demonstrations reached a peak two weeks ago. Any drastic change involves the framing of a clear-cut occupation policy—and that is a job for Congress and the President, not the Chief of Staff. Admiral Leahy, the President's military adviser, is quoted by Drew Pearson as saying that our forces in Germany and Japan could be curtailed, without sacrificing their effectiveness, to the point where the task could be handled by volunteers expressly recruited for the purpose, while the Pacific islands could be safely left to policing by the navy. Adequate manpower is available—and more would be available to the degree that the army were rid of its caste discriminations, and other objectionable features. The real question is one of intelligently distributing that manpower.

✱

THE POLITICAL FERMENT IN JAPAN PRODUCED by our occupation policies has so far been largely restricted to industrial workers, intellectuals, small business men, and other urban elements; very little seeped back into the countryside. As a result, many of the most vicious lesser lights of the jingoist and military-fascist societies are now to be found in the rural districts working with the police, local bureaucrats, landlords, and the underground reserivist and 'chauvinist organizations to defeat democratic reforms. Organizers for the peasant unions and Socialist and Communist parties find it almost impossible to brave the reign of terror in the countryside. They can hope for little support from the American forces, since in many areas a second lieutenant and a squad of perhaps twenty men with a single interpreter must exercise control over hundreds of square miles. So poor are the intelligence facilities of these small forces that not infrequently the Japanese interpreter turns out to be a former militarist stalwart. This situation seriously imperils the chance of an anti-fascist victory in the coming elections, as well as the possibility of real land reforms, for these can be carried through only with the support of an aroused and organized peasantry. It can be corrected by improving our counter-intelligence work, by developing closer relations between the occupation forces and the peasant unions, by recentralizing occupation administration, and by stiffening military contingents with capable civilian officials willing to devote the next few years to assisting in the democratic transformation of rural Japan.

✱

CREATION OF A UNO REFUGEE COMMISSION as proposed by Mr. Bevin seems unlikely at this time in view of the opposition of Zionists and the Soviet Union. Zionists fear that turning the problem over to the UNO would delay the solution of the Palestine question. And because the remaining non-Jewish displaced persons are mostly Poles, residents of the former Baltic states, or political refugees from Yugoslavia, the Russians oppose bringing such a potentially explosive political issue into the UNO. However, since UNRRA, which is now responsible for the refugees, is expected to terminate its activities by the end of 1946, it is essential that a permanent agency be ready to take over. At the moment the only international agency concerned with the problem of persons who cannot be repatriated is the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees. This committee's record is largely one of inaction and procrastination, but of course it has never received real support from the leading powers; nor has it the power to issue passports or the resources to organize large-scale resettlement projects. It is an instrument however that can and should be used until it is politically possible for the UNO to assume a responsibility that logically belongs to it.

★

BY RAISING MARGIN REQUIREMENTS FOR security purchases to 100 per cent—in other words, by prohibiting the buying of stocks and bonds on credit—the Federal Reserve Board has shot its final bolt against a soaring market. In an article last week on the Stock Exchange boom, Keith Hutchison pointed to the possibility of this step but suggested that it would prove ineffective in view of the huge cash accumulations available for speculation and investment. The behavior of the New York exchanges the day after the Federal Reserve Board's action confirmed this opinion. At the opening, prices were moderately lower, but after reports that the steel strike was settled, renewed bidding for stocks produced a sharp rally. Later, when it was learned that these reports were false and that U. S. Steel had rejected the President's wage proposal, there was another bout of selling. Clearly traders in securities are more concerned with the industrial news than with the effects of a restriction of credit. They believe, not without reason, that an era of record corporate profits is ahead, with or without inflation, and as in 1919 and 1929 they are busy capitalizing a new Golden Age. The one measure which might bring them back to earth would be a drastically increased tax on capital profits. Marriner S. Eccles, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, has again brought forward this proposal, but action depends on Congress. Meanwhile we welcome the news that the New York Stock Exchange is about to undertake a nationwide advertising campaign urging the public to hold their war bonds and exercise the utmost caution in purchasing other securities. Publicity cannot stop the boom, but it may save some amateurs from burning their fingers.

★

IS THE DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION and news to other countries a proper function of the government? That is a debatable question which will eventually have to be decided by Congress when it is asked to appropriate funds for the State Department's Office of International Information and Cultural Affairs. It is not, however, a decision which ought to be made or influenced by interested private concerns. The Associated Press, by refusing to make its service available for use by the government's shortwave broadcasting system, is prejudging a public issue and usurping the powers of Congress. In announcing its action the A. P., as always, takes a very high-and-mighty line, declaring "that government cannot engage in newscasting without creating the fear of propaganda which necessarily would reflect on the objectivity of the news services from which such newscasts are prepared." We would be more impressed by this statement were we convinced that the Associated Press made a practise of disciplining those of its member newspapers which slant its dispatches by editing and headline writing. In any case, the objection to American government use of its service is a little curious considering that one of the agency's customers is Tass, the Russian government news agency. Does this mean that the A. P. directors are more certain of the objectivity of the Soviet government than of that of their own? Or is this difference in attitude due to the fact that Tass is a cash customer? We would have more respect for the A. P. if it had based its refusal of news to the State Department on frankly commercial grounds. Regarding news as a branded, salable commodity, it naturally objects to the government's free distribution of American news as unfair competition. But, of course, open adoption of this argument would conflict with the A. P.'s carefully fostered myth that it is a public service with no financial ax to grind.

It Has Happened Here

WITH irony and force and a candor seldom found in official quarters Assistant Secretary of State Braden continues his almost single-handed fight against the spread of fascism in the Americas. His speech last Saturday at the University Club in New York touched upon the central weakness which in too many critical periods has characterized the policy of the department he serves. That weakness is not a defined partiality for fascist regimes; rather, it is a passive, acquiescent attitude, based partly on a stubborn refusal to believe that such regimes inevitably threaten the security of the hemisphere and partly on reluctance to intervene in other nations' affairs. Both positions Mr. Braden punctured with sharp words. Fascism, he said, wherever it is allowed to thrive, is "like a gun pointed at our head."

There are some who say that it is no proper concern of ours if an armed gang seizes power in a foreign country, destroys its civil liberties, denies human rights and regiments the people. They stand on the book of diplomatic etiquette; or they point to imperfection in our own democratic practice; or they scoff at the notion of danger to us. Such persons, wishfully disregarding the plain and terrible lesson that has been administered to the world in the past decade, completely misunderstand the nature of National Socialist ideology.

He insisted, as he has done before, that the United States has the duty as well as the right to take the lead in combating that ideology. And he called on the American republics to band together immediately to counter the threat contained in the existence of a fascist government. This means Argentina, though the Assistant Secretary did not use the name. And his words were a clear announcement that the State Department is prepared to stand by its support of Uruguay's plan for multilateral American action against a state guilty of violating human rights or its international obligations.

The hope of winning a majority of the other American republics to this proposal is not at the moment bright. Some are compromised by their own reactionary, dictatorial regimes; some are directly under Argentine influences; some are wary of the very word "intervention" and see the shadow of the big stick in every United States move. The position of Mr. Braden and the handful of Latin American countries that support him would be immensely strengthened if the question were first raised in London. Certainly it should be. The presence of Argentina in the UNO is an anachronism as well as a danger, and many nations now realize it which were merely skeptical at San Francisco when the fight for Perón's admission was led by the predecessors of Mr. Byrnes and Mr. Braden. One of these nations should ask for the suspension or expulsion of a state which has so openly violated its commitments under the UNO charter. According to justice and logic the United States ought to take the lead in rectifying the error for which it bears the chief responsibility. But it is hard to imagine that Mr. Stettinius, who spoke solemn words in defense of Argentina at San Francisco, would accept this view. And even political strategy suggests that another government might make the proposal with better effect. If this were done—even though a final decision were postponed until after the American republics meet in the spring—the chances of united action on this side of the Atlantic would be multiplied.

The Nation Associates has addressed to the United Nations Assembly a memorandum requesting such action. Recalling the commitments made by Argentina when it signed the Chapultepec agreement—on the basis of which its admission to the UNO was obtained—the memorandum shows point by point how the present regime has violated its signed pledge and stands exposed as a satellite of the defeated Axis and a threat to the peace. The document also shows with what precision Perón has duplicated the program of the European fascist states on which his own is modeled.

Next week The Nation will publish this memorandum as a supplement. We hope it will lead to effective action by American progressive groups in support of the policy of collective security and anti-fascist unity in the Americas so ably expounded by Mr. Braden. If our government is now, as he says, firmly "determined that no complacency on our part shall allow a new growth of fascism in this hemisphere," it deserves the full understanding and energetic backing of the people. That it has not yet won them is indicated by the attitude of suspicion or open hostility which the Senate has adopted toward Mr. Braden's forthright recommendations. Obviously, even the war has not wiped out the laissez faire, do-nothing psychology that led the democratic world into it. We still have a fight on our hands.

They're Off!

UNABLE to hold themselves in check until the President could report on the state of the union, the nation's Congressional representatives spent the first week of the new session in feverish attempts to clamp a bridle on organized labor. The sentiment seemed to be that now was the time; if they didn't act at once, the situation might improve and their best chance would be gone.

It is entirely possible, of course, for Congress to pass a sound and constitutional law that will smooth relations between capital and labor, reduce to a minimum the need for using the strike weapon, and usher in an era of industrial peace that will make the angels sing. We would go all out for such a measure, holding labor no more than business to be above the law. But we know of no such proposal and have yet to hear one offered on the floor of Congress.

Among the representatives of the people who have been trampling one another underfoot to drop their respective labor-control bills into the hopper, two types stand out. First and loudest are those congenial union-baiters who see in the present wave of strikes a heaven-sent opportunity to break the back of organized labor, and if possible repeal the whole New Deal. Mr. Rankin typified this statesman-like approach when he blamed Congress for "the threat of communism in this country" and called for repeal of the Wagner Act and the law affecting wages and hours. Then there are those men of good-will, like President Truman himself, who think to head off a vicious law by a mild one, however pointless.

As long as the present strike-heated atmosphere prevails, we believe that no law is the best law. When the strikes have run their course, as they will, there will be time enough to review the problem—sanelly and without the fierce pressures of a prevailing crisis. This is the gist of the advice given to the Senate Education and Labor Committee by its two most authoritative witnesses, William H. Davis and William M. Leiserson, both distinguished veterans of the War Labor Board.

In the circumstances the Leiserson-Davis counsels would probably not have prevailed over the hot urge to smash labor while the opportunity lasts, but in the Senate this compulsion has given way to a more pressing, and even lower, consideration. Just as the movement to pass some kind of labor bill began gathering momentum, Senator Chavez of New Mexico arose to move that the Senate take up at once the bill for a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission, to prevent racial and religious discrimination in industry. Southern Democrats were outraged. Here was something plainly more devastating than strikes.

Adoption of the motion was the signal for a filibuster. Overton of Louisiana announced that the Senate's reconversion program was "stopped in its tracks indefinitely." Bilbo served notice of his intention to "speak twice on the measure—for thirty days each time." His colleague, Senator Eastland, warned simply that "the foundation is being laid in Congress for another Congress—when the clouds of racial antagonism become thicker—to create a German system." And the more respectable George of Georgia invoked the help of God for the Democratic Party in 1946 and 1948 "if this is all that Harry Truman has to offer." This small band of men, fresh from demanding a curb on labor for the sake of speeding the country's reconversion, lost no time in calling a strike against the Senate. No cooling-off period for them!

It was not a pretty picture, even as Congressional pictures go. But before concluding that it accurately reflected the sentiments of the folks at home, it is well to note that the Chavez motion to debate the FEPC carried by a vote of forty-nine to seventeen; and to note, too, that the Senate's Education and Labor Committee refused to be stampeded into rushing labor legislation to the floor. "These labor controversies are going to blow over some day," said its chairman, Senator Murray of Montana, "and then it will be possible to draft and pass constructive legislation." There are a number of Murrays in the Senate, even though their voices may be drowned out in the days ahead by the filibustering babble of the Bilbos.

Salute to Symington

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 21

THE liberal crowd in Washington was very dubious when President Truman last June nominated W. Stuart Symington to head the Surplus Property Board. Symington was another of those Missourians, with—at the time—no visible qualifications for the job. He was a St. Louis manufacturer. He was a son-in-law of Congressman James Wadsworth of New York. He was something of a socialite, a member of a wealthy Amherst family. He did not look at all like the kind of man who might use government-owned war plants to break log jams in key monopolistic industries. That doughty old foe of monopoly, Senator Joseph C. O'Mahoney of Wyoming, began an investigation. It was found that Symington had once been president of an obscure company obscurely convicted of violating anti-trust laws. No one quite knew what Vehicular Parking, Ltd., the wicked company, had done, but it seemed happily to confirm everybody's worst suspicions. Big business had taken over the Surplus Property administration. We sons of light have been known to jump to conclusions. This was one of those occasions when some very sweeping deductions were made from some very inadequate evidence.

Symington has won a resounding victory over one of the toughest troglodytes of American industry. Last September 21, in his report to Congress on aluminum plants and facilities, Symington told of some of his difficulties with the Aluminum Company of America. The Surplus Property Board was anxious to dispose of certain key aluminum plants in a way which would increase competition in this most monopolistic of all major American industries. Alcoa's position is so powerful that even the government can do little without its cooperation. "Alcoa's attitude," Symington reported, "has been noncommittal." When the RFC asked Alcoa whether it would assist new operators of these plants by letting them see plant records, blueprints, and instructions, Alcoa refused. Alcoa made a counter-proposal. It offered to take over these plants itself if the Surplus Property Board virtually would recommend the calling off of the anti-trust suit still pending against it in the federal courts. The counter-proposal, as cleverly presented by Alcoa, could have been dressed up to impersonate a victory for the government over monopoly. Symington turned it down.

The Surplus Property Administrator worked out a program for the disposal of two key plants to Alcoa's competitor, Reynolds Metals. He found that the greatest obstacle was Alcoa's ownership of certain crucial patents. Without a licence to use these patents it would be impossible for Reynolds to operate the plants economically and efficiently. There were long and painful private negotiations with Alcoa. They culminated last December 17 in a vague offer of "know how" on "reasonable terms" from Arthur V. Davis, chairman of Alcoa. On January 6 Symington made public an acrid letter he had written to Senator O'Mahoney, in which he told the whole story of Alcoa's recalcitrant attitude and accused Alcoa of blocking the government's program by refusing to license its patents to competitors. Four days later Symington called a press conference and proudly announced that Alcoa had agreed not only to license these patents to competitors but to license them royalty free. As a result the government was leasing to Reynolds Metals the huge Hurricane Creek plant for turning bauxite into alumina and the Jones Mill plant for smelting alumina into aluminum. No administrative agency had ever won so great a concession from Alcoa.

I do not wish to give a false and exaggerated picture either of Symington or of this Alcoa surrender. Symington is not a crusader. He is pragmatic in his approach and not at all likely to take an anti-monopoly position for its own sake. But he has won the confidence of many of the anti-trust old-timers by taking very seriously the anti-monopoly provisions of the Surplus Property Act, and by demonstrating unusual courage and fighting capacity in carrying them out. Alcoa is very powerful, in politics and in the press. Truman's Attorney General, Tom Clark, is no Thurman Arnold; the easygoing Texan is interested in making friends and influencing people; his attitude toward the anti-trust laws is respectful rather than passionate. It was not the Attorney General who took leadership in this case but the St. Louis manufacturer who had himself once parked his Vehicular Parking, Ltd., too close to the Sherman Act fireplug. In this rather unhappy Truman Administration Symington therefore deserves a salute, if only from your correspondent's popgun.

Nevertheless, it would be unwise to assume that with this victory competition is assured in the aluminum industry. Alcoa still controls about two-thirds of the aluminum output in this country. It is able at any time to flood the United States and drown out competition with aluminum from Canada. There, thanks to the virtual gift of power facilities at Shipshaw, its Siamese-twin corporation can produce aluminum more cheaply than anywhere else on earth. Alcoa's bauxite and power resources are so superior to those of Reynolds Metals that if, some years hence, the government's attention should flag, Alcoa could force Reynolds into line. But the conditions of the Reynolds lease of the Hurricane Creek plant will provide cheap alumina for smaller competitors. The patent offer will make it easier to find other operators for the considerable volume of aluminum facilities still in government hands. Thanks to Symington's efforts, we are closer to assured competition in the aluminum industry than ever before, and a free market in this basic light metal means additional jobs and expansion in a whole range of consumer and capital-goods industries.

THE DELEGATES ARRIVE

The Ghosts of Geneva

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

The Nation's London correspondent

London, January 17

AFTER a week-long overture of organization preliminaries and introductory generalities and after listening to speeches by Attlee, Byrnes, and Bevin, the UNO conference still appears sadly remote from a real world parliament. Observers of the age of your correspondent are possibly overburdened by memories of the failure of a similar experiment, bravely launched in 1919. Westminster's Central Hall is haunted uncomfortably by the ghosts of Geneva. It is therefore salutary to remind oneself that the UNO differs substantially from the League. It is, in the first place, a real world-wide organization and not a predominantly European club with a sprinkling of associate members from overseas; and, secondly, there is this time a more realistic recognition that the responsibility for executive decisions must be proportionate to the nations' ability to implement them by armed power. Nevertheless, the consoling spectacle provided by the presence of the United States and Soviet delegations incompletely allays two unresolved doubts: Can the UNO develop the techniques of a world parliament unless the delegations abandon the present method of voting as national blocks? And will the Assembly ever acquire real influence and responsibility if its role is limited to discussion of the secondary issues allocated to it by the omnipotent triumvirate?

With reference to the first question, Labor opinion here indorses Bevin's emphasis on the importance of the Economic and Social Council. Obviously, the best way to promote the habit of international cooperation is to engage in immediate, practical cooperative work on such problems as food relief, refugees, and physical reconstruction. Mere avoidance of war is a vague and negative objective whose pursuit by the old League was frustrated by the failure to eliminate through international action the economic disequilibria, frictions, and disorders from which the seeds of war upspring. It is encouraging to find among the delegations widespread recognition of the necessity of preventive action before disputes arise. But the question canvassed was whether practical collaboration would not be more likely if the delegations were composed of representatives of political parties nominated by legislatures. Thus composed, the Assembly might develop, on specific practical issues, groupings which transcended national frontiers. The existing composition of the delegations and the voting procedure tend to perpetuate the emphasis on an archaic sovereignty which ultimately wrecked the League.

The second question is equally crucial. Attlee's opening declaration that the UNO must be "an overriding factor in foreign policy" was significantly not echoed by either Soviet or United States spokesmen. Byrnes's warning that it was inadvisable to overburden the UNO at the existing stage of its development or to expect by "overnight magic" to create immediately a world parliament with the Security Council as its Cabinet was appreciated here as realistic and salutary. Undoubtedly, if such major controversial issues as the Russian attitude toward Persia and Turkey were pressed to a showdown by a resolution voted in the Assembly, the disunity of the UNO would be starkly revealed, with probably fatal results. But where does this lead us? The Russian delegation is adhering rigidly to the Moscow thesis that Big Three unity takes precedence over every other consideration, and is evidently inclined to restrict the UNO to a secondary role in world affairs. Opposing this attitude partly because it is Russian and partly because it conflicts with the Labor government's and particularly with Bevin's conception of democracy, the British delegation seems inclined to champion the rights of small nations to have a free voice. The alignment of the United States delegation has not been clarified, but Byrnes is expected to insist on the principle of sovereignty when the issue of trustee mandates in the Pacific is debated.

In the immediate future awkward clashes may probably be circumvented by compromise or the device of postponement. For example, the choice of a Secretary General is meeting a snag in the Russian disinclination to have a prominent world figure invested with such great authority. Disagreement on this question in the Security Council may be averted by the temporary continuation of Gladwyn Jebb in office. Similarly, one perceives an attempt to avoid a head-on collision in the Persian dispute by postponing it until a date is set for the evacuation of the Anglo-Russian forces. But the dilemma created by reluctance to overburden the UNO with unduly explosive questions and the fear that it may be kept a mere impotent spectator of the big powers' private maneuvers cannot be indefinitely avoided. The independence of speech and voting already exercised by minor states in issues not involving cardinal principles is worth little if these delegations are unable to exert any influence on big questions making for peace or war. Already the atmosphere of the Assembly is slightly reminiscent of the League, of which it was said cynically, "It touched nothing which it did not adjourn."

Wanted: a Plan for Germany

BY VERA MICHELES DEAN

Research director of the Foreign Policy Association and author of "The Four Cornerstones of Peace"

AMERICAN policy toward Germany, never clearly defined, has been further beclouded since V-E Day by a wide range of conflicting considerations. Among these are the natural desire of our people, in no way checked by the President or Congress, for rapid demobilization; fear of Russia's domination of the Continent, including Germany; reluctance to apply to the Germans measures of expropriation and control that contravene our concept of "free private enterprise"; and distrust of those political groups, in both liberated and enemy countries, which many Americans label "leftist" or "radical." American and civilian officials who are striving to apply the Potsdam directives in Germany can legitimately be questioned and criticized about details of their administration, but very little progress can be made toward improving the situation in the American zone, or in Germany as a whole, until our objectives in Europe have been clarified at top levels in Washington. Does the United States intend to participate in the four-power control of Germany as long as this may prove to be necessary—and no one can say today whether that will be five years or fifty years—or are we hoping to withdraw from Germany at the earliest possible moment? Our failure to answer this key question by an official statement of policy keeps not only Germany but all Europe in turmoil.

Though this country has avoided commitments on political matters, it did to some extent clarify the economic prospects for Germany on December 11, when Secretary of State Byrnes issued a statement and the State Department a declaration on German economy and reparations. These two documents, however, give the impression that the United States contemplates termination of all but "residual controls" by 1948, when the German economy will presumably be free to develop as best it can within the limitations imposed on it by the Potsdam settlement.

That settlement, it will be recalled, assigned some of Germany's richest agrarian areas in the east—estimated to have produced 25 per cent of German foodstuffs before 1939—to Poland and Russia, subject to final delimitation later; transferred the Silesian coal mines to the control of Poland; and stated that Germany's standard of living should be no higher than that of its neighbors, excluding Britain and Russia. The Potsdam settlement also provided for the payment of reparations by Germany, not by the transfer of cash, as in 1919, but by the transfer of plants and machinery to the United Nations and the seizure by the Allies of Germany's external assets.

There is no disagreement among the four occupying powers concerning the desirability of disarming Germany industrially by the destruction, or the transfer on account of reparations, of plants manufacturing articles unmistakably used for war—that is, all kinds of weapons, airplanes, submarines, synthetic rubber, and synthetic oil. The area of disagreement begins when it must be decided what other industries are not needed for Germany's peace-time economy and can therefore be removed for reparations, and what industries should be destroyed because of their convertibility to war purposes.

We have all learned that peace-time factories can be rapidly converted to war production by a technically proficient labor force under skilled management. Yet only a small group of persons in the United States have supported the drastic Morgenthau plan for de-industrialization of Germany, and none of the United Nations, even those whose economies were most seriously damaged by the Germans, have proposed to deprive Germany of all its industries solely on the ground that they might eventually be used for war purposes. At the same time it becomes increasingly clear that if a viable economy is to be reconstituted in Germany under the conditions imposed by the Potsdam settlement, a thoroughgoing reorientation of German production must be carried out, preferably by the Germans themselves. In fact, if the United States plans to withdraw all but "residual controls" by 1948, it is the Germans who must as soon as possible take the main responsibility for reorganization of their economy.

The shocking physical destruction that meets one's eyes in all Germany's industrial centers has led some observers to jump to the conclusion that we need not fear the military resurgence of the Reich for years to come. The fact is, however, that while many factories—but far more homes—have been smashed, a remarkably large proportion of Germany's productive facilities could be promptly restored, especially given the technical proficiency of German workers. With this situation in mind, the now liquidated Foreign Economic Administration, in its voluminous report to the Kilgore committee, declared that to prevent future German rearmament, the economy of Germany should be thoroughly reorganized. Heavy industry, whose over-expansion for war purposes had long unbalanced the country's economic life, should be drastically reduced, and capital and man-power should be diverted to the production of consumers' goods, the need for which had been sharply increased by the destruction of homes and their contents. At the same time, the report said, the Germans should be urged to convert the large estates, which had been devoted to the often uneconomic raising of grain crops protected by high tariffs, to intensive agricultural enterprises like dairying. Such a readjustment, the FEA report contended, would not only deprive Germany of the industrial base for military power but would eventually make possible a standard of living which might prove higher than the standard achieved when the German economy was geared primarily to war production.

The often repeated argument that reduction of German heavy industry would retard the recovery of the liberated countries, which in the past imported tools and manufactured goods from the Reich, is not regarded by the FEA observers as sound. It is true that German exports were in many ways beneficial to the countries of Europe, but investigation of the inner workings of the I. G. Farben industrial empire and of other German-dominated cartels offers conclusive evidence that German exports were used by the Nazis as a weapon for economic penetration into countries they intended to rule politically, and that German industry both inspired and abetted the military expansionist plans of the Nazi leaders and the Wehrmacht. Germany's customers may miss for a time the manufactured products they used to import from the Reich. But this loss will be small compared to the security from aggression that they may gain through the limitation of German heavy industry.

To replace German exports two things will have to be done. First, Germany's former customers must readjust their own economies, probably decreasing their agricultural exports and expanding their industrial production, as is already contemplated in Holland. Second, the United States and Britain must study ways and means of furnishing tools and manufactured goods to the liberated countries of a quality—and what is even more important, at a price—comparable to the quality and price of goods previously sold by the Germans. The Western powers must also consider the possibility of aiding the liberated countries to modernize and expand their industries through loans and long-term credits. Such aid is envisaged in the State Department declaration of December 11, which gives welcome stress to the need of helping Germany's victims to rebuild ahead of Germany. In addition, the United States must learn to import some of the goods produced by our war-time Allies—and eventually by our war-time enemies as well. Otherwise, obviously, the countries of Europe will be unable to purchase the products of our war-expanded industries or to repay our loans or credits.

Reorientation of the German economy on a national scale will require the establishment of central German administrative organs for industry, trade, finance, and other economic activities, as provided at Potsdam. The creation of these central organs has been opposed by France, which wants first to obtain a settlement of Germany's western border comparable to that made by the Big Three in the east. France proposes that the Ruhr—Germany's principal source of coal now that the Silesian mines have been assigned to Poland—should be excluded from the central administration and placed under the control of an international commission which would allocate Ruhr coal to Germany as well as to other countries, and thereby exercise control (could it be called "residual"?) over Germany's industrial development. It also proposes that the Rhineland be divided into four districts to be administered by France, Britain, Holland, and Belgium.

The United States has so far opposed France's suggestions, being reluctant to permit further partition of German territory. But if this country intends to withdraw from Germany in a relatively short time, then it is not in a position to object to France's plans for safeguarding its security in the West any more than it can legitimately oppose any steps Russia feels it must take in Eastern Europe. If the United States dislikes France's policy or fears Russia's, it has no alternative but to remain in Europe and do its part in establishing security on that continent, a security which, as two wars should have proved, is inextricably linked to our own.

But no thoroughgoing reorganization of Germany's economy will be effected by men whose economic interests would thereby be jeopardized. The United States cannot expect German manufacturers to shut down heavy industries and turn to light industries, or owners of large estates to break them up and distribute them among small farmers who might undertake dairying or some other intensive form of agriculture. Nor will the elimination of Nazis from positions of authority, no matter how meticulously carried out, of itself alter the character of German society. The inescapable conclusion is that if the United States wants a reorientation of German production it will have to enlist the aid of those political groups which are not afraid of far-reaching social and economic reforms—and the strongest of these groups in Germany today is formed by the Social Democrats. The United States should back these groups, not for reasons of ideology or sentiment, but for the purely practical reason that they are the only ones which have shown a genuine desire to cooperate in a new Germany. Americans who fear Soviet Russia's influence in Germany, and on the Continent as a whole, should realize that unless necessary social and economic reforms are carried out now, with the approval of the Allies, it is possible that the Germans, and other peoples, may see no alternative to communism, however little enthusiasm they may have for the system developed in Russia.

Most important of all, we must understand that it will not be enough to deprive the Germans of armaments, or the capacity to produce armaments. It is essential that they should rid themselves of the will to make war, a will that, when the need arises, can transform plowshares into swords or rocket bombs. The will to war cannot be uprooted unless we ourselves give Germany, and the rest of the world, convincing evidence that we do not intend to follow the example of our enemies; that we will not allow narrow nationalism to shape our trade policies, or shut out immigrants from other lands, or thwart our efforts at cooperation with other nations; that we will not try to keep the secret of the atomic bomb or of other weapons from the rest of the world and thus encourage another armaments race, whose stake would be the survival of mankind. Together with our allies we have done a remarkable job in defeating our enemies on the field. Our task now is to defeat within ourselves the evil impulses and hollow fears which could rob us of the hard-won fruits of victory.

Philippine Aftermath

BY MILDRED ADAMS

Journalist and critic with a special interest in Hispanic American affairs

II. Friend or Enemy

PRESIDENT SERGIO OSMENA, now back in the Philippines, has produced a local definition of collaborator. To the Presidential mind a collaborator is "one taking part in the execution of the policy of the enemy." Señor Osmeña does not mean, he explains, that every Filipino who held office under the Japanese did so willingly or was thereby disloyal. He seems to accept the contention that apparent collaboration might have been in fact an act of patriotism. But he believes that people "who by their acts placed themselves in positions of responsibility" under the Japanese should not hold office in the new Philippine government, due to be elected April 30, 1946.

The President's definition may help to clear up a situation which has become grave and puzzling since liberation. In the Philippines the leading public men have been involved in collaboration with the enemy. In jail or out, they are not going to give up their public reputation and position easily. Some of them have already announced their candidacy for office in the coming elections. Under such circumstances President Osmeña's definition becomes in a sense a campaign pronouncement. If applied literally it will remove from the scene his own most dangerous rival and many of the islands' most experienced politicians. If it is not applied, the United States is likely, on Independence Day, 1946, to find itself in the position of turning the islands over to the very officials who during the war helped our enemies.

The American position is, on the face of it, clear. President Truman has said that collaborators must be punished and has directed the Attorney General to proceed accordingly. But the underlying situation is so confused that it makes the problem of judging and punishing European collaborators look like mere kindergarten work. The main factors in the confusion are the political divisions before and during the war, the caliber of the politicians, the position of America as an occupying nation, and last but not least the pressure of time.

It should be remembered that in November, 1941, the Filipinos held a national election at which Quezon was reelected and a new legislature chosen. Before the legislators had a chance to meet or Quezon could reform his Cabinet, the Japanese struck. Not until June, 1945, when the Japanese had been driven out, did the legislature then elected convene. Meanwhile, however, during at least part of the three and a half years of Japanese occupation a puppet legislature composed to some extent of the same men had been meeting and passing laws. It was that legislature which in October, 1943, chose José Laurel to be "President-elect of the future Republic of the Philippines" by a vote which the Tokyo radio reported to be unanimous. And it is in substance this same legislature, minus men killed in battle, minus flamboyant collaborators arrested by the United States army, and plus members who had been out of the country or had been fighting the Japanese, which is the actual law-making body in the islands today.

Major Pedro López, elected representative from Cebu in the 1941 elections and one of the men who chose to flee to the hills and work with the guerrillas rather than to act for the Japanese as Governor of Cebu, made a speech to his fellow-legislators on June 21 of this year calling attention to these facts. "When I was in the United States," he said, "I had the impression that all the ranking policy-making puppets and collaborators, the symbols of Japanese power in the Philippines, had already been removed from 'authority and influence' over our 'political and economic life' pursuant to the Presidential directive. Imagine what a shock I had upon seeing a few days ago the following item in the Philippine Press for June 10." He then read, "In yesterday's issue the Philippine Press revealed that nineteen Representatives and eight Senators of the seventy Representatives and fifteen Senators known to be alive in liberated areas had held office under the Japanese puppet government. In response to numerous public inquiries we publish herewith, without comment, the names of those individuals and the positions they held." The list of the men with their positions followed.

No clear account of the conduct of these men has yet been reconstructed; the daily records of government under the occupation are said to have been destroyed. Four of them were absolved by Japanese arrest. But it seems clear that the Japanese governed the islands with much of the personnel which had been previously in office and which apparently intends to continue in office. From the surrender of Manila until October, 1943, a Philippine Executive Commission headed by Jorge Vargas carried on interim government. In 1943 the so-called National Service Association (Kalipabi) sponsored by the Japanese—it is now being groomed as the local fascist party—met in convention and was intrusted with naming a Preparatory Commission for Philippine Independence to be composed of twenty members. This commission was headed by José Laurel and included Chief Justice José Yulo of the Supreme Court and three former justices. Laurel was soon named to the Presidency of the "Future Republic of the Philippines," and in January, 1944, he chose his first Cabinet. This "republican" government ruled the islands under the tutelage of Japan until the summer of 1945.

Before President Quezon was brought to the United States in 1942, he named Jorge Vargas, his trusted aide, Secretary of the Interior and placed him in charge of the Cabinet which was to carry on in the President's absence. Vargas became mayor of Manila a month later, then chairman of the Philippine Executive Commission—and eventually ambassador to Japan! He was quoted by a reporter who saw him in September, 1945, as saying, "Practically everybody has been a collaborationist in the Philippines to help his countrymen to survive. What difference does it make whether you went out and fought the Japanese or got along with them—so long as either way you helped your countrymen?"

It is commonly assumed in this country that men like Vargas are the Philippine counterparts of Quisling and should be treated accordingly. That assumption needs scrutiny. Let us take the case of Manuel Roxas, now president of the Senate and Osmeña's opponent in the coming elections. Roxas has frequently been described as the most controversial figure in the Philippines. During the occupation he was not only head of the puppet Senate but in charge of the Philippine Economic Development Board for the Laurel government.

Manuel Roxas

Yet as a lieutenant colonel in the army reserve he had been made aide to General MacArthur in 1941 and had helped in the General's escape from Corregidor. After the fall of the fortress he had held out with the guerrillas on Mindanao for more than a year. Ten years earlier he was in the United States with Osmeña as head of the Ninth Independence Mission—the "Osrox" mission—and worked out with our Congress the details of the Hawes-Hare-Cutting act, which Hoover vetoed. He was one of the drafters of the Commonwealth Constitution of 1935, and became speaker of the House and Secretary of Finance. He is conceded to be the "strong man" of the islands.

Less well known than Roxas in the United States, José Laurel was famous in his homeland as statesman, author, and jurist. He was educated in this country and was an honor student at Yale Law School. In the Philippines he became successively Senator, Secretary of the Interior, and member of the Supreme Court, and then, in October, 1943, "President-elect."

Laurel's Cabinet contained, in January, 1944, nine posts, of which two—Home Affairs and Economic Affairs—were held by Laurel himself. Rafael Alunan, who had been Secretary of the Interior in Quezon's Cabinet three years earlier, was Secretary of Agriculture and Natural Resources. Teófilo Sisón, Quezon's Minister of National Defense in 1941 and before that Secretary of the Interior, was Minister of Justice. Laurel's Minister of Finance was Antonio de las Alas, a former member of both the Murphy and the Quezon government. The Minister of Public Works and Communications was Quintín Paredes, first Resident Commissioner of the Philippines to the United States. Another Philippine Resident Commissioner, Camilo Osias, became Laurel's Minister of Education. His Minister of Foreign Affairs was Claro P. Recto, president of the Philippine Constitution convention of 1935 and a Supreme Court justice.

Did such men become traitors under Japanese pressure? Or were they thinking only of their own profit? Or did they really believe that they could serve their country best by working with Japan? Filipino opinion seems to be divided. Some persons charge that the common people were betrayed by the ruling class, and others feel that the politicians did the best they could under very hard circumstances. Among the former are various guerrilla leaders, men who served in the American or Filipino armies and whose property was therefore confiscated, and the left-wing groups and agrarian leaders who are agitating for land reform. Those who identify their own interests with those of the ruling group think that Laurel, Roxas, Vargas, and the others mitigated Japanese oppression by their skill in bargaining and their apparent compliance. They say that Laurel prevented the conscription of Filipino youth by threatening to resign, and that lesser officials, by remaining in office, protected their people from the rigors of Japanese rule.

People who know the Filipinos well explain the divergence of views partly by the islands' history. Spain occupied them for 377 years, the United States for 43 years, Japan for 3½ years, and now the United States is back again. In each period there were people who collaborated and people who resisted. But always life had to go on, crops had to be gathered, children fed. Is it any wonder, this explanation runs, that Filipinos have developed a capacity to adapt themselves to whatever power is in control or that they find the line between patriotism and collaboration a bit vague?

Americans may be certain that those who worked with us are patriots and those who worked against us are traitors. "But," say certain Filipinos, "traitors to whom? To the United States, yes, but the United States is not the Philippines. The Americans took the Philippines by force; now they are getting out, and it behooves us to look to our interests, which are not necessarily theirs." The official position, of course, identifies Filipino and American interests. Collaborators have been declared the concern of both governments. The United States army carried on a wide investigation when MacArthur came back, and trials are now proceeding under the Commonwealth. But of the collaborators mentioned above only Laurel is under arrest, and it is doubtful whether even he will be brought to trial.

Meanwhile time presses. The elections are scheduled for April. Osmeña and the men charged with collaboration belong to the same party, have been political friends, or enemies, for years as the tide of power has swung back and forth. Osmeña has no means of testing the opinion of his people before the elections. He was prevented from naming two prominent guerrilla leaders—Confesor and Kabili—to his Cabinet by the collaborators still in the legislature. He cannot depend on a Supreme Court whose Chief Justice is charged with getting on nicely with Japan.

The situation is thoroughly unsatisfactory from every point of view except that of the men who collaborated with Japan under the guise of patriotic action, and who now seem in a fair way not only to escape punishment but to take over the political control of the islands within six short months. Unless some solution is found, independence will dawn under gloomy skies, and the vaunted American experiment in colonial government will end "not with a bang but a whimper," leaving behind it problems so grave that they will challenge America's pride in that experiment.

[This is the second of a series of articles by Miss Adams on the problems of the Philippines.]

Memo on the Mormons

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Salt Lake City, January 2

TO AN outsider Utah is a political puzzle. Though it has little industry and a weak and undeveloped labor movement, the state remained safely in the column of the Democratic Party during the Roosevelt years. Neighboring states—Idaho, Colorado, and Nevada—have been unpredictable, but Utah, with a pre-war population of about 500,000, has been a Democratic stronghold in the intermountain region. Currently Utah is represented in the Senate by two outstanding New Dealers, Elbert Thomas and Abe Murdock; in the November, 1944, election Senator Thomas was reelected by a handsome majority, running ahead of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

How did Utah come to send such progressive men to the United States Senate and to elect to the state Supreme Court an outstanding liberal like Chief Justice James Wolfe? The subject interested me, for the political thought of the state is not, per se, particularly liberal or progressive. After questioning seasoned political observers in Ogden, Salt Lake City, and Provo I came to the conclusion that Utah's progressive political behavior in the last dozen years may be explained by what these men all politely refer to as "the ecclesiastical situation."

In rural areas the population of Utah is about 80 per cent Mormon; in Salt Lake City it is about 40 per cent Mormon and in Ogden perhaps 30 per cent. At present the two United States Senators, the two Representatives, and the Governor are all members of the Mormon church—with their Mormonism running the gamut from strict orthodoxy to what is called "political Mormonism," that is, a nominal adherence to the tenets of the church. One might assume, then, that the Mormon church dominates the politics of the state; and so it does, but in a curiously reverse fashion.

In the 1944 election, as in other Roosevelt campaigns, the church as represented by the omnipotent Twelve Apostles was bitterly anti-New Deal and anti-Roosevelt. Under the leadership of J. Reuben Clark it made every effort to swing Utah back into the Republican column, which meant back to the conditions prevailing under Senator Reed Smoot. Full-page advertisements in the church-owned Deseret News attacked Senator Thomas as a "Communist" and urged his defeat. Nevertheless, the Senator scored an impressive victory—which suggests that the secret of success in Utah politics consists in arousing the active opposition of the Mormon hierarchy; the rank and file resent the leaders' interference in political affairs and vote the other way.

This revolt of the Mormon congregations against the hierarchy apparently dates from the 1929 depression, when the church came out against the relief program of the New Deal. Editorials and cartoons in the Deseret News implied that only the lazy and shiftless would "go on the dole," particularly when the church had well-stocked warehouses for the relief of needy saints. The needy saints, however, showed a clear preference for cash relief over an allotment of cabbages, potatoes, and carrots from the warehouses. Moreover, rank-and-file Mormons noted that the church seemed quite willing to accept tithes paid out of WPA checks. Membership in the church did not decline, but the saints refused to accept the hierarchy's political dictation.

The people of Utah were fortified in their New Deal leanings by their belief that the state's prosperity required a federal administration committed to extensive development of Western resources and by their resentment against absentee-owned corporations with large holdings in Utah. There is in addition—though the reins of power are tightly held by the self-perpetuating apostles—a tradition of democracy in the church, as well as of cooperation and mutual aid. The present leadership is apparently aware of the disposition of the members to rebel against political dictation and is trying to conciliate them. The new head of the church, George Albert Smith, who is regarded in Utah as a mild liberal, recently extended the olive branch to Senator Thomas.

Utah has had a more homogeneous population than perhaps any other Western state, but since 1941 a number of Japanese Americans have been relocated in Salt Lake City and the surrounding countryside. The number of Negroes in Ogden and Salt Lake City has also slightly increased as a result of the war, and today about 5,000 Negroes live in the two cities. Under the creed of the Mormon church Negroes, while they can attend church services, are ineligible for the priesthood and are regarded as spiritually "beyond the pale," incapable of redemption. In consequence Utah is a Jim Crow state. Even in Ogden and Salt Lake City Negroes are denied service in the downtown cafes, restaurants, and hotels and are segregated in the balconies of the motion-picture theaters. That the discrimination may be traced to the "ecclesiastical situation" is shown by the fact that Japanese Americans, several hundred of whom are members in good standing of the Mormon church and eligible for the priesthood, are not segregated.

Today all Utah is preoccupied with the question of what will happen to the Geneva steel mill at Provo, which was constructed by the United States Steel Corporation and operated by it for the government during the war. Since November 10 the mill has been virtually closed down and the government is calling for sealed bids on the $240,000,000 plant. Henry Kaiser seems out of the picture, and the United States Steel Corporation has disclaimed any interest in Geneva's future and announced plans for enlarging the San Francisco plants of its subsidiary, Columbia Steel. Geneva is a completely modern mill, using the most up-to-date methods and the most expert know-how, and with almost every operation electrically controlled. It seems incredible that this wonderful plant, furnishing employment badly needed in Utah, could be dismantled or permitted to remain idle or to be operated merely on a token basis. There are reports that the state itself might buy and operate the plant, but most of the people I talked with were pessimistic about the outlook.

In the country around Provo the farm units are small, averaging only about fifteen acres, and during the depression most of the farmers were on relief. The emphasis placed on land ownership by the creed of the church has caused the original holdings to be subdivided among many heirs until more people are living on the land than it can profitably support. In such a region, a plant like the Geneva steel mill would be of inestimable benefit. It would furnish, in fact, a solution to the chief economic problem of the area, a fact clearly recognized by the residents.

A long-term trend toward a lessening of the cleavage between Mormons and Gentiles in Utah was accelerated by the war. Thousands of soldiers from other parts of the country were in camps throughout the state, and the Geneva plant and other war industries brought in many people. With the introduction of new elements and new points of view, new business leaders have come to the fore. One of the most interesting is George Hatch, recently elected president of the New Council of American Business. Part owner of the Ogden Standard-Examiner and of a chain of radio stations in Utah and Idaho, Hatch will add strength to the progressive cause in Utah politics.

In 1946 Senator Murdock and the state's two Representatives—Walter Granger and J. Will Robinson—will be up for reelection. Senator Murdock is an extremely popular figure and a strong "campaigner." If the church hierarchy again opposes him, he would seem assured of victory. Liberals are disturbed, however, by the possibility that he may accept an appointment to the federal bench. Governor Herbert Maw, a former professor of public speaking at the University of Utah, who was reelected in 1944 by a very close margin—the election was actually in dispute for several months—is not highly regarded by liberal and labor elements. They charge him with having built up a personal political machine and with refusal to cooperate in liberal plans. It is rumored that Governor Maw, conscious of having run far behind the rest of the ticket in 1944, is an applicant for the favor of Mr. Hannegan, seeking either to succeed Secretary Ickes or to obtain some important regional post in the federal bureaucracy. If Senator Murdock should take his name off the ballot, there would be a real danger that the electoral balance which has prevailed since 1932 might be upset. For Utah is liberal by an accident of "the ecclesiastical situation" rather than by studied intention.

[This is the third of Mr. McWilliams's letters from the Middle West and West.]

A Southerner Goes Home

BY J. MITCHELL MORSE

Formerly on the staff of The Nation

Columbia, South Carolina

THERE were several Negroes in our coach as the train left New York, and we wondered whether they would be ordered out when we reached the color line at Washington. They weren't. Three more got on at Richmond. Nobody said anything; there was no unpleasantness. The conductor with the Southern accent who took over at Washington didn't seem to notice that any of his passengers were colored. There was a fifteen-minute wait at Hamlet, North Carolina, and we went into a small stand across the tracks that had a soda fountain and magazines. Only after we were halfway inside did we notice on the lower part of the door the words "For White Only."

Columbia is not a big city, but it has the air and manner of a metropolis. It is the seat of the state university; it has a little theater and a symphony orchestra. There are readers of The Nation, the New Republic, and the Partisan Review. But at the railroad stations, even as in Hamlet, there are signs that say "White" and "Colored"; and the Chamber of Commerce lists among the city's attractions the fact that its population is 99.1 per cent native American and 64.4 per cent white.

The population has increased from 62,000 to 70,000 in the last five years. Just outside the city limits areas which were formerly swamps and sandhills are now thickly settled suburban communities. I said jokingly, "Pretty soon people will be commuting from Horrell Hill"—a lonely crossroads village fifteen miles away. The reply was, "They're doing it already." In this city of private homes, apartment buildings are springing up; a group of formerly vacant lots is now a shopping center; and most of the stores on Main Street have bright new fronts and modern interiors. There are four railroad stations; five years ago there was one.

The source of this wealth is the federal government. Columbia is district headquarters for the Carolinas, Georgia, and Florida of forty-six federal agencies exclusive of the army, navy, and Selective Service. It is a little Washington.

Plans are being made to establish a number of new factories to process other materials than cotton. Great hopes center in Georgia's coming suit to have the Supreme Court hold the Southern freight-rate differential a violation of the anti-trust act. The differential makes it more expensive to ship a manufactured article from Columbia to New York than from New York to Columbia. Since the North grows no cotton, there is no differential on the raw fiber; if the cotton is spun into thread, the South-to-North freight rate becomes higher than the North-to-South rate; if the thread is woven into cloth, the differential increases; if the cloth is made into shirts, there is a further increase. This has stunted Southern industry and made the South little more than a supplier of raw materials, or, as we say bitterly, a colonial area. There is no doubt here that the Supreme Court will make history by outlawing this arrangement.

The railroads have countered Georgia's suit with the Bulwinkle bill, which would exempt common carriers from the anti-trust act. This bill is a cause of considerable worry here. The South Carolina delegation in Congress is solidly against it, and pressure is being put on Jimmy Byrnes—all South Carolinians call him Jimmy—to "use his influence."

The process of industrialization is going on all over the state: paper, plastics, nylon, chemicals. Some factories are already in production; others are being built. The Santee Cooper hydroelectric development is attracting not only Northern but local capital. "Local capital," indeed, is the rallying cry of the Chamber of Commerce. We welcome the Yankee dollar, but we prefer our own. We really are not fond of Yankees.

One important cause of our dislike is that the Yankees come to exploit the cheap labor we hold out to them. Cheap labor is the only feature of colonialism of which we approve, but it makes us uneasy, and we react emotionally, disliking both the Yankees and their victims. Our labor policies are the most backward in the country, and there is no sign that we intend to improve them. The mechanical cotton-picker will probably, within a decade, displace 80 per cent of the people now engaged in growing cotton. There are those in Columbia who smile with pleasure at the prospect of so many willing workers.

Those who smile are the ones who frown when the talk turns to the progress the Negro has made. There has been much progress in many little ways, but fundamentally the Negro's position has not changed. He is still a pariah. He is better dressed now, he walks with his head up and meets white people with a look of indifference or hostility in place of the former servile smile. That is all to the good. But he still does not enjoy the equal protection of the law, he still is sadly limited in his opportunities for education and employment, and he still is not accorded the ordinary courtesies that betoken recognition of human dignity. His economic condition has improved noticeably in the last five years, but the pavement still ends at the edge of his neighborhoods.

The price of progress is change, and the changes that have taken place in Columbia are not altogether pleasing. Beautiful old Southern mansions have been torn down to make room for filling stations. And our mores are changing with our architecture. We have been invaded by barbarians from the North, with no knowledge of our traditions and no regard for our way of life. They are modernizing us, without considering that we may not want to be modernized; and the Lord apparently isn't going to save us. Directly across the street from the biggest church in town is a large sign advertising the state health department's free mobile clinic for venereal disease. And in the expanded county courthouse the Court of Domestic Relations, established in 1944, now hears an average of 100 cases a month. In the old days we didn't have any domestic relations.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Germany's Steel Ration

AFTER prolonged wrangling the Allied Control Council in Berlin has decided to allow Germany to retain a steel production capacity of 7,500,000 tons of ingot steel annually. Maximum annual production, however, is not to exceed 5,800,000 tons, which, according to American experts, means that Germany will have available for domestic consumption and exports (limited to 600,000 tons) some 4,200,000 tons of finished steel. These figures represent a compromise between Soviet proposals for maximum productive capacity of 3,000,000 tons and British suggestions of 10,500,000. They summarily dispose, Drew Middleton writes in the New York Times, of any hopes that Germany can or will be reduced to "an agricultural state."

For this reason the decision of the Allied Council is likely to be attacked by publicists who think that the easiest way of losing the peace is to leave Germany any armament-making potential whatsoever. Those who, like myself, have always questioned the wisdom of a policy of drastic de-industrialization will be inclined to criticize the steel allotment as dangerously meager. For the annual output which is to be permitted is approximately the same as what the German steel plants turned out in 1932, when the Reich, in common with every industrial country in the world, was racked by depression and had around six million unemployed. In other words, for a country which must undertake an enormous amount of reconstruction we propose to allow no more steel than it consumed in a year when construction was practically at a standstill. In 1932, for instance, the German railroads used only 366,000 tons of track steel compared with a normal average in the years 1925 to 1929 of about 1,500,000 tons. Today the battered German railroads are a bottleneck for the whole Continental economy, unable to transport from the Ruhr all the coal now being raised there, even though mine output is less than half the pre-war normal. For the sake of Europe the German railroad and canal network must be restored to a state of efficiency, and that task alone will absorb large quantities of steel.

No one proposes, of course, that Germany should be allowed to retain its swollen war-time steel capacity, which reached about 23,000,000 tons. But it seems to me that the Allies could safely leave Germany a steel capacity equal to its production in 1924—around 10,000,000 tons—provided they retain strict control over German supplies of strategic raw materials. Without manganese, nickel, tungsten, molybdenum, and other alloy metals, all of which Germany must import, steel is of little use for armaments.

The Control Council's proposed steel allowance for Germany amounts to about 180 pounds per head per annum, while a ten-million-ton total would mean approximately 300 pounds. This compares with a German average for the years 1924 to 1929 of about 450 pounds and with British and French consumption in 1937, a moderately prosperous year, of some 600 and 380 pounds, respectively. American production in 1940 was equivalent to about 900 pounds per head.

Steel, as we know, is the basis of all modern industry. If supplies of the metal are cut off, all factories will gradually come to a standstill. It follows that if a country's supplies of steel are limited, an immovable ceiling is placed on its total industrial production. That is what makes quantitative control of the steel industry such a very effective strait-jacket for German economy. Nevertheless, the strong arguments in favor of freezing German industry at a low point should not blind us to the consequences of the policy.

The most important of these consequences is that a very large fraction of Germany's urban population will become redundant. With steel output restricted to the 1932 level, it is unlikely that other industries will be able to achieve a higher output or support a larger labor force than they did in that year, when, as we have noted, six million workers were unemployed. Taking into account the growth of population since then, including enforced migration from the east, Germany's future surplus of industrial workers may well be still larger.

What is to be done with these six million workers, making with their families perhaps some fifteen million people in all? Mr. Morgenthau and other advocates of German de-industrialization insist that they can be transferred to agricultural employments. They say, correctly, that the German soil has been undercultivated and could support a larger population. But I do not think they have considered sufficiently the economic, political, and sociological problems involved in so wholesale a shift of population from one mode of living to a very different one.

In all industrial countries the drift from the country to the towns has been automatic. In order to reverse the tide, life in the towns will have to become so unattractive that workers will pull up stakes and accept as a better lot the rather slim rewards of subsistence homesteading. I doubt whether this will happen unassisted. It will be necessary for steps to be taken to discourage people from staying in the towns. Urban living standards will have to be forced down. That will mean wage-cutting and limitation of the power of the trade unions, whose revival in Germany we have been encouraging. It will involve the abolition of social-security measures, particularly of any kind of unemployment relief.

We aim at gradually restoring self-government to Germany on a democratic basis, but what German party, dependent on popular suffrage, could carry out a program designed to force unwilling workers to leave their traditional employments? This is the kind of action which only a dictatorship can put through, and since the Allies can hardly allow a German dictator to do the job, they will eventually be forced to solve the problem themselves.

I had meant to discuss in this article some of the probable effects of industrial shrinkage in Germany on the economy of Europe as a whole, but this must be left for another occasion. I can only pose one question without trying to answer it: How will the interests of American, British, French, Belgian, and other workers be affected if the standards of German workers making competitive products are beaten down far below their own?

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

EVERYONE who knew the old League of Nations at first hand is watching anxiously to see what sort of men will be named to the secretariat of the United Nations Organization. For months a quiet tug-of-war has been going on between the conservatives of the UNO, who would like to see an intelligent but "safe" moderate in the post of General Secretary—say, the Dutch Foreign Minister, Van Kleffens—and the progressives who are pressing for a militant anti-fascist like Masaryk or Lie, the Norwegian. If there must be a compromise, as now seems likely, Pearson, the Canadian ambassador at Washington, would not be a bad choice. At least he would bring to the new organization a flair which never characterized the first secretary of the League, Sir Eric Drummond, now Earl of Perth. The world might be blown to atoms—we hadn't split the atom then—but brave Sir Eric remained unruffled until he had finished reading the "agony column" in the London Times. Nor does Pearson bear the slightest resemblance to Drummond's successor, Joseph Avenol of France. When the lists of war criminals were being prepared, I urged in The Nation the inclusion of Avenol, accomplice of the fascist aggressors and gravedigger of the League. Today he lives placidly in Switzerland, no doubt hobnobbing with Georges Bonnet, who, I am told, is busy trying to rescue some of the secret funds his Nazi friends deposited abroad.

I am more concerned about the rest of the secretariat, about the men who are going to carry on the day-to-day business of the UNO. It is of crucial importance that tested anti-fascists staff the political departments and the information service. Even the old League had a handful of such men: Dr. Rajchman of Poland, now associated with the UNRRA; Ziliacus, today a Labor member of the British Parliament; Oden of France, and others. Most of them eventually resigned in protest against the reactionary intrigues of Avenol. Together with representatives from the resistance movements and other men with clean records they could form the hard, democratic core of the new secretariat.

The right-wing papers of Mexico, I am happy to learn, have begun to follow The Nation. At any rate, judging by the inexhaustible stock of epithets, both Spanish and Mexican, which my name evokes, they have read my recent articles about the Mexican political situation. Of course I could sue them for libel—if Mexico had any libel law. But in thirty years of political controversy it has never occurred to me to waste even a line in reply to a personal attack.

What really infuriated them was my prediction that if counter-revolution breaks out in Mexico Lázaro Cárdenas will come back and take charge of the situation. One paper devoted no less than three editorials to the subject; I shall not identify the paper lest I make it too popular among reactionaries on this side of the border. But it is common knowledge in Mexico that the publication was in the pay of the German embassy throughout the war. The indignation of the Mexican right proves two things: first, they have every intention of striking if they can; and second, they are obsessed by the fear that Cárdenas will get into the fight and destroy their plans.

It is encouraging to see that the left is beginning to take the menace seriously. In 1944, when I revisited Mexico for the first time in many years, my friends seemed to think that I was seeing fascists everywhere; members of the Cabinet assured me that all the talk about sinarquist activities was "greatly exaggerated"—as if the prestige of the country were somehow at stake. Today these same men realize that they are not immune, for fascism is out to recoup its military defeats in Europe and Asia by systematic political action throughout the Americas.

The fascist blow at Mexico is aimed from outside the government; in Argentina it is directed from within. Reports from Buenos Aires indicate that Colonel Perón is in no gambling mood: he may use the recent lockout by employers as a pretext to cancel the elections and seize power outright. Otherwise he will control the elections. Last week he told a group of close friends: "I shall be President on February 24 even if the opposition uses atomic bombs." The Colonel was looking in the wrong direction; it is not the Argentine democrats but his Nazi scientist friends who have poured into the country to continue their atomic experiments.

Meanwhile the government has distributed blackjacks, machine-guns, and every other available weapon to Perón's descamisados, who at certain moments are more effective than the police or the army in breaking up popular demonstrations. Not a single technique has been omitted; the parallel with Nazism is exact. From time to time the government arrests some small Nazi to appease Washington, but the key agents are still at large, forming a sort of "kitchen cabinet" around Perón.

Argentina is bound to give the United States more headaches than most American columnists anticipated when they hailed the decision to invite that Axis satellite to San Francisco. Indeed, the problem of the Perón regime may cause another postponement of the Pan-American Conference scheduled to open in Rio in the spring. The position of the United States in Latin America has never been more precarious.

The achievements of Rafael Trujillo, Grand Benefactor and President-Dictator of the Dominican Republic, were briefly summarized on this page four weeks ago. Among other items in the record was the massacre in 1937 of 12,000 or more unarmed Haitian workers. A postscript to the story was contributed the other day by a friend just back from Trujillo City: Recently the Benefactor had a law passed changing the name of Dajabón, the place where the Haitians were butchered, to "Franklin D. Roosevelt." This graceful gesture was abandoned, my friend reported, after representations from the State Department.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

In the Doughface Tradition

LINCOLN THE PRESIDENT: SPRINGFIELD TO GETTYSBURG. By J. G. Randall. Dodd, Mead and Company. Two volumes. $7.50.

THE first two volumes of this new massive biography of Lincoln cover the period from Springfield broadly through Gettysburg, with extensive backward glimpses into the youth and young manhood. Dr. Randall is, of course, one of the most eminent American historians of the Civil War period. His work represents the application of a trained and meticulous scholarly intelligence to a career which, by its symbolic place in the national imagination, has become peculiarly enveloped in non-historical improvements ranging from folklore to forgery.

Randall's standards of "tested and competent evidence" are more exacting than those of any previous Lincoln biographer. The results—as in his critical account of the Anne Rutledge story or of Lincoln's alleged complicity in the firing on Sumter (the Pearl Harbor inquiry of the day)—are lucid and conclusive. So central, indeed, is the analysis of evidence to the virtues of the book that the tedious exercises of collating documents, weighing witnesses, and so on, from which most writers extract only the conclusions for their narrative, form a substantial part of Randall's text.

The unrelenting caution in judgments on the details of Lincoln's life is unfortunately not extended to the larger political issues of the day. Randall adopts the "repressible conflict" view of the war which Avery Craven ably developed in "The Coming of the Civil War" (1942). According to this theory, there were no insoluble political or economic problems between the sections; the war was created by alarmists, propagandists, agitators, warmongers on both sides—in Randall's words, by "vicious forces." War guilt is always a complicated question, but this theory supposes basically that the "vicious forces" could have acted otherwise; that there was no legitimate moral power in the slavery question which might cause men, North and South, to feel that essential values were at stake requiring vigorous defense. Randall's own expressions—describing the Kansas-Nebraska Act, for example, as "a law intended to subordinate the slavery question and hold it in proper proportion"—as well as his evident sympathy with Douglas and Bell, suggest that he conceives of slavery much as Molotov conceived of fascism—not perhaps with enthusiasm but as a matter of taste.

Most advocates of the notion that slavery was worth fighting about have been Northerners; and while revisionists are careful to name both sides in their general indictments their target is more usually the Northern enemy of slavery than the Southern defender. Randall, for example, is fond of a distinction between "moderate men" and "unctuous rebel-haters"—some form of the word "unctuous" is used to characterize anti-slavery men three times in the first twenty-five pages of Volume II. The phrase "Northern men of Southern sentiments," Randall observes, was "said opprobriously... as if it were a base thing for a Northern man to work with his Southern fellows." (Here is a formula ready made for some future historian to explain the similarly opprobrious phrase of the nineteen thirties—"appeaser.") "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is "pulp melodrama." His account of Preston Brooks's assault with a heavy cane upon the seated Sumner employs the phrase "Southern 'brutality'" in quotes only and justifies Brooks as "confronting Sumner with all the self-control he could muster." One wonders what might have happened if Brooks had really lost his temper.

A labored defense of McClellan occupies much of Volume II. Lincoln's concern with military strategy is treated as meddling interference, while McClellan's extraordinary Harrison Bar letter, with its ambitious political recommendations, becomes the normal and respectful act of a commanding general. Randall cites McClellan's post-war apology as if it were a reliable and objective document but rejects his revealing contemporary statements on the curious ground that, since they were in "confidential letters to his wife," they were "not to be taken too seriously." This is coupled with a savage arraignment of the Radicals. "A more unlovely knot of politicians would be hard to find," is Randall's opinion—hardly a measured judgment, especially from a man who can find so many excuses for Preston Brooks, and quite as absurd in its way as the canonization of Thaddeus Stevens fashionable in fellow-traveler circles. Indeed, like so many other of Randall's impulsive generalizations, it is not borne out by the factual evidence which, as a conscientious historian, he cannot refrain from citing.

Randall's portrait of Lincoln is shaped by the insistent desire to show that Lincoln had more in common with the Southern moderate than with the Northern radical. The combination of exact sifting of detail and ill-considered assertion on general issues creates problems of organization which the author does not altogether solve. His style tends to be dogged and repetitious, and the structural framework of the book is constantly reexplained by the author instead of being allowed to explain itself. While more reliable on points of detail than Sandburg's volumes, this biography is less successful on the large problems requiring historical or literary understanding.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

American Solution

THE BALANCE OF TOMORROW: POWER AND FOREIGN POLICY IN THE UNITED STATES. By Robert Strausz-Hupé. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

THIS brilliant book is an analysis of the determining factors of foreign policy. It is one of the few solid books ever written on this badly neglected subject, and it should be read by all who have the safety of the United States and the peace of the world at heart.

The author begins with the statement that "initiative in world affairs has been thrust upon the United States." Foreign policy is defined as the "art of the possible" and the art of anticipating change. The raw material of foreign policy is power, which consists of material, organizational, and ideological elements. The over-all trends of international power relations may be predicted within a reasonable margin of error; at least in so far as they are predicated upon material strength. The author surveys present and probable future relationships between population, raw materials, industrial production and organization on the one hand, and power and military strength on the other. He gives special attention to the power potentials of such rising countries as Russia, India, and China, and to the remaining power potentials of the defeated Axis nations. The new aspects introduced by atomic fission are discussed in the preface, and they do not, generally speaking, invalidate the importance of traditional elements of power, as they may in the end "merely change them technologically by increasing their destructive efficiency." The author's conclusion is "that the American pile of chips is no longer big enough to play the power game against any and all players."

Mr. Strausz-Hupé's analysis is distinguished from other writings on the subject by his insistence upon the great importance of organizational, intellectual, and volitional elements of national strength. The material elements are subject to decline or increase according to the manner in which they are used. Technology is no less important than manpower or raw materials. A population policy can reinforce or cushion the "natural" trends of population movements. Foreign trade and investments may enhance the power of other countries which are either friendly or inimical to the United States.

The author discusses with relentless logic various implications of impending power-political changes. He enumerates factors which might endanger the maintenance of peace. He views with misgivings the chief provision of the San Francisco Charter that "great-power initiative is to be accepted as the cornerstone of world peace" and points out that medium and small powers can and should play an important role in an international system designed to keep the peace.

Mr. Strausz-Hupé states the alternatives: "The perpetuation of the present system with its characteristic conflicts; the ascendancy of one power to world domination; or the creation of a world federation. The first has been explored uninterruptedly for fifty generations. The second is the world picture projected by Geopolitik. . . . The third is federation by consent. It is the American solution." Yet a policy "which nurtures federalism of regional as well as global dimensions and which is consistent with American interests and traditional concepts" is not protected by copyright. "It can be, and has been, borrowed by other powers professing various ideologies." Mr. Strausz-Hupé believes that America can make its greatest contribution to peace and progress if it negotiates from strength and not from weakness. He quotes Franklin D. Roosevelt: "We cannot deny that power is a factor in world politics any more than we can deny its existence as a factor in national politics. But in a democratic world as in a democratic nation power must be linked with responsibility and obliged to defend and justify itself within the framework of the general good."

STEFAN T. POSSONY

from
ALL QUIET to
ARCH OF TRIUMPH
he has caught the heartbeat of our time

ERICH MARIA REMARQUE

Sixteen years ago Erich Maria Remarque wrote All Quiet on the Western Front. The story of one man, it spoke for a generation. Today in Arch of Triumph Remarque has again told the story of one man, and again, at another war's end, he has become the inspired spokesman of an era. Into this magnificent novel of an outcast surgeon, the woman he loved and the enemy he killed, he has packed the passion, torment and triumph of our age.

ARCH OF TRIUMPH

The February Book-of-the-Month
Club Selection

Over 630,000 copies in print

At all bookstores • $3.00

APPLETON-CENTURY

The Age of Giolitti

ITALIAN DEMOCRACY IN THE MAKING: THE POLITICAL SCENE IN THE GIOLITTIAN ERA, 1900-1914. By A. William Salomone. Introductory Essay by G. Salvemini. University of Pennsylvania Press. $2.50.

FOR the time being those few Italians who, having enough to eat, can indulge in political thinking, are mildly interested in an autopsy on Fascism. They seem, however, rather more eager to get at the core of the pre-Fascist era, particularly of the decades between 1900 and the First World War, the so-called "age of Giolitti." They know that the foundations of Fascism were laid then, but they wonder, nevertheless, whether some part of the Giolittian heritage cannot be accepted by free Italians today.

What sort of statesman was Giolitti? The political opinions of the two Italians best known in this country, Salvemini and Croce, are at odds on this point as on others. Croce has always been a staunch apologist for Giolitti, whose moderation and shrewdness he finally, under Mussolini, idealized in a vein suggesting a political "Life with Father." Salvemini, at the beginning of this century, was Giolitti's arch-foe, and pilloried him in a famous book, "The Minister of the Underworld." As if this were not enough to confuse the layman, Croce on a recent occasion graciously admitted that Giolitti, after all, was far from perfect; while Salvemini, in a provocative introduction to Mr. Salomone's book, confesses with a sigh that had he to start all over again he would soften the form if not the substance of his enmity to the Old Man. What are we to think?

Let us first look at the record. Giolitti, a skilful politician, was Italian Premier almost uninterruptedly from 1903 to 1914—that is, in the decisive period of growth of the new Italian state. Mr. Salomone's work gives an excellent account of the accomplishments of the Giolittian era—the introduction of universal suffrage and of quite wide freedom of the press, the impressive decrease in illiteracy, the stupendous rise of Italian socialism and unionism, the political debut of Catholics and Nationalists, the growth of industry in the north and the tripling of the export trade, the conversion of the national debt, and finally the conquest of Libya. Salvemini, looking back in his introduction to the first fifty years of Italian unity, is right in maintaining that "no country in Europe had made such strides in so short a time." What was wrong then?

The usual case against Giolitti is based on his administrative "methods." He always managed to get into his Parliament a "solid block" from the south by employing corruption, intimidation, and occasional violence. Those Britishers and Americans, however, who smugly complain that Italy "never had a real democracy" are aptly reminded by Salvemini that corruption of the Giolittian brand, and maybe worse, blossoms even in the Anglo-Saxon countries. The real case against Giolitti is probably quite different. No matter what "progress" Italy achieved under him, it is a fact that his long and clever rule froze and perpetuated the original sin of the Italian state. The unification of the country in the 1860's, far from being a democratic revolution, was a "royal conquest": the Peninsula was cleverly annexed to the Piedmontese state. The south in particular was treated, as the mild Don Sturzo once put it, simply "as a colony." The very title of Salvemini's pugnacious weekly, L'Unità (1911-1920), meant just this—that an Italy split in two had still to be put together through a democratic revolution. Giolitti's rule strengthened and crowned this state of things. A major, and ominous, success of his policy was to tie the workers of the north to the industrialists and the dynasty in the common exploitation of the backward south—a dubious alliance ironically called "the Socialist monarchy." Protectionism, nationalism, and first a minor then a major war were consequences to be expected.

Mr. Salomone's work is more than praiseworthy for the objectivity with which it gives the reader all the facts, but it somehow refrains from extracting any clear historical meaning. Such perplexity is excusable. In "normal" times a Giolittian—or shall we say, Trumanian?—policy seems to most people permissible, and to some desirable. But apart from the question whether there is such a thing as normality in history, our twentieth century certainly has not been normal—it has been and is literally a "radical" century. Thus clever moderates nowadays are at first mere postponers of problems, and ultimately—but time catches up quickly in our age—gravediggers. At which point a comparatively harmless Giolitti is succeeded by "a frantic Giolitti"—which, in Italian journalism, is the classic definition of Benito Mussolini.

PAOLO MILANO

By HENRY MILLER, author of "Tropic of Cancer," etc.

"THE AMAZING AND INVARIABLE BEAUFOUR DELANEY," an essay on our greatest American Negro painter, with 8 illustrations $1.00

"OBSCENITY AND THE LAW OF REFLECTION," a stirring plea for true purity of the soul $1.00

ALICAT BOOK SHOP

287 South Broadway

Yonkers 5, New York

FOR THE LATEST EYE-WITNESS REPORT ON THE SOVIET UNION

SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY

invites you to a reception in honor of its editor

JESSICA SMITH

On the occasion of her return from the

SOVIET UNION

to be held

SUNDAY, JANUARY 27th, 3:00 P.M.

HOTEL ASTOR, 44th STREET and BROADWAY

Miss Smith will report on her extended travels in the Soviet Union
Mr. Corlies Lamont will preside

Refreshments will be served Admission $2.00

Soviet Russia Today

114 East 32nd Street • New York 16, N. Y.

Murray Hill 3-3855

Flash! 1. Genuine book values: IF MEN WERE ANGELS, by Jerome Frank, original $3.75 Harper ed. (380 pp.)—send only $1.35; THE GRAVE DIGGERS OF FRANCE, by Pertinax, orig. $6.00 ed.—send only $1.50. Order now while available.

2. Bonus Book: With each purchase of the two-volume COMPLETE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE, by Foner, for $6.00 (1236 pp.) we will send free of charge your choice of M. J. Adler's How to Think About War and Peace, or L. R. Sues' Shark's Fins and Miller. The 2nd volume of Foner's work is $3.50.

3. Book Service: We mail everywhere the books reviewed and advertised here and elsewhere. Downtown Book Bazaar, 212 Broadway, New York 7.

FICTION IN REVIEW

ANAIS NIN has never been published commercially. She has printed her work herself and distributed it through private channels. Nevertheless, her reputation has spread until she has become, in a small way, a sort of legendary literary figure. Rebecca West is reported to have called her a genius; Henry Miller has made the prophecy that the diary of some sixty-five volumes on which she is engaged will rank with the great monuments of self-revelation, with Augustine, Rousseau, Petronius; one hears of a new literary method, based on psychoanalysis. It was therefore with considerable curiosity that I took up my first sample of Miss Nin's writing, a volume called "This Hunger . . ." which came out recently and which can be obtained from the Gotham Book Mart in New York City.

The volume contains three stories, connected by the fact that each of them is about a gravely maladjusted woman hungering for affection. The first, Hejda, is about an Oriental girl who emerges from her veils to become something of an exhibitionist. The second, Stella, is about a movie star unable to love because of her excessive need to be reassured that she is loved. The third and most complicated, bearing the names of two women, Lillian and Djuna, is mostly about Lillian, a woman of conspicuous energy, confused—so far as I can make out—between her need to protect and her need to be protected.

I refer to the three pieces as stories. Actually, however, while Miss Nin's narratives borrow the manner of fiction, they are much more like case histories than like short fiction of any usual sort. Miss Nin's characters have many of the conventional appurtenances of fictional life: they have been born, presumably they live and will die; they look a certain way; they have friends, money, sexual relationships, even children. But they exist for their author only as the sum of their clinically significant emotional responses; we are made aware only of such activities, physical surroundings, and encounters with other people as Miss Nin conceives to be relevant to their psychic health. Every writer establishes a role for herself in her books, and Miss Nin's role is psychoanalyst to her group of typical women. Her sole concern with her characters—I had almost said patients—is with the formation and expression of their symptoms, and what goes on in the rest of their lives she rigorously ignores. For instance, we are told of Hejda that, having been born in the Orient, her face was veiled through her early years, but we are not told the name of the country of her birth; or, in connection with Lillian, Miss Nin suddenly mentions a husband and children, but because neither husband nor children influence Lillian's emotional development Miss Nin doesn't consider it pertinent to tell us anything about them.

So much abstraction of her characters from the context of their real lives, together with so much specific detail when it suits Miss Nin's purposes to be specific, gives a certain surrealist quality to her stories. But her approach is not properly described as surrealist, since, in the instance of each of her women, Miss Nin is primarily concerned to lay out a case. The method of "This Hunger . . ." is, as I say, the method of clinical history, but with two important differences—one, that Miss Nin relies, for effect, not only on

WHY

has the Catholic Church

Supported

Mussolini
Hitler
Tiso
Franco
Salazar
Peron

?

Why did the Catholic church support Roosevelt's domestic policies and oppose his foreign policy?

Why is the Catholic church anti-Capitalist as well as anti-Communist?

What kind of a political, social and economic system is the Catholic church attempting to bring about?

How has this affected your life and how may it affect the lives of your children?

READ:

"The True Nature of Roman Catholicism"

by L. H. Lehmann

An important series of articles describing aspects of the Catholic church never before revealed.

Beginning in the January issue of
THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE

Edited by former Catholic priests

Subscription only $1.00 a year (10 issues)

Sample copy 15¢

A limited number of January copies are being reserved for readers of The Nation. To make sure of getting your January copy include Dept. number in the address as follows, or return this ad.

Agora Publishing Company, Dept. F-151

229 WEST 49th STREET

NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

+ MIDWINTER + BOOK NUMBER

Reviews of the more important books of the season will be featured by THE NATION in its regular Midwinter Book Number to appear on February 23.

Publishers wishing to utilize the special advantages offered by this feature issue for advertising of better books are urged to make space reservations as soon as possible. Deadlines: for space reservations, February 8; for final OK's or complete plates, February 14. Publisher's advertising rate, $200 per page. For information, phone BARclay 7-1066 or write

ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT

THE Nation

20 VESEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

THE Nation

- ☐ with Harpers Magazine . . $6.50
You Save $2.50
- ☐ with Consumers Union . . $7.00
You Save $1.50
- ☐ with Harpers Magazine
and Consumers Union . $9.00
You Save $3.50
- ☐ with Free World . . . $7.50
You Save $1.50
- ☐ with Saturday Review . . $8.50
You Save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself

- ☐ One Year $3 ☐ Two Years $6 ☐ Three Years $11
☐ Servicemen's Rate $3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

SPECIAL NOTICE TO READERS

To Subscribers:

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please cooperate by renewing your current subscription as receipt of the first issue of magazine.

To Newsstand Readers:

The only certain way of getting The Nation regularly is to enter a subscription. By doing so you will not only insure prompt receipt of your copy, but you will make a considerable saving in money over the newsstand price.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, at the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ STATE _____

her clinical observations and conclusions but also on her literary skill; and two, that whereas it is the intention of the writer of a case history only to add to our clinical knowledge, and if any wider comment is present it is present only by happy accident, it is the first intention of Miss Nin to make a full-sized literary comment upon life.

And yet I find "This Hunger . . ." both less good reading and less enlightening about life in general than many similar pure case studies. Nor is this because I object—though I do—to the dominant poetical tone of Miss Nin's prose. Nor is it because I reject—though I do—the latent implication of Miss Nin's stories: that women are due in more than men are, and largely by men, and that since the sufferings of men occasion suffering in women, they could be the objects of our bitter resentment, whereas the sufferings of women must rouse our deepest sympathies. To refuse, I think "This Hunger . . ." inferior to a good psychoanalytical case record is that its psychoanalysis is not sincere but pretension.

Now obviously, and all present-day tendencies to the contrary notwithstanding, I do not think that writers of fiction need a technical knowledge of the psychiatric professions. Quite the contrary, a comparison of the novelist's insights into human motivation before Freud and after Freud seems to me to indicate a persistent deterioration in psychological understanding as the post-Freudian novelists have tried to incorporate the findings of psychiatry in their art. But inasmuch as Miss Nin's whole aesthetic is based on the value of her clinical insights, one naturally looks for them to be at least as sound and revealing as those that make up the common stock in trade of the analytical practitioner. If Miss Nin were writing traditional short stories she could employ conventional fictional means—dramatic conflict, evolution of circumstances, etc.—to heighten our experience of life. Having discarded these means, Miss Nin must depend instead on the poetry of literalness and science. Her science must therefore be of a kind to set up good poetic vibrations; it must be good science.

What I mean by saying that good science makes for good poetic overtones can perhaps be illustrated by a sentence recently quoted to me from "The Development of Modern Physics," by Einstein and Infeld. Expounding the rudiments of relativity, these authors write, "A straight line is the simplest and most trivial example of a curve." Is a simple scientific statement. But in the perfection of its simplicity and its scientific accuracy it is also a very beautiful poetic statement. Similarly, a good case history, by tying with simple scientific truth, can be a poetic statement about life. But Miss Nin's case histories, by substituting conscious poeticizing of their material for the poetry inherent in the literal material itself and by making their observations on a very low, or drawing-room, level of the psychoanalytical science, are neither good clinical practice nor good poetic suggestion.

I have space to give only a single example of Miss Nin's insufficiency—her treatment of Hejda's youthful sadism. On the first page of her first case Miss Nin reports: "Hejda was then a little primitive, whose greatest pleasure consisted in inserting her finger inside pregnant hens and breaking the eggs, or filling frogs with gasoline and setting a child match to them." This rather sensational activity is never traced to its psychic causes, nor is it connected with later manifestations of Hejda's character. A certain carnivorousness is remarked upon; also, another cruelty she perpetrates upon a school friend. Then, on the last page of Hejda's history, when she has reached the stage where "when everything fails she resorts to lifting her dress and arranging her garters," Miss Nin adds: "She is back... to the native original Hejda.... The frogs leap away in fear of her again."

Such analytical inadequacy may be the result, of course, only of ignorance. But I am tempted to borrow Miss Nin's own deterministic bias, and diagnose this kind and degree of ignorance as wilful; after all, more information was available to Miss Nin if she desired it. But it would seem that Miss Nin has looked to psychoanalysis only for what would serve the sexual chauvinism and self-pity of the modern female writer of sensibility.

Every so often Miss Nin's writing descends from the delicate feminine heights and indulges in straight common-sense observation of human beings as well as in undecorated prose. Then it indicates that, somewhere in her, Miss Nin has the powers that have always produced good science, good fiction, good poetry. But such deviations are only occasional; so I keep wondering why a book like "This Hunger..." could not receive commercial publication in these days when nothing sells like the sick psyche.

DIANA TRILLING

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents

MAURICE EVANS
In His New Production of Shakespeare's
HAMLET
 Columbus Circle Thea. B'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
 Evs. 8:30. Mts. Thu. & Sat. 2:30

UP IN CENTRAL PARK
 Book by HERBERT LYRICS by DOROTHY FIELDS MUSIC by SIGMUND ROMBERG
 & DOROTHY FIELDS
 B'way at 53rd St. Mats.: Sat. & Sun. Evs. Incl. Sun. 2:30 & 8:30
BROADWAY THEATRE

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times
 Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
 in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
 from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
 with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX
 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4636.
 Evs. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp.

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present
DEEP ARE THE ROOTS
 A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES COW
 Staged by ELIA KAZAN
FULTON THEATRE
 Forty-sixth Street West of Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
 Evenings: 8:40, $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Matinees
 Wednesday and Saturday, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

"A TREMENDOUS EVENING IN THE THEATRE!"—Morehouse, Sun
 KERN AND HAMMERSTEIN'S
SHOW BOAT
 Music by JEROME KERN • Book and Lyrics by OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd
 Based on the novel by EDNA FERBER • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
ZIEGFELD THEA. 54th Street and Sixth Avenue. CI. 5-5290
 Evs. 8:30 Sharp. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

DANCE

Limited Engagement! NOW through FEBRUARY 2
 S. HUROC presents
MARTHA GRAHAM
 and DANCE COMPANY with Orchestra, Louis Horst conducting 43th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:40; $1.20 to $3.60.
PLYMOUTH, Matinees January 27, February 2; $1.20 to $3.00.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
 ALHAMBRA
 COLISEUM
 81st St.
 86th St.
 58th St.
 near Lex.
 HAMILTON
 125th St.
 REGENT
 RIVERSIDE
 23rd St.
Bronx
 CASTLE HILL
 CHESTER
 FORDHAM
 FRANKLIN
 MARBLE
 HILL
 PELHAM
 ROYAL
Westchester
 MT. VERNON
 NEW ROCH.
 WH. PLAINS
 YONKERS

RKO NOW
 "EXCITING FILM" —N. Y. Times "A CORKER" —N. Y. Sun
 RENE CLAIR'S
'AND THEN THERE WERE NONE'
 AGATHA CHRISTIE'S Masterpiece of Suspense
 Starring Barry Walter Louis
 FITZGERALD • HUSTON • HAYWARD
 —And—
 WALT DISNEY'S
 THE WONDERFUL ADVENTURES OF PINOCCHIO

Brooklyn
 BUSHWICK
 DYKER
 GREENPOINT
 KENMORE
 MADISON
 ORPHEUM
 PROSPECT
 REPUBLIC
 TILYU
 Coney Island
Queens
 Keith's
 FLUSHING
 Keith's
 RICH. HILL
 STRAND
 Far Rockaway
Manhattan
 COLONIAL

"An Absorbing Screen Drama"—N. Y. Post
 MERLE CLAUDE CHARLES
 OBERON • RAINS • KORVIN
'THIS LOVE OF OURS'
 Based on LUIGI PIRANDELLO'S Play
 —AND—
'PURSUIT TO ALGIERS' BASIL BATHBONE
 NIGEL BRUCE

B. G. DeSylva presents
 BETTY HUTTON in
"THE STORK CLUB"
 —with—
 BARRY FITZGERALD
 DON DE FORE
 Robert Benchley • Bill Goodwin
 Iris Adrian • Mikhail Rasumny
 Mary Young
 and introducing ANDY RUSSELL
 Midnight Feature Nightly
 NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE
 In Person
 WOODY
 HERMAN
 and his ORCHESTRA
 —featuring—
 FRANCES
 WAYNE
 —plus—
 DOROTHY
 KELLER
 Extra added attraction
 BUDDY
 LESTER
 Don Baker at the Organ

JOIN the March of Dimes

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language. MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ♦ ♦ 29 LANGUAGES Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

BOBBY CLARK is an irresistible force. If, therefore, he comes into contact with an immovable classic, something pretty spectacular is bound to happen. It did on the occasion when he collided with Congreve's "Love for Love" and again when "The Rivals" got in his way. But both of these events took place before the phenomena associated with atom-splitting were understood by that part of the general public which includes drama critics, and the events were not fully comprehended. Now, however, I am in a position to report what happens nightly at the Booth Theater when Mr. Clark performs that experiment in disintegration which the limitations of the critical vocabulary compel us to describe as his "interpretation" of "The Would-Be Gentleman."

When the irresistible force meets the immovable object, neither, of course, can give way. What happens is that the immovable object is transformed into energy. "The Rivals" or "The Would-Be Gentleman" is not simply reduced to rubble as would be the case if an old-fashioned explosive like TNT were used. Instead, it simply ceases to exist. It is transformed into force, and Mr. Clark becomes a sub-atomic particle completely on the loose. It often appears, for instance, that he has been in two or even three places at once, but this, we now know, is not true. It is merely that, like an electron engaged in demonstrating Heisenberg's principle, he gets from one position to another without ever having occupied any of the intervening space and therefore only seems to have been in several places at the same time.

It is no doubt very fortunate that there are not too many performers like Mr. Clark. The classics should be preserved, and every time he appears in one of them I say to myself, "Well, there goes another portion of our cultural heritage." What happened to the Parthenon when the Turkish powder magazine exploded is nothing by comparison with what happens to a dramatic masterpiece when Bobby establishes a chain reaction. But it does make an exciting spectacle, and if Nero could fiddle while Rome burned, if New York could dance while Hiroshima was being transformed into atomic radiation, then I am not going to consult my conscience before giving way to mirth at the spectacle of Mr. Clark when his way with Congreve or Sheridan or Molière.

For the benefit of any readers who desire a less impressionistic account of what is going on at the Booth I had, perhaps, best state briefly that the greatest low-comedy actor whom it has ever been my privilege to see is having the time of his life presenting himself, faintly disguised, as the leading character in a frenetic vaudeville recognizedly based upon one of Molière's best-known satiric farces. It has been publicly stated that Mr. Clark went through all Molière's works and lifted from several of them bits which he thought he could use in the present production. I notice, for instance, that he sings for the benefit of his music teacher the "Stop, Thief!" song which comes from "Les précieuses ridicules." But there are also many additions, some of them very funny, to "The Would-Be Gentleman" which are not, I am sure, from the pen of Molière or even, for that matter, from the pen of anyone else, since, to take an example, one of the most hilarious of them is a positively symphonic sneeze which could hardly be written in French or any other language, though I suppose it might be scored by means of some not yet invented system of musical notation.

Mr. Clark does piously retain the two most famous quotations, the one about speaking prose without knowing it, and the one involving the question, "Pourquoi toujours les bergères?" But neither of these would in itself probably attract very many members of the general public into the Booth, and what they will go to see is a magnificent clown using the skeleton outline provided by Molière for purposes of his own.

As it stands, "The Would-Be Gentleman" does not even remain a satire on the new rich, and that is perhaps just as well. Though much of the play as originally written is still valid it is so entangled with seventeenth-century conceptions of what is and what is not proper for a man not born a gentleman that it would be rather difficult to disentangle the part which remains good sense from that part which any modern audience is bound to see as mere snobbery. As a matter of fact, Mr. Clark becomes, not the butt of the piece, but its hero—a fabulous embodiment of self-willed energy whom any audience is bound to love and envy as it does Charlie Chaplin or any other great clown. And for the benefit of the tender-

CHARLES A. BEARD

calls it:—

"An informing document for all civilized persons now interested, of necessity, in what is called the Jewish problem."

Here are 576 pages of thoughtful, scintillating writing by the elite of the World of Letters.

THE JEWISH FRONTIER ANTHOLOGY

The selected gems of a great journal of thought. Articles by:—

Norman Angell

Dorothy Thompson

Leon Blum Carl J. Friedrich

David Ben Gurion

Justice Robert H. Jackson

Sholom Asch Hayim Greenberg

Jacob J. Weinstein

and many others

"The very highest standard in modern journalism... must appeal to Gentile no less than Jew."

Lescia Mumford

"A bright mirror reflecting the life of a decade." Marvin Lowenthal

On sale only by the publisher

Cloth bound, 576 pages

Price—$2.50, postage prepaid

Send check or money order to

Jewish Frontier, Dept. 1 N

45 E. 17 St., New York 3, N. Y.

minded it might as well be pointed out that Molière himself was originally only a writer of skits for players, even though he managed as he developed to load his farcical divertissements with more and more meaning. Mr. Clark, for his own purposes, merely reduces one of the more elaborate pieces to something a good deal like the sort of thing its author wrote at the beginning of his career, and thus Molière is back where he started from. When you have at your disposal a performer like Mr. Clark it is not at all a bad place to be.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

WHAT characterizes painting in the line Manet-Mondrian—as well as poetry from Verlaine through Mallarmé to Apollinaire and Wallace Stevens—is its pastoral mood. It is this that is mistaken for the "classical." And it is away from the pastoral, the preoccupation with nature at rest, human beings at leisure, and art in movement, that so much painting has turned of late. And what it has turned toward is not the "romantic" but the baroque, which Wölfflin (who died in Zurich the other day) has defined as the "open" style par excellence—open to variety and violence of emotion as well as to large and complicated formal rhythms.

Now the pastoral, in modern painting and elsewhere, depends on two interdependent attitudes: the first, a dissatisfaction with the moods prevailing in society's centers of activity; the second, a conviction of the stability of society in one's own time. One flees to the shepherds from the controversies that agitate the market-place. But this flight—which takes place in art—depends inevitably upon a feeling that the society left behind will continue to protect and provide for the fugitive, no matter what differences he may have with it.

This feeling of pastoral security has become increasingly difficult to maintain in the last two decades. It is the dissipation of this sense of security that makes the survival of modern avant-garde art problematical. The first impulse is to rush back to the market-place and intervene in or report its activities. Here political art, some forms of expressionism, popular surrealism, and neo-romanticism complement one another in their anxiety to relate art to the current crisis of our civilization.

What is wrong, however, with surrealism and neo-romanticism in particular is that they stay falsely pastoral in resorting to styles of the past in order to make emotions about the present plain and explicit. Genuinely pastoral art never turns to the past; it simply rejects one present in favor of another—and without escapism. Even today one must look still to avant-garde pastoral art to see revealed the most permanent features of our society's crisis.

It is only lately that the reaction against the pastoral as compelled by current events has begun to manifest itself in art of any real seriousness. The exponents of this seriousness are still few. Significantly enough, among the first of them are such one-time cubists or near-cubists as Picasso and Lipschitz. In common with surrealism and neo-romanticism, their reaction takes the form of the baroque, but it is a more profoundly disquieted baroque, less archaeological, more at odds with itself, and crowded with disparate elements. Thus Picasso's baroque is among other things a kind of neo-cubism, and Lipschitz's an attempted fusion of Bernini's chiaroscuro with expressionism.

Somewhat pertinent in this connection is the exhibition of the recent work of Hyman Bloom at Durlacher Brothers (through February 2). Bloom is attracted to Jewish motifs in his art: Jews with Torah rolls and women who are brides—no motif is more distinctively Jewish than the second of these, the bride being one of the chief personifications of the Sabbath and a favorite likeness in Hebrew poetry. Bloom's expressionism derives from Soutine, Rouault, and perhaps Chagall, but he asserts enough of himself to make his version of the baroque more than a sum of influences. Heavy in paint texture, its color "crushed jewels," with much scarlet, pearl-white, and ochre, his art reveals, however, no fundamentally new capacities of the expressionist style. In four of the thirteen canvases at the present show it attains, nevertheless, a curious quietness that, because it belongs exclusively to art, argues more strongly than the mere violence of feeling exhibited elsewhere. In "The Bride," "Corpse of Elderly Female," "Archaeological Treasure," and "A Pot"—the last two semi-abstract—the concern with agitated, expressive texture and the compulsion to overpaint cede to the necessities of unity, which, significantly, is achieved by design rather than by disposition of color or texture.

I do not think that Bloom's expressionism offers great possibilities for the future; its postulates have by this time become slightly academic. Even in his best pictures they make it too easy for him to reconcile himself, on the score of expressiveness, to superficial execution and gratuitous flourishes. None the less, Bloom's approach is essentially uncompromising, and the chances are that his honesty will force him to transcend his present style with its limitations and fight through to a clarity that will still permit him to say effectively what he as an individual must say and what he as a Jew in the face of recent events may want to say.

With the sculptor David Smith—a selection of whose total œuvre as well as all his most recent work is being shown at the Willard and Buchholz Galleries (through January 26)—the new incidence of the baroque with all that is problematical about it becomes fully evident. The work in steel, iron, and aluminum that Smith executed with machine tools between 1936 and 1940 was already strong and original enough—indebted though it was to Brancusi and Giacometti—to make him perhaps the best young sculptor in the country. Like all modern sculpture of any vital-

Consistently
THE BEST AUTHORS:
ARTICLES: COMMENTS
in the

NEGRO DIGEST

Round Table
Is Uncle Tom's Cabin Anti-Negro?

Paul De Kruif's
NEGRO AMERICA VERSUS SYPHILIS
Page 3

25c

Beginner Boy
Don't Blame Segregation
He Heard America Singing

PLACE YOUR SUBSCRIPTION NOW!

Please send 5 monthly issues of NEGRO DIGEST (Reg. $1.25) Special for $1.00. Money Order or Check Enclosed.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

Date.....

MAIL TODAY

To NEGRO DIGEST
5619 S. State St., Chicago 21, Ill.

ity since Maillol, it stemmed from painting rather than from any tradition of carving or modeling—Negro art excepted—and its virtue was the line, whether in wire-like form or as the contour of a two-dimensional surface. It closed itself around empty space and eschewed the chiaroscuro of monolithic sculpture. The point of departure was usually anecdotal but the result highly abstract. A unity of style was achieved that did not inhibit extravagance but inevitably controlled it—generally toward “geometricity,” precision, clarity. In its mixture of force and elegance Smith’s sculpture in this period profited from the best that cubism and post-cubism have had to offer to the plastic arts of our immediate period.

A war job narrowed Smith’s output to a trickle between 1940 and 1944. In 1944-45, however, he turned out no fewer than thirty new pieces of sculpture in a new, baroque vein answering to the mood inspired by late history. Gone is the relatively simple trajectory of line, interrupted now by almost ornamental multiplications of detail. Gone is the “geometricity”; under the new conception surfaces are broken, modeled, squeezed and incised within the smallest compass. Everything coils back upon itself or else explodes into rococo elaboration. No real unity of style governs here; the general impression is more gothic than baroque, but the elements are disparate. While none of this recent work attains the level of his best earlier sculpture, Smith’s gift remains inalienable enough still to produce three or four pieces that will give pause to any newcomer to his art. I hesitate to criticize him. The pastoral tranquillity of his former style is apparently no longer possible, and this phase of extravagance, disorder, and agitation is something he seems compelled to work his way through. It will take him much time to solve the new problems he has proposed to himself, but he at least proposes new problems and refuses to settle for the guarantees of the past.

Robert Motherwell, whose second one-man show is running at the Kootz Gallery (through January 19), is an instance in which the baroque spirit of the times and something very unbaroque clash. In concept Motherwell is on the side of violence, disquiet—but his temperament seems to lack the force and sensuousness to carry the concept, while the means he takes from Picasso and Mondrian are treated too hygienically. The richness and complication of color are applied too deliberately and do not accord with the arbitrary, constricted design. Effects are left floating in air, unattached and unnourished by blood vessels, without organic relation to an artist who had to paint thus and not otherwise. The best of Motherwell’s work is in his large collages, but even here one feels that the constituent elements could be rearranged considerably without altering the final invariably anemic effect.

Motherwell’s gifts—and he has shown that he possesses them—deserve better exploitation than this. At times in the past he has produced much better work. Yet he has always suffered from a radical unevenness; there have been too many sudden changes of direction, motivated perhaps by an inability to decide what he wants and by conflicting influences. But the essential is to decide what one is, not what one wants.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

ON VICTOR’S January list is one of the outstanding releases of recent years: Haydn’s Symphony No. 98, performed by Toscanini with the N. B. C. Symphony (Set 1025; $4.50). Concertgoers know from their program-notes that Haydn wrote twelve symphonies for his two visits to London; but they would not know it from what they hear performed at the concerts; and one of the great London symphonies they don’t hear is No. 98, which Toscanini himself performed only once in New York before the performance last spring that is now issued on records.

I use the word “great” to describe what the work communicates—what, for example, is communicated by the gravely, spaciouly meditative slow movement. I use it also to describe Haydn’s use of the resources of his medium in this communication—in particular the breathtaking surprises in melodic and harmonic progression, in rhythm, in orchestration, that express the exuberant liveliness of his mind in the other movements. I mean things like the changes in sonority and direction when the Adagio opening statement of the first movement is repeated, the change in the first Allegro theme when it is repeated by the oboe, the further change when it returns after the outburst of the entire orchestra; the change in harmonic direction and extension of phrase when, near the end of the exposition (and of side 1), the quiet statement of the oboe is repeated; the mischievous play with dynamic contrast, rhythm and accent, and instrumental combinations in the minuet movement; and in the finale the loud conclusion of the exposition in F major (near the end of side 6), the silence, then the quiet explosion of a harmonic and stylistic bombshell by the solo violin’s casual and graceful entrance in A flat, another loud conclusion on D, and (beginning of side 7) another quiet explosion of a bombshell by the solo violin’s entrance in E flat. These are only a few of the details that occur in constant succession, and that require one to listen with closest attention from phrase to phrase.

All this liveliness is something Toscanini delights in and realizes wonderfully in his sharply contoured performance. And wonderful too are the moulding of phrase, the continuity of impetus, the organic coherence in his statement of the eloquent and profound slow movement. The records reproduce well the sound of the performance in Studio 8H; but on side 6 the sound is less resonant and agreeable than elsewhere, and the performance itself is different: this first part of the finale is slightly faster and much less relaxed than the second part on side 7. Possibly side 6 was remade at a later time than the rest. My review copy had only a couple of loud scrapes on one side; but when I went to buy an additional copy it was impossible to find one that did not have invisible but noisy blemishes on two or three sides, when it did not have a badly scratched side or two; and when I got home with an M set I found that its first record was DM (whereupon the dealer told me of the “Nutcracker” Suite records in some sets.)

On the eighth side is an exquisite performance of the Scherzo from Mendelssohn’s Octet.

Additional Victor albums offer Leonard Bernstein’s “Jeremiah” Symphony, performed by Bernstein with the St. Louis Symphony and Nan Merriman, mezzo-soprano (Set 1026; $3.50); Milhaud’s “Protée” Suite No. 2, performed by Monteux with the San Francisco Symphony (Set 1027; $3.50); Debussy’s Sacred and Profane Dances for harp and strings, and Ravel’s Introduction and Allegro for harp, strings, flute and clarinet, performed by Marcel Grandjany with a chamber orchestra under Sylvan Levin (Set 1021; $3.50); and Rachmaninov’s symphonic poem “Isle of the Dead,” performed by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony (Set 1024; $3.50). I don’t find these works interesting as artistic communications; but I can report that they are excellently performed and recorded.

In one of its useless two-record showpiece "albums" Victor offers Liszt's enjoyable Mephisto Waltz, performed on the piano with brilliance and driving intensity by William Kapell (Set SP-11; $2.25). On the fourth side is Albéniz's "Evocación," which Kapell plays with supple grace, except for some mannered phrasing in the middle section that makes it difficult to follow melodic outlines and rhythm. Played with a Brush pickup the records produce a piano sound with insufficient bass for the treble; with an Astatic Tru-Tan pickup, which cuts down treble and emphasizes bass, the sound is well-balanced.

In another showpiece "album" is Brahms's dull Alto Rhapsody, sung by Marian Anderson with the San Francisco Symphony and Municipal Chorus under Monteux (Set SP-13; $2.25). Except for some metallic high tones from Anderson the performance is excellent and well recorded. And in still another (Set SP-10; $2.25) Grieg's pretty "Peer Gynt" Suite No. 1 is well performed by Goossens and with the Cincinnati Symphony and well recorded.

On a single (10-1178; $.75) are Purcell's "I Attempt From Love's Sickness to Fly" and Handel's Siciliana "Let Me Wander, Not Unseen," charming both, and beautifully sung by Blanche Thebom, mezzo-soprano, with good accompaniments by a string orchestra under Macklin Marrow. On another (11-8986; $1) is Strauss's engaging waltz "Roses From the South," played with gusto by Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, and recorded with reverberant brilliance. And on still another (11-8868; $1) are six chansons by Hindemith to words of Rilke, which I like no more than Hindemith's other works, and which are excellently sung by the Victor Chorale under Robert Shaw and well recorded.

CONTRIBUTORS

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR., is the author of "The Age of Jackson."

STEFAN T. POSSONY, an Austrian writer now living in this country, is the author of several books on economic and military problems.

PAOLO MILANO, on leave from Queens College, is writing an "Introduction to American Classical Literature" for publication in Italy.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Satire or Confusion?

Dear Sirs: Saul K. Padover's A Plan for Germany in the December 22 issue says in one column: "We should not repeat the mistake of the democratic Weimar Republic in leaving the reactionary, militaristic, monarchist teachers unmolested"; and in the next: "After all, the way to teach democracy is to practice it."

I don't know whether this is meant to be a satire on the work of the Psychological Warfare Division, but I submit it as just about the best synthesis of the confusion attendant upon the central problem of German reconstruction—ends and means. TED HEFLEY
Philadelphia, December 30

The Laski Bomb

Dear Sirs: When the chairman of the British Labor Party flies to this country to solve the threat of the atomic bomb for us, it seems an event. Hence we listened closely while in the presence of two thousand men and women Professor Laski excommunicated the business man and free enterprise, tore down all governments as the source of war, and by mighty revolution set up his new world state and a new civilization. It was a painful anti-climax to the splendid Nation Associates meeting.

Or did we fail to comprehend?

Hence we studied the Professor's printed text. "Plan or perish," he commands. "Sovereignty must go." The system of "the business man . . . has outlived its usefulness." "A society dominated by business men could not be trusted." It is based on "human peonage." "The business men have split our society in two." They "impose the law of the jungle upon us all." The United States is on "the direct road to serfdom." And for climax he declaims that "Nazism in all its forms is the culmination of a society built upon the anarchy of free enterprise."

This is news to us. We had not known that the Kaiser and his Junkers, Mussolini, Hirohito, Tojo, and Hitler were business men or supporters of free enterprise; we had thought those aggressors shackled enterprise to their war machines; nor were we aware that the nations of free enterprise had plunged us into two world wars.

Mr. Laski acknowledges his "immense obligation" to the United States. He pays "homage to the great part the United States has played in the organization of military victory." We had supposed he therefore knew that in a system of fairly free enterprise American teamwork among government, labor, capital, business, farmers, scientists, and most of the rest of us—especially our civilian sons, who in a flash became victorious armies—built and put into action the arsenal of democracy which won the war.

What of the Laski plan? We had supposed that Dumbarton Oaks, the San Francisco conference, the creation of the UNO, its ratification by the nations, including that same United States Senate which once repudiated Woodrow Wilson, showed that the world was at least groping, through patient methods of conciliation, for a plan for peace. Not at all. The UNO is grudgingly tolerated by the Professor, but only "on conditions." It is only a stop-gap. "This is not the time to rest content with a temporary plaster. This is the time to begin a new civilization."

What is this new civilization? "We must have boundaries . . . between liberalism and socialism. . . . We must have power in the hands of men . . . who find abundance is the instrument of freedom." "We are before a revolution more mighty even than the vast change which came . . . with Copernicus."

Here are fighting words; here is the flaming Laski blueprint. If we comprehend, it demands nothing less than that through world revolution the United States must dissolve its Constitution and Bill of Rights, Britain must liquidate its empire, even little Switzerland must be swallowed up by a world state which destroys all business men and free enterprise and is governed by high priests of "abundance."

As for us despised liberals, we look on business men as we do on professors. There are good ones and bad ones. "A man's a man for a' that." We do not believe in blanket indictments. We hold with robber barons and monopolists no more than with dictators or demagogues.

We need not be told that this is a grim world. Neither did we need our guest's lecture about the Negroes. Though we fought a civil war to free them, we are painfully aware this was not enough. We were shocked that in

Crossword Puzzle No. 145

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 His shell was the British Army's "secret weapon" during the Peninsular War
- 2 Jefferson called him "one of the three greatest men"
- 3 He cannot complain of being outnumbered in the fight
- 4 Delays upset the toilers
- 5 Let's make the clue "Needle case" this time
- 6 Final warning
- 7 It levels all ranks, as the Captain reminded the Admiral
- 8 Tool with claws
- 9 Where Saul consulted the witch
- 10 Wooden leg, or its user (hyphen, 3-3)
- 11 We see nothing in this flavor
- 12 The eagle is ours
- 13 Expel
- 14 An outstandingly bright feature of the circus clown (two words, 3 & 4)
- 15 It cannot grind with the water that has passed
- 16 Where knights of old often ran into one another
- 17 "Life is a jest, and all things show it; I thought so ----, but now I know it"
- 18 Run true (anag.)
- 19 "Go in, sir" (anag.)
- 20 Elgin's unmarried
- 21 Double entendre (two words, 4 & 4)
- 22 Take by compulsion
- 23 When a lad leaves Ireland, he may leave this
- 24 Why fret over oil when we have this plant?
- 25 If the birds have flown, it may be because these have been removed (hyphen, 4-4)
- 26 Embrace
- 27 Sweetmeat made by Clara and me
- 28 Appoints an ass to head it
- 29 Unfortunate, this
- 30 "Oh would I were dead now, Or up in my bed now, To ---- my head now, And have a good cry!"
- 31 ---- the warp, and ditto the woof
- 32 Word in America for the end of the line
- 33 Scene of two Union defeats in 1861-2 (two words, 4 & 3)
- 34 Hero of Voltaire's novel so called
- 35 Passed out around five
- 36 Lazy
- 37 Old Faithful, perhaps
- 38 Bird of prey, and the reverse
- 39 He should have a good memory

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 144

ACROSS:—1 LOHENGRIIN; 2 CALER; 3 RE-TRAD; 10 NUMERAL; 11 OCH; 12 LEM-NOS; 13 LIES; 15 RETICENT; 16 KOPECK; 18 TRUISM; 20 CHEATERS; 23 ESPY; 24 SPITTED; 25 BED; 28 REALGAR; 29 IRON ORE; 30 WHANG; 31 STRADDLES.

DOWN:—1 LARGO; 2 HATCHET; 3 NEEDLE CASE; 4 RUDIMENT; 5 NONCOM; 6 CAMP; 7 LARINE; 8 BILL SIKES; 14 HOT AND COLD; 15 ROPEN ROW; 17 WHIT-TIER; 19 UPSALA; 21 EMBROID; 22 SPARKS; 26 DYERS; 27 AGOG.

the universal range of Mr. Laski's vision he was silent about his party's and his government's conduct regarding Palestine, India, and Indonesia.

Looking back on a century and a half, we fancied that though we, the people of the United States, stumble and sometimes backslide, though we are racked by grave domestic and foreign conflicts, inequalities, and injustices, we had, through our halting constitutional system of checks and balances, created something worth cherishing and extending toward a more equal and abundant life for all men. UNRRA seems better to us than the undertaker. We of the United States who are incurable builders do not believe that to shatter is to construct. The Laski bomb seems to us a dud.

JAMES N. ROSENBERG

New York, December 28

Credit to Dr. Duggan

IN HIS ARTICLE Homage to Alvin Johnson, in The Nation of January 5, Max Lerner credited the retiring head of the New School with initiating the committee which during the war found places in American universities for exiled European scholars. Dr. Johnson has protested. He writes that "the credit for this magnificent job belongs wholly to Dr. Stephen P. Duggan, the dean of American international education." The fact is, both men deserve honor for their part in that excellent enterprise. Dr. Duggan was chairman of the Emergency Committee in Aid of Displaced Foreign Scholars, but Dr. Johnson was closely and actively associated with its work.—EDITORS THE NATION.

RESORTS

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK

MAMANASCO Lake Lodge

A Resort Estate of unmatched beauty. Ideal for winter rest and recreation. Write or phone Ridgefield, Conn. 820.

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Wind-up Mountain Trails, Ski Tow, 700-foot Ski Slope. Delicious food. Easy transportation.

For reservations or further information write or call HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y. Telephone: Tannersville 299

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 2, 1946

NUMBER 5, PART 1

The Shape of Things

SUCCESS IN COPING WITH THE FINANCIAL and economic crisis will be the touchstone of the new French government headed by Felix Gouin, Socialist leader. That crisis is reflected in the growing scarcity of necessities on the legal market, in the continued rise in prices, in the difficulty of arranging for urgently required imports. But the most sinister danger sign is the rapid expansion in currency circulation. Production in France is recovering, but it cannot keep pace with the output of money from the printing presses. Both to stimulate production and to check the issue of currency, drastic measures are required. One of the largest contributors to the current budgetary deficit is the army, two million strong, and any genuine economy program must begin by trimming the military establishment. Partial demobilization, together with a sharp reduction in the number of civil officials, will in addition release more man-power for productive purposes. Action on these lines is included in the plans of the new government, which has also announced its intention to freeze salaries of public employees, intensify curbs on the black market, and introduce some form of monetary control. On paper this appears to be a fairly adequate program, but its translation into fact will be unpopular in the short run, and the short run includes the spring elections. Action, therefore, depends on the willingness of the three major parties represented in the Cabinet to abandon all competitive angling for votes and to function as a real national government.

✱

IN ONE OF THE MOST CYNICAL STATEMENTS of the century, Hitler's heir, Francisco Franco, has flatly denied any kinship with the Axis. Evidence of his Nazi ties, accumulated over the past nine years and now fully confirmed by the Ciano diaries and the testimony of the war criminals at Nürnberg, was wiped out in an hour of amiable conversation between the Generalissimo and A. P. correspondent DeWitt Mackenzie. The interview, in which Franco announced the early establishment of a democratic regime headed by the "Christian general" himself, was granted just a few hours after a Spanish military court had condemned ten more anti-fascists to death, including Cristino García Granda, commander of the Spanish forces in the French maquis. The former Axis puppet, devoid of decency though he is, would never have dared tell an American correspondent such a story had he not felt encouraged by fresh indications that the United States and Britain intend to continue their policy of appeasing Spain. On the heels of an announcement by the three major French parties that they will ask Felix Gouin's new government to sever relations with Franco, comes the news that the United States has sold five "non-military" planes and a mass of other mechanical equipment to Spain. And according to Walter Winchell, the Spanish fascist regime will also receive American army machine-guns (also "non-military"?)] from Italy. Not to be outdone by Washington, the British government has just concluded a deal with Franco for the purchase of British-made trucks; fifty are already on the high seas with hundreds more scheduled to follow. No wonder Franco laughs off the San Francisco resolution and the Potsdam decision outlawing Spain from the United Nations.

✱

CHINA'S POLITICAL CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL has apparently made considerable progress in bridging the political chasm between the Kuomintang and the Communists. The problem of nationalizing the Kuomintang and Communist military forces seems well on the way to settlement as a result of the agreement to create a joint command and General Marshall's acceptance of an advisory position on the reorganization committee. All parties have accepted a plan to expand the State Council as the supreme organ of government until the new constitution is adopted. And the obstacle raised by Chiang Kai-shek's insistence on convening the pre-war National Assembly on May 6 seems to have been neatly sidetracked by an understanding that the Assembly will have no power except to rubber-stamp the constitution drawn up through inter-party negotiation. But the problem of allotting posts in the new government and the question of Chiang Kai-shek's emergency powers remain unsettled. The Kuomintang insists that it should hold a majority of key posts in the new government until an election can be held. Representatives of the Communists

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	113
Break in the Clouds	115
Bias in the Colleges	116
USA and UNO by Freda Kirchwey	116

ARTICLES

Where There Is No Vision by I. P. Stone	118
This Is Why They Strike by Edward Jones	119
The Sun Shines in Pittsburgh by King Gordon	121
Korea's Heritage by Andrew Roth	122
Arabia Britannica by Rufus Baxter	125
In the Wind	127
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	128
The People's Front by Del Vayo	129

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	130
Briefer Comment	132
Verse Chronicle by Randall Jarrell	134
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	137
Music by B. H. Haggin	138

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 139

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 146 140 by Jack Barrett

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart
Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey
Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside, Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879, Washington Editorial Bureau: 313 Kelllogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $5; Two Years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

and the Democratic League insist on a genuine coalition government in which some key posts will be held by non-partisan leaders. Although this struggle for political supremacy is basic, the disputes are of a nature that should be easily compromised, if the will to compromise exists.

✱

IN THE BEGINNING GOD MADE THE HEAVENS and the earth in six days, arranging the land and oceans, and setting the stars and the sun and moon in their places. That was either 5,950 or 1,000,000,000 years ago; the precise figure is in dispute. The important point is that from then until the other day the earth was relatively incommunicado. Now the Army Signal Corps has changed things, bouncing a radar pulse to the moon and back in two and a half seconds flat. This is only a beginning, as the history of invention has painfully taught us. The first gasoline-driven motor became the contemporary traffic jam, while the bomb that fell on Hiroshima was once an innocent, if unintelligible, equation. We know, we moderns, that the echo from the moon's icy and hitherto inviolate surface opens possibilities of trouble the Signal Corps dares not even hint at. Any day now we may set up two-way connections with Mars. When that happens The Nation nominates Orson Welles to carry on the first interplanetary chat; he knows those boys already.

✱

THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN Activities has voted to bring contempt proceedings against Helen R. Bryan, executive secretary of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, because of her refusal to produce the records of that organization. We applaud Miss Bryan's courage in defying her would-be inquisitors. Her action should provide an opportunity for a full review by the House of the activities of this un-American Congressional committee which has evidently set itself the difficult task of making Martin Dies seem, by comparison, tolerant and objective. Another of its recent victims is the National Committee to Combat Anti-Semitism, which has been circulating a petition in support of the Dickstein resolution condemning racial discrimination. Ernie Adamson, counsel of the un-American committee, who apparently has never heard of the constitutional right of petition, declares that the National Committee's solicitation of money is "for the purpose of controlling the thoughts of American citizens." Mr. Adamson's own uncontrolled thinking is illustrated by his professed inability to discover any "Nazi Party" in the United States. Perhaps he has been looking through the telephone books for organizations calling themselves "Nazi" or "National Socialists." Is he too innocent to know that a group by any other name can smell as bad or are his olfactory membranes insensitive to fascism?

IN THEIR FILIBUSTER AGAINST THE BILL TO create a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission, a handful of wilful Southerners are causing serious people throughout the world to question the adequacy of our legislative system. In no other country would it be possible for a tiny minority in a legislative chamber to stop all action for an indefinite period. It is bad enough that there should be delay in setting up an agency empowered to stop racial discrimination in the field of employment. But the filibusterers, who in theory are members of the majority party, are prepared to obstruct indefinitely, not only this vital part of the President's reconversion plans, but his entire program as outlined in his message to Congress. They are able to do this only because a considerably larger group in the Senate, including many supposed supporters of the FEPC, is unwilling to discard the hoary Senate tradition of unlimited debate. The fact that the present deadlock could last for more than a week despite an exceptionally heavy legislative calendar points to the need for a fundamental revamping of the Senate rules. But the immediate need, if still more time is not to be wasted, is for a public uprising to demand prompt adoption of the cloture rule.

this will raise its hourly average to no more than $1.31½. In fact, the upshot of the collective bargaining between the U. A. W. and the Ford and Chrysler corporations appears to have set a pattern which it will be hard for other big mass-production concerns now involved in industrial disputes to ignore. This pattern, moreover, has been confirmed by an agreement for a 17½-cent hourly wage increase reached without a strike by the Radio Corporation of America and the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, C. I. O. If General Motors, General Electric, Westinghouse, and International Harvester now remain recalcitrant, they will afford new circumstantial evidence to support the charge that they are primarily interested in union-busting.

Labor peace in the engineering industries, however, will not mean much in the way of production until the steel strike is ended. Already Ford has been forced to lay off 15,000 workers for lack of steel, and if the dispute continues for long, innumerable factories will be forced to close and unemployment will increase enormously. The public, perhaps, is not yet fully aware of what a national steel stoppage means, for its effect is not immediately perceptible to everyone, as is that of a meat strike. The President, however, is fully informed about the gravity of the situation, and it is regrettable that he should not have followed through more strongly after his proposal for settling the dispute was rejected by United States Steel on behalf of the industry as a whole. His rather peevish remark at his last press conference that the trouble was due to the desire of both sides to show their power suggested an unrealistic desire to stay above the battle.

However, the President did reiterate his belief that the steel companies ought to make a return to work possible by agreeing to his recommended wage increase of 18½ cents an hour. The Ford and Chrysler settlements make any retreat from this figure, which would leave the relative levels of steel and automobile wages undisturbed, quite impracticable for the President and the steel union alike. As we go to press, there are indications of a new approach by the steel masters to the White House. With Mr. Truman adamant on wages, their objective will be to secure a price increase beyond the $4 a ton tentatively offered before the strike broke out. Basic steel prices have been frozen at approximately pre-war levels, and although cancellation of rebates and higher quotations for specialties have increased the average return per ton, some rise in prices may be justified. A $4 increase, however, should more than cover additions to the wage bill of the industry and leave a good margin for profits, provided output is maintained fairly near capacity. That this is possible for a long period can hardly be questioned since the demand for steel, as for goods of all kinds, will be enormous once business accepts the necessity for giving labor a share of post-war prosperity and gets on with the job.

Break in the Clouds

A WEEK which began with the industrial picture cast into heavy shadow by the shut-down of the steel industry has ended with a perceptible lifting of the clouds. Workers are returning to the packing plants with a promise that the government, which has taken over their management, will implement any wage increase approved by the fact-finding panel. The threat of a railroad strike appears to have been dissipated by an agreement between the companies and eighteen unions to arbitrate wage demands. Most important of all, wage negotiations have been peacefully concluded between the United Automobile Workers and the Ford and Chrysler companies providing for increases of 18 and 18½ cents an hour respectively. As a result Ford's average hourly rate will be raised to $1.37 and Chrysler's to $1.30½.

In view of these settlements General Motors is left without a shred of excuse for refusing to pay the 19½-cent increase recommended by the fact-finders. It took the position that its ability to pay as the largest and most prosperous automobile manufacturer was irrelevant. Wages, its spokesmen declared, must be determined by the competitive "going rate" for the industry. It cannot complain, therefore, that 19½ cents is out of line, since

Bias in the Colleges

IN THE United States, as in Nazi Germany or pre-war Poland, opportunity for a higher education is sharply conditioned by a student's religious, racial, or national background. This shocking although not entirely unexpected revelation is documented for the first time in a preliminary research report prepared in New York for the Mayor's Committee on Unity, headed by Charles Evans Hughes, Jr. Quotas restricting the number of Negro, Jewish, and Italian students in our "better" medical and law schools have long been a matter of common knowledge. The report for the Mayor's Committee reveals that these discriminatory practices have not only spread to the liberal-arts colleges in and near New York but have become so general that members of minority groups find great difficulty in getting an adequate education. Although the colleges publicly deny it, many deans and prominent faculty members privately admit that discrimination exists, applying to Catholics, as well as Jews, Negroes, and Italians. A usual device is to restrict the number of students who can be admitted from New York City. The private colleges in the New York area, which are among the worst offenders, defend the practice as necessary to "preserve their "national" character; more remote institutions say that they cannot turn over their educational facilities to New Yorkers at the expense of local residents. As the result of this stratagem, the percentage of Jewish students in the colleges is said to have fallen about 50 per cent in the decade preceding World War II.

Members of the various minority groups living in New York may, it is true, still obtain undergraduate training in the colleges run by the city. But they find themselves virtually shut out of professional training, especially in medicine. From 1942 to 1944, with a severe shortage of physicians throughout the country, only six graduates of City College were admitted to two of the city's leading medical schools. The proportion of Jewish students in Grade A medical schools covered by the report dropped from 12.2 per cent in 1933 to 6.3 per cent in 1938. Only a few Negroes are accepted by the first-rank medical schools, while Catholics and young men and women of Italian ancestry must surmount formidable obstacles if they are to get an adequate medical education.

Any fair-minded person will admit that these academic restrictions are not entirely the result of racial or religious bigotry in the institutions. Although we look to the colleges for leadership in the fight to expose racial and religious hokum, we must recognize that, as part of the American community, they are subject to all kinds of pressures. The position of any one institution is difficult. If it adopts liberal entrance requirements, it faces the danger of being swamped by members of the minority groups, thus sacrificing its "standing" in the community as well as the real benefits of a broadly representative student body. Clearly we are confronted with a situation that must be met by joint action. Some organization such as the Association of American Colleges should work out a plan for outlawing racial and religious bias to which all institutions would subscribe. This process would be hastened if the federal government and each of the states made certain that no direct federal or state aid, or indirect aid such as tax exemption, was given any educational institution practicing discrimination in its admission system.

New York presents a special problem. While it stands near the top in per capita expenditure for public education, it ranks lowest, according to the report to the Mayor's Committee, in its support of higher education. It is one of the few states in the country which does not maintain a state university. As an immediate and effective means of combating bias, and providing an opportunity for higher education for all its citizens, the New York legislature should pass the bill recently introduced to create a state university with adequate facilities for professional training.

USA and UNO

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

SLOWLY the unwelcome suspicion is spreading in London that the United States, not Russia, is the great enigma. Russia may be tough, aggressive, provocative. It is usually intelligible. Its policy is predicated on a clear view of its interests, which demand firm adherence to big-power control within the world organization and a generous extension of its own area of dominance outside. Where these lines of policy threaten to collide, Russia gives right of way to its private security arrangements. The reasons for this are not obscure. One of the most important is the enigmatic role of the United States.

Britain, too, is comparatively easy to understand. Chastened by its obvious relative weakness in the Big Three, it is prepared to trust more to the operations of the UNO, and in the UNO to expand the powers of the lesser nations. Britain aspires to leadership of the Western nations while at the same time clinging to its position in Eastern Europe and the Mediterranean with the desperate tenacity of a man who knows his hands are slipping.

Only the United States pursues a course difficult to interpret in terms of clear objectives. Bursting with material power, strong beyond all possibility of challenge, this country's policy remains obscure and unpredictable, and hence immensely disturbing. Our leaders talk with apparent conviction about our determination "this time" to carry our full share of responsibility for building a solid world order. Only a few months ago President Truman announced that we intended "to have a positive policy toward every country and on every question." What is this positive policy? Let us look at the questions on which our position has become more or less clearly defined.

First and most important, the atomic bomb. The bomb has hung over the UNO's deliberations as palpably and visibly as if it were suspended from the chandelier. But all eyes are turned away from it. Nobody talks about it. An atomic-power commission is set up by nearly unanimous agreement, but this act is accomplished in a semi-automatic, off-hand manner, as if it were a matter of little importance. Perhaps it is. For the commission can only recommend to the Security Council, and the United States can veto its recommendations, meanwhile keeping the bomb in its sole possession—meanwhile manufacturing bombs reported to be a thousand times stronger than those which dropped on Japan. What can the nations do but set up a commission on the terms proposed and pass quickly to other questions?

The policy of the United States on the control of atomic power is aggressively, provocatively nationalistic.

Second, the trusteeship question. On the colonial aspects of this question our expressed policy is liberal in the extreme. We don't like colonialism; during the war we encouraged the aspirations of dependent peoples in the Pacific and helped Britain push France out of the Levant. And even today our sympathies are rather with the Javanese than with their rulers. We can be counted upon to get trusteeships for colonial areas under way as soon as possible. But in the Pacific where our new line of defense is being laid out we take a very simple view of our international obligations. The island bases won from Japan are strategic areas, necessary to "our" security; if we consent to include them within the trusteeship system, we shall maintain "exclusive" control over them. If we decide to hold them outright, the trusteeship agreement provides for that, too. They are ours either way. American blood won them; America will keep them. Until this moment it has apparently never occurred to us that our position might be challenged—as we have challenged the unilateral security moves of our Allies.

The policy of the United States on the trusteeship question is nakedly, almost innocently, nationalistic.

On other issues it is less clear, although often we follow a similar pattern, warmly indorsing democratic or collective procedures for other nations, deftly dodging them when our own interests are involved. Take, for instance, the Western Hemisphere. We have constructed a regional system on our side of the world, in which the United States is dominant. We intend, according to President Truman, to settle hemisphere problems "without interference from outside." This is a policy. But it runs directly counter to the whole concept of the United Nations Organization. If Britain asserted the right of Western Europe to settle its problems without American interference, we would say that the Charter had been violated and the hope of collective security lost; and we would be right. We strongly oppose the heavy hand of Russia in Eastern Europe, but Russia has never asserted exclusive rights there. And in this regional structure of ours we tolerate a regime wholly fascist, openly aggressive in its purposes.

What is our "positive policy toward every country and on every question?" At London the American delegation hoped to keep controversial issues out of the meeting, an obvious impossibility in a world simmering with political conflict. This week our delegates must deal with Iran's charge against Russia—an issue that involves a major struggle for power between the Soviet Union and Britain; they must take a position on Britain's role in Greece and Indonesia; on French objections to trusteeship for colonial areas to be "incorporated" into France. The question of Argentina's suspension from the UNO, raised by The Nation Associates in a memorandum which appears with this issue, may be formally put before the Assembly. France is expected to call for joint action to restore democratic institutions in Spain. On all these questions the United States must act. How shall we act? Mr. Byrnes has come home (to prepare for the peace conference in May!) leaving the American delegation in the hands of Mr. Stettinius. Anyone who watched that well-intentioned nonentity at work in San Francisco, who heard him, for example, attempting to explain the admission of Argentina, will smile at the idea that he can deal effectively with the political problems crowding in for attention.

What the UNO needs above all else is strong, disinterested leadership, and no country is so well situated to provide it as the United States. Our overwhelming power as well as our relative physical detachment protect us from the pressures that today drive other nations to short-range, unilateral, defensive moves. We can afford to support broader measures of security. We are in a position to move consciously and energetically toward the goal defined so impressively by the President when the UNO meeting opened. "It is important," said Mr. Truman, "that the nations come together as states in the Assembly and in the Security Council and in the other specialized assemblies and councils that have been and will be arranged. But that is not enough. Our ultimate security requires more than a process of consultation and compromise. It requires that we begin now to develop the United Nations Organization as the representative of the world as one society."

If this statement received less attention than its content warranted, it is because both states and peoples have learned to discount the words of American leaders. It is high time we developed the maturity to make our strength more than a club and our promises more than rhetoric.

Where There Is No Vision

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 24

THE collector of banalities will find rich pickings in the President's message on the state of the union. "The plain fact is," Mr. Truman said at one point, with the air of a man about to make a disclosure, "that civilization was saved in 1945 by the United Nations." His draftsmen have a way of painfully and laboriously thinking through to a truism. "The way to get good nutrition for the whole nation," the message offers, "is to provide employment opportunities and purchasing power for all groups that will enable them to buy full diets at market prices." There are passages which recall Calvin Coolidge: "On the domestic scene, as well as on the international scene, we must lay a new and better foundation for cooperation." At times the White House seemed to feel that a plethora of adjectives might make up for the continued absence of any concrete plan, as on housing. "A realistic and practical attack on the emergency will require aggressive action by local governments, with federal aid, to exploit all opportunities," Mr. Truman averred, "and to give the veterans as far as possible first chance at vacancies." The sentence shows a gift for anti-climax. The housing program itself, if it can be called a program, prepares one whole-heartedly to accept the message's forecast: "It will be years before we catch up with the demand for housing."

It would be literary foppishness to dwell on phrases of this kind if the fault lay in the writing, though effective expression is no small part of leadership. But the fault lies deeper. One has the feeling in reading this unnecessarily lengthy and criminally tedious message that Mr. Truman and the little band of mediocrities who have become his advisers are trying to follow the New Deal program in a kind of fog. The men who wrote the message—Mr. Truman, like Mr. Roosevelt, necessarily relies on collaborators in major tasks of this kind—often do not seem to know what they are trying to say or what they are trying to do. An example is the passage developing that old chestnut about achieving in peace the same "full utilization of our physical and human resources" we are supposed to have reached—and did approximate—during the war. "To accomplish this," the message hastens to add, "it is not intended that the federal government should do things that can be done as well for the nation by private enterprise, or by state and local governments. On the contrary, the war has demonstrated how effectively we can organize our productive system and develop the potential abilities of our people by aiding the efforts of private enterprise." The first sentence of the quotation begs the question; the second is a non sequitur; the point—if any—is lost in the final phrase. Industry was not mobilized for war merely by "aiding the efforts of private enterprise" but by directing those efforts and subordinating them to an over-all program. The men who wrote that passage were afraid to see the point.

This fear of coming to the point, either in thought or action, is characteristic of the Truman Administration. It stands up dutifully to be counted among the supporters of the post-war program outlined by President Roosevelt. It faithfully repeats the New Deal formulas. But it gives little indication of really understanding them or of readiness to fight for them. William H. Davis must have found it sourly amusing to read the passage in which the President told Congress, "If we manage our economy properly, the future will see us on a level of production half again as high as we have ever accomplished in peace time. Business can in the future pay higher wages and sell for lower prices. . . ." Mr. Truman summarily dismissed Davis as Director of Economic Stabilization last September for making substantially the same statement. The present White House crowd talks the New Deal language, but as though it were a foreign tongue imperfectly understood. Thus Mr. Truman as Senator and President has often dwelt—as he did again in this latest message—on the need for a higher level of wages after the war to make possible a higher level of economic activity. Some strikes are unavoidable in reaching this objective. Yet at his press conference today Mr. Truman described the steel strike as if it were merely a struggle for power between labor and management, in which the public's sole interest was to curb both sides. One feels, perhaps unjustly, that Mr. Truman sometimes fails fully to grasp the implications of his own stated policies.

This failure seems to be more than intellectual. One often wonders whether Mr. Truman is in full sympathy with some of the measures that have his formal support. He has come out for the FEPC again and again, but the manner has been that of a candidate supplying a necessary indorsement. He has never really explained the basic issues. He had a chance at press conference today when he was asked whether, from his experience as a Senator, he cared to comment on the filibuster against the FEPC. Mr. Truman said that as a Senator he had always been against filibusters and for cloture, but that this was a question the Senate would have to decide without outside interference. Since he has asked the Senate for a permanent FEPC, it seems rather late to take a hands-off attitude toward the filibuster. He might have ducked the cloture issue but supported the FEPC forces by telling the press and the country how important the fight for the FEPC is. Or doesn't the President think so? His sudden apparent loss of interest at the press conference seemed to cut the ground from under his Senate majority leader. Barkley's outspoken statement this afternoon in what appears to be a lost battle took great courage. No one would deny that the President has also been courageous on this issue, but he does not follow through.

A growing inconsistency between word and deed is apparent in all the Administration does. Mr. Truman's latest message calls for "major steps . . . to maintain enforcement of anti-trust laws," but Tom Clark, the big Texas glad-hander he picked as Attorney General, has about as much interest in the Sherman act as I have in canon law. The Anti-Trust Division, once one of the most ably manned agencies in Washington, has been losing some of its best men. It will lose more on the heels of today's announcement by Clark that the FBI will handle anti-trust investigations in the future and the Anti-Trust Division will do "the courthouse work." If there are any Communists violating the anti-trust laws, J. Edgar Hoover will get them. Mr. Truman's anti-monopoly strictures also make odd reading in the light of two other appointments. J. Stuart Symington, who was doing a good job as Surplus Property Administrator, has been named Assistant Secretary of War for Air to succeed Robert A. Lovett. (The latter, a New York banker, deserves the highest commendation for his able and devoted work during the war in that post.) Surplus Property will now be dominated completely by the RFC, and George E. Allen has been made head of that agency. Allen's New York financial connections with Victor Emanuel, the Schröder bank protégé, ought to be fully examined in the Senate before he is confirmed. The other appointment that calls for scrutiny is that of Edwin W. Pauley, the California oil man and Standard Oil political ally who has been named Under Secretary of the Navy. The navy has a lot to say about oil; the RFC controls war plants that are crucial in the fight against monopoly. How to judge Mr. Truman's position? By the words of the message? Or by the appointments?

Mr. Truman's difficulties are enormous, but they are increased by the mediocrities he prefers to have about him and by his own lack of decision. He must go down the New Deal line to win the Congressional elections, but he must overcome the opposition of the Southern Democrats to put a New Deal program through Congress. He must bring the strike wave to an end with major wage concessions for workers but without letting inflationary forces get out of hand; this means a minimum of price concessions. Steel is the key to the labor situation; here he has been well-meaning but inept, and lacking in that last ounce of courage which would make United States Steel back down. Housing offers his greatest immediate opportunity for dramatic leadership; here he has shown neither nerve nor imagination. His recent radio appeal to the country against Congress failed; there is no one in the White House crowd who can dramatize an issue. The President's verbose and flaccid message is as confusing as the White House crowd is confused. The country needs to be electrified, not bored.

This Is Why They Strike

• BY EDWARD JONES

The pseudonym of an economist who has made a special study of steel wages

A YEAR ago, in Braddock, Pennsylvania, where the Carnegie-Illinois Steel Corporation has its Edgar Thomson Works, the average steel worker earned $50.85 for working 47.5 hours a week.

After taxes were taken out, he had $45.92 left. He lived in a dingy, soot-covered house, often near the railroad tracks or next to the mill, paying $32.50 a month for rent, heat, and utilities.

His wife spent 45 per cent of the family income on food. One might think from this that Braddock steel workers indulged themselves by catering to a cultivated palate, but in point of fact the money they spent on food averaged a little more than 30 cents a meal per person.

If you don't know what that means, ask your wife.

At about the time that a survey by the United Steelworkers of America was gathering these statistics, the Heller Committee for Research in Social Economics of the University of California figured out the minimum budget on which a family of four could live in health and decency. It came to $59.15 before taxes. The steel worker's pay was $8.30 short of this minimum. But with an average of $10 a week more coming in from a second worker in the family or from a boarder or renter, he was able to make ends meet and to save a little. The typical steel worker's family had saved about $600 during the war—$300 in cash for a rainy day and $300 in war bonds.

Then came V-J Day, and the industry began to cut back sharply to a forty-hour schedule. Working forty hours, our average Braddock steel worker makes about $39.20. However, when forty hours are scheduled, something less than that is actually worked, because of such factors as illness and production changes. It is a fair estimate to say that our average worker receives slightly less than $39 a week.

In the past few months the average steel worker has not earned enough to cover his expenses. He has therefore been drawing on the money he has in the bank or cashing his bonds. He saw that it was only a matter of a few months before his savings would be exhausted and his family would face the plain necessity of a lowered standard of living.

Those who are worried about the effect of too much loose money floating around the country should understand that the Steelworkers' demand for an increase in pay, originally of $2 a day and now of 18.5 cents an hour, is calculated to prevent, even if only in part, a reduction in purchasing power and a threatened depression of living standards.

Their claims are presented to an industry that faces a very rosy future. It can be sure that for the next two years the demand for its products will outstrip the supply. The demand from the automobile industry alone is said to represent a two-year backlog. Run down the list of other big steel consumers—building construction, oil equipment, railroads, refrigerators, washing machines; they will all be hungry for steel for at least eighteen months, more probably for twenty-four.

The economics of steel are dominated by the fact that equipment is so large a part of unit cost. A high rate of production means, therefore, not only more tons sold but much lower cost per ton. In pre-war years prices were fixed to allow a company to break even when operating at from 50 to 60 per cent of capacity. In the years 1935 to 1939, when the industry operated at 59 per cent of capacity, it made a profit, after taxes, of $115,000,000. When production reaches 90 per cent or higher, profits become tremendous.

While war-time tax rates were as high as 85 per cent, taxes in 1946 will be no more than 38 per cent. Most of the companies in the industry, if they sought merely to preserve 1944-45 profits, after taxes, could more than pay the additional 18.5 cents an hour out of this decrease in taxes. The elimination of premium payments for overtime will save the industry 8 to 9 cents an hour. A further saving can be expected from the downgrading that will probably take place in a looser labor market. The union estimates that this will amount to 5 cents an hour.

Productivity will take a spurt in 1946. Normal technological development has been vigorously accelerated by war-time needs. Steel-ingot capacity has been increased by 18.8 per cent. While a part of this expansion will not be useful in peace time—for example, not all the increased capacity for electric-furnace alloy steel will be needed—most of it will be employed in replacing obsolete equipment. Progress that might normally have taken ten years has been accomplished in five.

Philip Murray

A battery of open-hearth furnaces was built by the Defense Plant Corporation for the Homestead Works of Carnegie-Illinois.

They produce 26 per cent more tonnage per man-hour. There is no reconversion problem here. These new furnaces will simply push out the old.

Many if not all of the companies face the future with the entire cost of this new equipment already written off. The government permitted war-emergency facilities to be written off in five years, or by the end of the war—which was declared, for this purpose, in September, 1945. This means that the companies charged an extremely high rate of amortization in high-tax years and now face a future of relatively low taxes with income that would normally be spent for amortization freed for profits.

Philip Murray has called attention to the action of Bethlehem Steel in writing off $44,000,000 in amortization in the third quarter of 1945. This converted a profit of $23,000,000 into a loss. Because it showed a loss, Bethlehem got a tax refund of $35,000,000.

It is reasonable to assume that with profits and taxes higher in war than in peace, the steel companies have been very liberal in earmarking income for depreciation and depletion. How liberal, it is difficult to say, but the leeway is undeniable. If future years prove leaner, it will be possible to reduce allocations to these accounts, leaving a larger share of current profits for stockholders. Furthermore, the carry-back refund provision of the 1945 revenue act functions to cushion the companies against any operating losses or failure to reach normal profits in 1946.

Factors which have restrained the productivity of the industry during the war will be rapidly removed. The forty-hour week and the return of veterans will mean a more efficient and vigorous working force. But wealth and assurance of continued demand also mean tremendous bargaining power—the ability to sit tight until terms can be won. When 700,000 steel workers "hit the bricks" at 12:01 a. m., Monday, January 21, they settled down for a contest of endurance.

"Quiet" and "grim" are the words to describe this strike. Reporters looking for the violent drama that the public expects in a steel strike have been disappointed. The glare of Bessemer and the yellow-orange smoke of steel have disappeared from the Pittsburgh sky. Picketing has boomed the sale of heavy underwear. Bars are empty; the money often spent there is needed for food.

The men don't know how long they will be out and they are not harboring any illusions. As one of them put it, "If we've got to, we'll stay out until Fairless freezes over."

The Sun Shines in Pittsburgh

BY KING GORDON

Pittsburgh, January 22

TODAY the sun shone brightly in Pittsburgh. People said they had not seen it shine so brightly for years. The quaint Gothic gingerbread on Andy Mellon's bank stood out sharply against a blue sky.

Because there was no smoke.

The thermometer registered five above.

You didn't hear much about the strike—not away from the United Steelworkers' headquarters in the Commonwealth Building. The cigar-stand man in the Pittsburgher argued that the company had a right to all the profits it could make, that it was none of the union's business what they made, and that Phil Murray had a pretty swell job and he was making the most of it. But the proverbial oracular taxicab driver said that most of Pittsburgh's sympathy was on the side of the men, and how did anyone think you could keep up purchasing power and have full employment unless wages were upped.

On the fifteenth floor of the Commonwealth Building things were busy but without confusion. Phil Murray had an unhurried word for the visiting fireman before he went into policy conference. PM was shooting pictures of the top chiefs of strategy. News reporters from out-of-town papers were passing the time of day. Telephone calls were coming in constantly from this district and that.

There was not much excitement. Because the excitement—the big excitement—was past. The strike was here. The strike that they had seen coming for months, even years, ever since it became apparent that United States Steel and the big boys of the Iron and Steel Institute were not going to talk terms.

You had a feeling that the steel workers were settling down to a long, hard siege. And that they were ready for it.

We drove out to Homestead along the Monongahela, stopping a couple of times to talk to pickets walking in a circle before the shut gates of plants or warming themselves over a coal fire in an empty oil drum. ("These boys know how to make fires that burn hot," one of the officers said to me. "It's their business.") But even with the fires it was cold work.

Gray-haired, scholarly Chuck Ford, chairman of District 15 at Homestead, told us the system they had worked out. "Everybody does a shift on the picket line. And it adds up to just four hours a week. We send out cards telling them what shift to report to. It's the fairest way. And it's good for morale." While we were talking to him a member phoned in to say that the date given him was not convenient; he didn't want to get out of his turn, but could he be given another hour? Chuck referred him to the local that was handling the pickets for the three gates of the big Carnegie-Illinois plant.

Chuck described the meeting up at Duquesne last Sunday night just before the strike began. "Duquesne has the reputation of being a tough town, and in the past there has been plenty of trouble. But on Sunday there was a meeting of seven hundred in the high school with about a thousand outside listening to loudspeakers. One of the burgesses spoke; one or two of the local business men. The reason for the strike was explained by the union officers. It was a quiet, serious meeting. No noise. No attacking the company. After the meeting those who had been assigned took up their posts on the picket line. One of the newsmen who were there said it was about the finest meeting he had ever attended. He said, "There was something very American about it."

In 1937 things were not so quiet. The company was out then to smash a young union which had not been put to any test. It used every device to intimidate strikers, entice in scabs, break morale. Armed guards swarmed round the gates. Inside the plant signs of great activity were kept up—tar paper was burnt in the furnaces, hammers crashed, yard engines shunted up and down.

But now it was different. The union was strong, disciplined, recognized. I saw no sign of guards. And it was merely a token picket line that walked slowly around at the gates.

We went across the street to the union hall. The president of the local was Frank Casper, a die-maker in the big plant. (Only one of the officers was a full-time union official: the rest were active steel workers.) He was dark-faced, young, serious, authoritative. Here the pickets were being appointed. Half a dozen girls lent from the clerical workers' union were busy at desks. Pickets came and went. Hot soup was there for those who had got chilled in the bitter cold.

One of the officers came up with a slip of paper with special picketing assignments for the following week, honorary assignments of two hours each.

Thursday—all women

Friday—all vets, World War I and II

Saturday—all Negro

Sunday—volunteer firemen

Monday—all merchants

Tuesday—political figures

Wednesday—all clergy

"Will they all come?" I asked.

"Well, they've all been invited. The town is pretty solidly behind us."

We drove back past the long black buildings, the high smokestacks with no smoke coming out, past the picket lines at the Amity Street gate. One of the steel workers with us said: "Take a look at that; we put it up in 1938. Big ceremony with all the officials of the town taking part."

It was a monument to the steel workers who had been killed in the Homestead strike of 1892.

Korea's Heritage

BY ANDREW ROTH

Author of "Dilemma in Japan"

WHEN Lieutenant General Hodge, commander of the American occupation forces in Korea, asserted that the Koreans were "the same breed of cat as the Japanese," he must have been thinking of the declassed Korean ronin, or gangsters, used by the Japanese army for much of its dirtiest work. He could not have been conscious of the valiant struggle which Koreans have waged for almost forty years against the grinding exploitation of their country by the Japanese.

Japanese rule in Korea makes Western imperialism seem paternal in comparison. Although Korea is far more richly endowed with mineral resources, water-power, and fertile rice land than Japan, the Korean living standard has been depressed to about one-fourth of the incredibly low Japanese standard. At the time of liberation ten Zaibatsu concerns controlled 85 per cent of all Korean industrial capital; only a few industrial crumbs remained in Korean hands. Four-fifths of the land was also owned by absentee Japanese landlords, and rent and taxes were so high that, by Japanese admission, hundreds of thousands of Korean farmers were reduced every spring to collecting bark and roots for food.

Political oppression kept pace with economic exploitation; no opportunity was missed to crush all forms of independent thought and action and to convert Koreans into obedient and docile servants of their conquerors. Important posts were monopolized by the Japanese, and all persons suspected of harboring "dangerous thoughts" were hunted down. All teaching was done in Japanese, and few pupils advanced beyond the primary grades; only one out of twenty-five Koreans reached high school. At Keijo University 63 per cent of the students were Japanese.

But despite their abject poverty and almost complete isolation from the rest of the world, Koreans have never ceased to resist. Japan became the "protector" of Korea in 1905 after defeating its Russian competitor and receiving the go-ahead signal from Britain and the United States. The first anti-Japanese insurrection broke out the next year; riots and demonstrations continued, and countless Koreans were imprisoned or killed.

In 1910 the Japanese marched in troops and stepped up their control to outright annexation. About five thousand men of the Korean army, led by its commander General Li Tung-hui, a graduate of the Tokyo Imperial Military Academy, retreated first to the hills and then across the Yalu River into Manchuria. There they based themselves upon the hundreds of thousands of Korean farmers who had emigrated to avoid Japanese control. Raiding parties crossed the border to Korea and ambushed Japanese troops in incessant guerrilla warfare. At one point the Japanese were so enraged by these attacks that they sent two divisions of troops into the Chientao region of Manchuria and slaughtered an entire settlement of four thousand Koreans.

For a few brief days in March, 1919, Korean resistance took on a different character. A group of Christian leaders, inspired by a naive faith in the fifth of President Wilson's Fourteen Points, issued an American-style Declaration of Independence. American-educated pacifists convinced the populace that President Wilson and the powers at Versailles would listen to their plea for freedom. Two million people paraded peacefully through the streets chanting "Mansei! Mansei!" (Korean equivalent of Banzai).

The Japanese replied to these peaceful demonstrations with medieval violence. Some six thousand Koreans were killed, tens of thousands flogged, and scores of thousands arrested. At least one Christian leader was crucified; in one village a church was burned, and the people were shot as they ran out. As a result, resistance was driven underground, and the nationalists were forced to move their base of activity abroad.

SPLIT IN THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT

In the fall of 1919 three thousand Korean exiles gathered at Shanghai from all over the world. They elected a parliament and established a Provisional Government with Rhee Syng-man as President General, Li Tung-hui as Premier, and Lyuh Woon-heung as Foreign Minister. (Rhee and Lyuh are now the leaders of the chief contending factions.) This government in exile operated its own press and ran a military school, smuggling the literature and the cadets back into the homeland.

The Provisional Government was split along lines which have persisted to this day. An "American" faction, then in the majority, consisted largely of middle-class intellectuals who had fled to America when Japan took over in 1910 and had received their professional training and politico-economic outlook in this country. They were Christian moderates who believed they could persuade the United States government to intervene in behalf of Korea's freedom. Dr. Rhee, the Provisional President, had been a schoolmate of President Wilson's and retained complete faith in him.

Their opponents scoffed, declaring that only open warfare, not diplomatic maneuvering, could drive the Japanese from Korean soil. They were known as the "Siberia-Manchuria" group because Korean settlers in those areas were the strongest supporters of this view. The million Korean farmers in Manchuria had been providing aid to guerrilla bands for a decade, and the 800,000 Korean settlers in Siberia were playing an important role in defeating Japanese intervention. They formed a considerable portion of the sparse population of Siberia and fought with particular vigor because of their long-standing grudge against Japan. This group was more radical in its economic views and tended to think of the Soviet Union as the main anti-Japanese factor in the Far East.

At first the conservative "American" group had more weight, but after 1924 nationalist recruits swarmed to the left, the earthquake of 1923 starting an exodus of radical Korean students from Japan. Most Koreans in Japan were either factory workers or students. Many of the students were very poor and even more susceptible than their Japanese schoolmates to the radical ideas which at that time were causing the police so much concern.

The police reacted to their fears in a particularly brutal way. Japan was in the throes of an economic crisis, and after the earthquake the authorities feared there would be even more widespread disturbances than the deep-rumbling "rice riots" of 1918. To divert the attention of the people the Tokyo police chief broadcast a warning that Korean anarchists were burning, stealing, and murdering, and called upon the Japanese to "use all necessary measures" to defend themselves. At the same time squads of thugs organized by the police and by jingoist societies maimed and killed Koreans in the most brutal fashion. Young girls were tortured with bamboo spikes and then tossed up and down on blankets until they died. In Tokyo Koreans were requested to assemble at military headquarters for their own protection, and the 800 who complied were all slaughtered. About a thousand students and several times that number of workers were killed in this pogrom.

RELATIONS WITH CHINA

Many of the Korean students who left Japan at this time, as well as other militant nationalists, were drawn as if by a magnet to Canton, where the Chinese nationalist revolution was in preparation. They felt that a success for Chinese nationalism—then based on a Kuomintang-Communist alliance receiving Soviet advice and support—would be a setback to Japan and the other imperial nations that were keeping China in a semi-colonial servitude. Koreans expected that the great "northern expedition" which was to free China of imperialists and war lords would march on and free Korea of the Japanese. Consequently they served enthusiastically as propagandists, military instructors, and soldiers in the nationalist army. When Chiang Kai-shek purged the left in 1927, casualties were high among the Korean volunteers. The crippling of the Chinese nationalist revolution spread gloom in Korean circles throughout the world.

Within Korea the Japanese increased their police force to curb militant nationalists and at the same time tried to wean the middle and upper classes away from the movement. Well-to-do Koreans were encouraged to start small factories. Publication of a Korean-owned newspaper, the Oriental Daily News, was permitted. Left nationalists and Communists managed to lay the groundwork for labor, youth, and peasant groups. In 1924 a General Union of Korean Workers and Farmers was organized, and although its meetings were immediately forbidden it established secret branches throughout the country. In 1925 a Communist Party was formed, composed almost entirely of intellectuals who naively made themselves conspicuous by wearing their hair long, sporting red ties, and keeping their shoes studiously unpolished in order to appear proletarian. This bohemian period was brought to a rude end in 1928 when the Japanese police crippled the party by arresting a thousand members and sympathizers.

The Korean scene remained explosive, and in the winter of 1929-30 a Japanese student in Korea provided a spark when he made an insulting offer to a Korean schoolgirl in public. This touched off denunciations, parades, and clashes between Korean and Japanese students. The disturbances reached a climax in a nationwide strike, which was suppressed with the special brutality the Japanese reserved for Koreans and Japanese radicals.

The outbreak of the Sino-Japanese war demonstrated anew how closely the Korean situation was related to conditions in China. The Japanese conquest of Manchuria was a serious blow because it brought the Korean immigrants there under direct Japanese control. But when China began to fight in 1937 Korean resistance was stimulated. A Korean volunteer brigade of several hundred men was formed in central China under Kim Yak-san, Korea's most famous terrorist. In Manchuria about ten thousand Korean troops and fifty thousand partisans fought alongside the Chinese guerrillas under the command of Wu Seng-nun, a former terrorist who had once made an attempt on the life of General Tanaka. Another two thousand Koreans fought in the areas controlled by the Chinese Communists, and one of their number, Wu Ting, served as chief of staff to General P'eng Teh-huai, vice-commander of the Eighth Route Army. At the same time the Japanese, by their own admission, had 30,000 partisans to contend with in Korea. All these groups—left-wing nationalists, terrorists, anarchists, Communists—were loosely linked in a united front.

Drawing by Bernard Golden

The Chinese government used the multi-lingual Koreans as translators, intelligence operatives, and propagandists but feared the contagion of their radical notions. It was to check the leftist Koreans that Chungking, in 1940, resuscitated the Provisional Government, with the aged Kim Koo as President and the seventy-eight-year-old Dr. Rhee as Washington representative, and sponsored a Korean-independence army of a few thousand men. This government represented the remnants of the "American" faction, which had grown increasingly conservative and was antagonistic to the leftist leaders of the Koreans fighting the Japanese in northern China and Korea. In Washington Dr. Rhee sought to achieve recognition for his group by proclaiming the need for a bulwark against communism. In Chungking the Provisional Government came increasingly under the influence of the most reactionary circles—such as the "CC" and "Whampoa" cliques—upon which it depended for financial and political support. Some left nationalists who had hoped that the Provisional Government could be broadened to include all elements found conditions in Chungking intolerable and made their way north to Yenan, where they joined the Korean People's Emancipation League.

WORLD WAR II CHANGES THE PICTURE

As the tide of war turned against the Japanese, they tried to make up for the depletion of their resources by squeezing rice, man-power, and revenue out of Korea. The Japanese-sponsored Korean People's Mobilization League acted as an instrument for extracting "voluntary" contributions and for making certain that farmers did not hide their produce from the authorities. In the last year of the war more than 500,000 Koreans under twenty were conscripted for military service or for labor in Japanese industries. All men between twenty and thirty were forced into Korean factories, and tens of thousands of women and students were forced to work without pay on railways and airdromes.

The Koreans reacted with more determined resistance. Thousands of youths fled to the mountains and engaged in guerrilla warfare. One band of about 15,000 men, led by Kim Jin-hsing, succeeded in establishing contact with the Chinese Eighth Route Army. Repeated uprisings against conscription and military training were brutally crushed by the police. Workers in armament factories organized sabotage groups, some of which the Japanese discovered and smashed. Korean soldiers deserted, farmers refused to harvest crops, and thousands of persons were arrested for listening to foreign broadcasts or refusing to worship the Emperor.

Tribute to the strength of Korean resistance was paid in April, 1945, when Emperor Hirohito "graciously granted" Korea the right to representation in the Imperial Diet. All Koreans recognized this as a sign of weakness and redoubled their efforts. By the end of the war more than half a million persons were participating in illegal activities as members of peasant and labor unions, student groups, and political parties. The fires of nationalism, stoked by forty years of oppression, had brought the country close to the boiling point. Into this seething caldron the competing Russian and American armies of liberation have thrown their vastly differing potions.

[This is the first of two articles on Korea by Mr. Roth.]

Arabia Britannica

BY RUFUS BAXTER

An old contributor of articles to The Nation from the Near East

Cairo, January 18

TWO apparently unrelated events seem to observers in this part of the world to fit neatly into a pattern of Near East politics which week by week takes on more coherent form. These events are the visit to King Farouk of King Abdul Aziz Ibn Saud, absolute ruler of Saudi Arabia, and Great Britain's declaration of Transjordan independence. Both are taken as steps in the consolidation of Arab unity under British sponsorship, a process which has been greatly accelerated since the end of the war for reasons I shall try to explain. The recent meeting of the Arab League here in Cairo expressed in rhetorical form the grandiose plans and dreams of the Arab politicians, but more solid gains are likely to emerge from the talks going on between Farouk and his advisers and Ibn Saud and his numerous sons and retainers; moreover, the termination of the British mandate over Transjordan not only brings an additional Arab state into the councils of the United Nations but increases the prestige of the League. One can be sure Britain made its decision with these facts in mind.

The notion of Arab unity, old as Islam itself, is largely animated by religious zeal. It was Mohammed who gave to all Arabs and Moslems on earth one God and one fatherland—the Islamic Omma. The greatest of the Arab historians, Ibn Khaldoun, wrote in the fifteenth century that the Arabs were incapable of founding an empire without the inspiration of religious enthusiasm. The heritage of the Caliphates gives the Arabs what the heritage of the Roman Empire gave medieval Europeans—a haunting though frustrated urge toward unity. More than once, long after the disintegration of Arab civilization became complete under the Ottoman Turks, the Arabs were seized by this obsession. The massacre of 3,000 Christians in Damascus in 1860 was a manifestation of it. A famous Moslem tract circulated at that time said in part: "We recall to you the words of the Most High: 'Make no differentiation between the infidel nations, for we have thrown enmity and discord into their midst until the day of the last judgment.' Moslem nation, awake! Awake to destroy the race of the servants of the Cross, in this country which they have defiled." Although certainly the sincere Arab nationalists of today nourish no such dire intentions, recent events in Cairo, Alexandria, Aleppo, and Tripoli come as an evil echo of those of 1860, and it is disquieting to notice that among the most ardent adherents of the cause in Egypt are members of the fanatical Moslem Brotherhood and the Youth of Mohammed.

The pan-Arab movement in its modern, political dress goes back to World War I, to McMahon and Lawrence, to the Sykes-Picot agreement. The McMahon letter to the Sherif Hussein of Mecca in 1915 gave assurances that Great Britain was "prepared to recognize and support the independence of the Arabs in all the regions demanded by the Sherif of Mecca," excluding the two districts of Mersina and Alexandretta and portions of Syria lying to the west of the districts of Damascus, Homs, Hama, and Aleppo.* In return, Hussein was to throw in his lot with the Allies against Germany.

The Sykes-Picot agreement (May, 1916) provided, among other things, that Great Britain and France would "recognize and protect an independent Arab state, or a confederation of Arab states." What actually happened after the war fell somewhat short of Hussein's expectations. True, one of his sons, Feisal, was encouraged by the British to establish himself in Syria, and when the French, who had been given a mandate for Syria, drove him out, he was invested with nearly royal prerogatives in British-mandated Iraq. Another son, Abdullah, became and is still titular ruler of British-mandated Transjordan. But Palestine was opened to Jewish colonization under guaranties provided in the Balfour Declaration and confirmed in the mandate, while down in the Hejaz itself Hussein fared very badly. In 1924, when the Turkish National Assembly abolished the Caliphate there, Hussein laid claim to the title. Thereupon he was attacked by Ibn Saud and forced to abdicate. Ibn Saud was declared king in 1926. Egypt, not considering itself or being considered an Arab state at all, was under a formal British protectorate until 1922, becoming more or less independent in 1936—less rather than more. So the years passed, and the dream of Arab unity remained unfulfilled.

It was revived in 1941 when Anthony Eden announced in the House of Commons that the British government would support a plan for unity among the Arab states. A gesture of this sort was no doubt wise at the moment, for Britain's prestige was at a low ebb in the Middle East, with Germany threatening the Allied position from the west and north.

* Sir Henry McMahon, however, said in a letter to the London Times in 1907: "I feel it my duty to state, and do so definitely and emphatically, that it was not intended by me in giving this pledge to King Hussein to include Palestine in the area in which Arab independence was promised."

EGYPT THE FULCRUM

The following winter events occurred in Egypt which made that country the fulcrum of the new pan-Arab movement. Considerations of political and military security induced the British authorities in Egypt to force on King Farouk a government of their choosing. The operation was carried out rather unceremoniously. In February, 1942, the Abdin royal palace was surrounded by tanks, and elsewhere in Cairo the alerted British army occupied strategic points. A tank forced the palace gate and was followed by a car in which rode the British Ambassador, Sir Miles Lampson, now Lord Killearn, and the commanding general. Lampson informed Farouk, by that time a prisoner in his own palace, that he must ask Mustapha Nahas Pasha, leader of the nationalistic Wafd Party, to form a Cabinet, or face the consequences. Farouk, humiliated but helpless, acquiesced.

The maneuver was an astute one, for the key to Egyptian politics is the perennial struggle for power between the Palace and the Wafd. The Wafd is the major party; its unquestioned leader is Nahas Pasha. By imposing Nahas on the King, the British brought in a government sure to be popular, at least for a while, and at the same time relatively pro-Ally and docile.

In 1943 Nahas began to promote Arab unity under the sponsorship of Egypt. Whether the initiative was his or not, I do not know. Certainly his Cabinet, as was expected, was quite incapable of coping adequately with the country's desperate internal problems, and Nahas may have wanted to bolster his position with an easy diplomatic success. The King, of course, was at every moment watching for an excuse to get rid of him. In any case the Egyptian government's pan-Arab policy, if not actually suggested by the British, was enthusiastically seconded by them, and they kept Nahas in power long enough to see it through.

In January, 1943, Mr. Eden repeated his assertion that the British government would view with sympathy any movement among the Arabs aiming at economic, cultural, or political union, adding, however, that none was yet in sight. He was not kept waiting long. Nahas called a series of conferences in the course of which the Prime Ministers of Iraq, Syria, Transjordan, and the Lebanon visited Egypt. These conferences led to the conclusion of a protocol which provided for the creation of an Arab League. The pact was finally signed on October 7, 1944. By that time, Saudi Arabia, most important and most independent of the Arab states, had come into the fold, followed shortly by the Yemen.

The pact is couched in magnificent rhetoric, but a wide gulf separates word and deed. Although the members state pledge common action on such matters as customs, commercial and financial arrangements, communications, intellectual cooperation, nationality and extradition laws, and social and sanitary improvements, the Arab League is essentially a political instrument.

First of all, it relegates to the position of followers Egypt's potential rivals for leadership—Iraq with its long-cherished Greater Syria plan (also espoused by the other Hashimite appanage, Transjordan) and Saudi Arabia with its holy cities. Secondly, it flatters the Arab world with illusions of world power. Already Arab leaders speak sometimes in the name of 40,000,000 Arabs, sometimes in the name of 300,000,000 Moslems from Morocco to India. Thirdly—and this is the heart of the matter—it facilitates Britain's effort to reorganize the Middle East into a cohesive bloc.

THE LEAGUE'S STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS

Britain's interest in the Middle East was never greater than now, and rarely since the time of Napoleon has its position here been so exposed. These considerations have led it rather grudgingly to yield a part of its economic hegemony to the United States, in the hope that from now on the interests of the two countries will be so closely associated throughout the area that they must defend it together. The same considerations led the British to plug for Arab unity more consistently than hitherto. Great Britain will very likely try to enlarge the Arab League to embrace the Sudan and the Persian Gulf principalities—Muscat and Oman, Kuwait, Bahrein, Qatar, and various sheikdoms—which, though insignificant in themselves, account for a million or so Arabs living in a region vital to Empire communications and oil reserves. Meanwhile the League has claimed the trusteeship of Arab Libya and strongly hinted that it cannot ignore the "appeals" from the Arabs living in French North Africa. Skilfully handled, the Arab League can be a potent instrument.

But its weaknesses, too, are great. First of all, most of the minorities in the region are wary of it if not actually opposed to it. The Lebanese Christians in particular will become less accommodating if the Moslem angle is too strongly emphasized or if the efforts of Iraq and Transjordan for the creation of a Greater Syria show signs of success; this is unlikely at the moment because of the opposition of Egypt and of Ibn Saud as head of a rival ruling house*. Then, too, 9,000,000 Kurds have national aspirations of their own that run head on against the interests of at least two Arab states. And most Jews, Armenians, and Turcomans are unsympathetic. Palestine, of course, is the chief stumbling-block; there the British will continue if possible to steer a middle course between Arab and Jewish demands and try to induce the United States to accept coresponsibility for finding some sort of solution.

The league's low economic and military potential is another major source of weakness. The Arab states are straining their meager budgets to keep an aggregate of perhaps 100,000 badly equipped, ill-trained, and totally unarmed troops under arms. As far as I know, not a single Arab country is equipped to manufacture a rifle, much less a tank or an airplane. All of them are handicapped either by a primitive tribal society or else by appalling poverty, disease, illiteracy, and exploitation; some by both. If the Arab League hopes to have any substantial weight in world councils, it will either have to play one power off against another or become an appendage of a single first-class military power. The latter course is the only one possible at the moment, and the military power in question is Great Britain.

* It has been hinted in the press that a reconciliation between Ibn Saud and the Hashimites may have been brought about by Farouk during the Arab king's visit to Cairo.

TOOL OF BRITISH IMPERIALISM

The Arabs kid themselves along with pomp and oratory, but the British are in deadly earnest. Their policy, conditioned by the exigencies of empire, is lucid and coherent—except in Syria, where they went perhaps a little too far; it is unaffected by changes of government in London. The Arab League can become an admirable tool for furthering British imperial interests. Already a Middle East Office has been set up at Whitehall to facilitate relations with the Arab states. It is unlikely that this agency and the Arab League will work at cross purposes, for their aims, if not precisely the same, are complementary. Collaboration will help consolidate Britain's position against antagonistic forces from outside the area or within it. American economic and Russian political penetration can be countered with greater ease. (France has already been reduced to a negligible quantity.) From the economic point of view, particularly as long as the sterling-area controls can be maintained, the Middle East will be more effectively integrated into the general Empire scheme. Moreover, the Arab League is not an association of peoples but of notables, men who can be counted upon to use their augmented power to prevent social changes detrimental to their own and to Britain's interests. Semi-feudal land tenure is a bulwark against industrialization and economic expansion, which would challenge the British position. Even if the peoples of the Middle East cannot be kept forever in a state close to serfdom, progress can be slowed down. For this purpose Arab-Jewish understanding must be frustrated at all costs, for the Zionists incarnate the menace of social change. Since an Arab-Jewish entente is a specter which frightens the Arab leaders as much as it does the British, the League can be counted upon to fight it.

The moment any part of the Middle East is in a position to say: Here we have a modern, functioning economy that can stand on its own feet; here we have a peaceful, disciplined population, strong enough to command the respect of our neighbors; here we no longer need, or want, your tutelage—at that moment the British will be forced to choose between evacuation or conquest. Palestine represents that danger. Only the Arab-Jewish controversy will, in the future, justify continued British occupation. The Zionists have harmed their cause by emphasizing integral nationalism. None the less, they have created a modern state, however minute, and in many localities have made Arab-Jewish cooperation a fact. The conflict of interest and of ideology between them and the British can only grow worse in the days ahead—especially since the Jews are the only people to have any appreciable access to dollar credits. If the Palestinian Jews take to the maquis, as they are beginning to do, it will be against the British, not against the Arabs. But the Arab League will be on hand to give the conflict the appearance of one between Jews and Arabs, just as a few months ago it served as a cover for the British ouster of the French in Syria.

In the Wind

WITHOUT WISHING TO ALARM you unduly, we nevertheless think you ought to know about this frightening statement that was made at the New England Sales Management Conference in Boston last month. "Salesmen as a group," said one of the speakers, "will have more effect upon the permanence of peace than all diplomats, more effect on wages and prices than all negotiators."

DURING THE WAR, according to the British Information Service, a special military operation was set up to guard the personal safety of Prime Minister Churchill. The code designation for the project was "Operation Elephant."

AN EVEN DOZEN JAPANESE PRINCES will be unemployed as a result of occupation directives banning military men from public office. The United Press quotes the Jiji News Agency as saying that as a result "one of Japan's prime social problems now would be providing jobs for the purged princes."

FORMER ASSOCIATES of the fabulous Jack and Heinz plant are being blacklisted by Cleveland employers, Business Week reports. "The kind of profit sharing to which they are devoted converts," explains the magazine, "is more distasteful than almost any color of union philosophy to employers."

CASTLE MOUNTAIN, a Canadian peak near Banff, Alberta, has been renamed Mount Eisenhower.

WHEN HEARST'S SEATTLE Post-Intelligencer resumed publication in mid-January after a 56-day strike, its readers were treated to a 134-page Sunday edition. It featured 62 pages of comics, including a 12-page summary of the strike-interrupted daily comics; 36 pages of American Weekly; and 3 pages of pictures. The editors also managed to squeeze in 33 pages of news.

DIOGENES, BLOW OUT YOUR LANTERN; your search has ended. The following classified ad appeared in the Portland Oregonian of January 9: "Veteran of World War II wants a position with good pay. Likes horses, dogs, and attractive women. Lazy and incompetent."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Budgetary Planning

THE President's mammoth combined state-of-the-union and budget message presumably represents a cooperative effort by a number of his advisers. Unfortunately, nobody seems to have thought of calling in a good editor to cut out the repetitions, suppress the clichés, and generally organize it into a cohesive whole. As a result, only the most conscientious citizen is likely to brave its formidable manner for the sake of its matter.

That is too bad, for buried in the turgid mass there is a lot of sound economic sense. Mr. Truman is not nearly so forceful a character as his predecessor, but his steadfast adherence to the main principles of the New Deal shows that he has a share of the same sort of tenacity that distinguished Mr. Roosevelt when it came to really important issues. Despite rebuffs by Congress and carping by the conservative press, which doesn't love him in January as it did in May, Mr. Truman has reemphasized the thesis that "the government must assume ultimate responsibility for the economic health of the nation." That, of course, was a basic tenet of the Rooseveltian philosophy. It implies over-all government planning to keep the economy on an even keel and to counteract the tendency of free-enterprise helmsmen to steer a wildly erratic course when left to themselves.

Today fiscal policy is the government's most effective means of insuring a high and stable level of employment. As the President said in his message: "Government programs are of such importance in the development of production and employment opportunities—domestic and foreign—that it has become essential to formulate and consider the federal budget in the light of the nation's budget as a whole." In the later stages of the war the government was the greatest customer of industry and agriculture, buying more than half the gross national product, that is, the aggregate output of goods and services. In order to maintain national income at or near its war-time level, private spending by consumers and private investment in capital goods must rise pari passu with the fall in government spending. That change-over means a lot of difficult adjustments, but in some ways it has been proceeding more smoothly than it was reasonable to expect before V-J Day. Unemployment has been held to a moderate figure, the flow of income payments has not been seriously checked, and both consumer spending and investment have expanded sharply.

In fact, buying pressures are so strong that they are threatening to burst price ceilings, and in framing the budget the President rightly took account of the immediate danger of inflation. That meant giving thought to the maximum possible reduction in the deficit, since deficits, particularly when they are financed through created bank credits, swell the stream of purchasing power and add to inflationary pressures. In a deflationary period, when goods are plentiful in relation to purchasing power, deficit financing can provide a valuable corrective. Under present conditions, however, if the budget is to be properly used as a compensatory mechanism, it should ideally not merely balance but yield a surplus for debt reduction. Theoretically those critics who complain because Mr. Truman has not eliminated the deficit in fiscal 1947 are right. But taking into consideration the expensive incidentals of winding up a world war, the large and inflexible item of debt interest, and the many commitments to veterans, unemployed workers, farmers, and foreign countries, the President has done well to hold down total estimated expenditure to $35.8 billion, including outlays dependent on the passage of new legislation.

While the budget will not balance next year, it will not be necessary to borrow new money in order to make ends meet. The Treasury cash balance is so ample—the Victory bond drive was almost too successful—that it can take care of the deficit and, in addition, make possible debt repayment to the tune of $4.4 billion. This situation, however, could be upset if Congress were to decide on further tax remissions. Mr. Truman's message urged that taxes should remain unchanged in the coming year. He pointed out that very substantial reductions became effective at the New Year and additional relief would be inflationary. This point is well taken. The lightening of tax bills obviously adds to the total of spending money in the hands of the public, and that, as we have already noted, is too great in relation to the probable volume of goods available. Congress, however, may be less interested in checking inflation—a subject inclined to bore a good many legislators—than in handing out benefits in an election year. Consequently the President's aim of approaching a balanced budget in fiscal 1947 and achieving it in 1948 may be thwarted. A lot of educational work needs to be done before there is general acceptance of the simple but vital proposition that the time to reduce taxes is when trade is slumping. In boom periods they should be maintained at a high level or even increased.

Some of the President's critics have accused him of inconsistency for worrying simultaneously about inflation and deflation. It should not be so hard to grasp the connection between these twin evils, both symptoms of an unbalanced economy. The immediate danger, it is true, lies in the former, but one reason why it is necessary to keep a tight check-rein on an inflationary boom is its inevitable transformation into a deflationary bust.

Under inflationary conditions business always enlarges its share of the national income. With the price level trending steadily upward, the interval between buying and selling means an automatic increase in profit margins. Swollen earnings induce confidence, encourage investment in plant and inventories. Production consequently begins to expand, but as it expands, purchasing power is shrinking, for wages and salaries inevitably lag in the race up the inflationary spiral staircase, while fixed incomes are stuck at the bottom. Finally business begins to realize that it is piling up goods in a declining market, and everyone tries to unload at once. Then comes the débâcle. Mr. Truman personally experienced the effects of this cycle after the last war, and he is desperately concerned in saving the country from a repetition of the experience. In that endeavor he deserves more support than he is receiving.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

IF I had to characterize Czechoslovakia in a few words, I should call it "the most sensible country in Europe." Of all the liberated nations it appears to be making the most rapid strides toward economic and political recovery. Its progress is no gift from heaven. Throughout the war the Czechs painfully schooled themselves for the difficult jobs that awaited them after liberation. While other governments in exile dissipated a large part of their energies in trying to heal internal splits, the Czech regime always gave the impression of an efficient and well-articulated team. That it functioned so smoothly is due in large part to the extraordinary common sense of the captain: Eduard Benes is, above all, a man of sound judgment. In a crisis, his practical, down-to-earth solutions have never failed to rally the country behind him. There is no need, however, to picture him as a sort of Czech saint; though an outstanding national leader, he is at the same time very much of a party man—but one who knows when the party's interests must yield to those of the nation.

These qualities are clearly reflected in Benes's speech to the Provisional National Assembly on October 28, 1945. Reviewing political developments in Europe from the rise of Hitler to the present time, the Czechoslovak President expresses his long-held conviction that the pre-war system has outlived its usefulness, that out of the war must emerge a new society, with a more universal outlook and greater social and economic justice than the old. Whether he is dealing with revision of the constitution or the relations between Czechs and Slovaks, budget balancing or agrarian reform, he constantly reminds his audience that "it is in the spirit of this epoch of revolution that we must solve all the problems that face us in the sphere of our home policy." Perhaps in actual practice he is inclined to proceed more slowly. On the question of nationalization, for example, he applied the brakes so sharply that he almost had a serious accident. But when the political parties declared themselves ready to assume complete responsibility for the nationalization measures, he immediately went along with them.

At times, however, Benes can be absolutely uncompromising. Despite protests from British and American liberals, he has insisted upon his position in regard to the Sudeten Germans. He had long ago made up his mind that the Sudetens must go, and he believes he has the moral authority to take this drastic step: "We tried up to the year 1938, and especially in that year, to arrive at an understanding with our Germans in a truly liberal and genuinely humane spirit. All our endeavors were totally disappointed." Now they must leave. Benes is not willing to allow a potential fifth column to complicate the problem of reconstruction. But he is moved by no spirit of revenge. Indeed, he has tried as far as possible to prevent individual reprisals and violent measures of expulsion by local authorities; at all times he has insisted that the transfer be effected "in a humane and not a Nazi manner, and in full accord with the Allies."

Since the liberation, Czechoslovak foreign policy has been successfully oriented toward close ties with Russia without any loss of national identity. At the UNO conference in London Masaryk could truthfully say, "We are masters in our own house." While Czechoslovakia's pro-Soviet attitude is undoubtedly influenced by its geographical position and the presence of Communists in the government, it is also deeply rooted in the people themselves and was strengthened by the British-French betrayal at Munich. On the other hand, friendship with the Soviet Union does not exclude Czech collaboration with the West. For that collaboration to develop normally, however, it is essential that the Western powers make no attempt to check the clear trend toward socialism in Europe, especially in the East. On his return from a visit to Prague, Will Lawther, president of the British mine workers' union, said bluntly, "It is incredible that our diplomatic service should be used to threaten to starve one of our allies, only because in the nationalization of certain Czech industrial properties British interests were affected."

If Czechoslovakia is well on the road to recovery, it is mainly because of the spirit of unity which seems to animate all four parties of the government coalition. Relations between the Social Democratic Party and the Communists are better than anywhere else in Europe. The Czech trade unions, with a pre-war membership of 2,200,000 in a country of 15,000,000, are considered the most powerful on the Continent. But where formerly a dozen different political tendencies divided their ranks, today the unions, already back to a strength of 2,000,000, stand firmly united, and their leadership has been reinforced by men drawn from the resistance. One has only to look at the relationship of the labor movement and the government to understand the meaning of national unity in action. Three men head the trade-union organization: Zapotocky, a Communist; Erban, a Social Democrat, and Wunsch, of the Benes party. A similar combination exists in the Cabinet: the Prime Minister, Z. Fierlinger, is a Social Democrat, while Vice-President Klement Gottwald is a Communist. Foreign Minister Masaryk is a member of the Benes party; the Under Secretary, Vlado Clementis, is a Communist. Committees of coordination have been formed to iron out party differences. Far from anticipating the end of the coalition, Benes recently said that it ought to continue for at least five more years.

It is against this political background that Czechoslovakia's first general election will take place on May 26. The voting franchise has been extended to include soldiers and the eighteen-year-olds. One can only speculate on the outcome. Until recently it was generally believed that the Social Democrats held the edge; lately the Catholic Party has been gaining ground; most observers give the Communists from 20 to 22 per cent of the vote. Much will depend on the independent voters, but one thing is clear: the government that emerges from the election will still be based on a firm policy of inter-party unity.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL.

TOCQUEVILLE'S great critique of democracy* was first published well over a hundred years ago; it has been reprinted many times and in many languages since then. But to read it in the context of these days is to feel that its panoplied republication in America in 1945 was a providential event devised by a higher and more witting power than Alfred A. Knopf.

I speak particularly of Tocqueville's discussion of cultural matters—using the word cultural in a wide, not a narrow, sense—for while his political predictions are often more curious than correct, his comments on the cultural shape of things to come continue to be almost too relevant for comfort, and fascinating as well. They happen to coincide with certain preoccupations of my own, and I hope I may be forgiven if instead of presenting an orderly review of "Democracy in America" I appropriate some of Tocqueville's extraordinary insights as texts for comment on the condition of man in this democratic age.

Alexis Henry Charles Maurice Clerel, comte de Tocqueville, was an aristocrat, a "young liberal" of his time, who recognized and was committed to the democratic revolution. Having raised himself into the clear between two worlds, he achieved a remarkably calm view both of the aristocratic society which was passing and of the relatively new social development, democracy, which by its very nature has since rendered most men incapable of the disinterested view.

Tocqueville regarded the principle of equality as the driving force of democracy. This principle would, he said, bring great benefits into the world, but it would also suggest to man some "dangerous propensities" which must be resisted and overcome in man's best interest; and his book is a warning, addressed to the leaders of men and nations, of the ordeals to which, in his view, the new and inevitable order of affairs must subject the human spirit.

The good society, for Tocqueville, was that which allowed the largest scope for the development and the free creative use of the individual's powers of mind and imagination—prime source of the varied and beautiful and enduring achievements that make up the sum of human culture. He felt that democracy offered the possibility of the good society on a universal scale; but he also envisaged a democratic society which might limit rather than enlarge the horizons of the mind. He was particularly concerned lest man unwittingly give over or consciously reject his cultural heritage, which was by force of circumstance identified with aristocratic society but which was also the distillation of the experience of the race. And his anxiety on this score sharpened rather than blurred his perceptions.

"I admire [the principle of equality] because it lodges in the very depths of each man's mind and heart that indefinable feeling, the instinctive inclination for political independence," said Tocqueville; but he did not confuse equality with liberty, and he perceived that in the very process of making men feel independent the principle of equality would also tend to isolate them one from another and to show each his own weakness.

When the inhabitant of a democratic country compares himself individually with all those about him, he feels with pride that he is the equal of any one of them; but when he comes to survey the totality of his fellows and to place himself in contrast with so huge a body, he is instantly overwhelmed by the sense of his own insignificance and weakness.

The sense of individual weakness, combined with the promise of equality and the passion for it, would give rise, said Tocqueville, to tendencies which must be combated as inimical to the highest development of man. It would, for one thing, set up a pressure toward conformity on a huge scale—I shall discuss this later; for another, it would turn every man's attention upon himself and his own prosperity in relation to that of his neighbor (the Joneses), and this in turn would lead to an "inordinate love of material gratification" but of a peculiarly safe variety.

The special taste that the men of democratic times entertain for physical enjoyments is not naturally opposed to the principles of public order; nay, it often stands in need of order that it may be gratified. Nor is it adverse to regularity of morals, for good morals contribute to public tranquillity and are favorable to industry. It may even be frequently combined with a species of religious morality; men wish to be as well off as they can in this world without forgoing their chance of another. Some physical gratifications cannot be indulged in without crime; from such they strictly abstain. The enjoyment of others is sanctioned by religion and morality; to these the heart, the imagination, and life itself are unreservedly given up, till in snatching at these lesser gifts men lose sight of those more precious possessions which constitute the glory and greatness of mankind.

The reproach I address to the principle of equality is not that it leads men away in the pursuit of forbidden enjoyments but that it absorbs them wholly in quest of those which are allowed. By these means a kind of virtuous materialism may ultimately be established in the world, which would not corrupt but enervate the soul and noiselessly unbend its springs of action.

This summary, and indictment, of the bourgeois way of life has hardly been improved upon, while the phrase "virtuous materialism" is a wonderful example of the author's profundity and wit.

Tocqueville noted in America in 1831 the twin passions for equality and for commerce. These proclivities, along with our superior resources and our technological skill—"men living in democratic ages cannot fail to improve the industrial part of science"—have combined to produce the most egregious example so far of "virtuous materialism." It is only just, however, to say that our example is one which the rest of the world has done its best, and has now, quite understandably, taken a new resolve, to emulate. One of the few certain results of the war will turn out to be, I think, an increased worldwide preoccupation with things. In this country, after the past few years of privation, it has entered a new obsessive phase.

* "Democracy in America." By Alexis de Tocqueville. The Henry Reeve Text as Revised by Francis Bowen Now Further Corrected and Edited with Introduction, Editorial Notes, and Bibliography, by Phillips Bradley. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

And at this point another of Tocqueville's merciless notations on the quality of American life falls with peculiar force. He commented on its "excited yet monotonous aspect"; he found here a "strange melancholy," a "restlessness in the midst of prosperity." It was Tocqueville's opinion that "their taste for physical gratifications must be regarded as the original source of that secret disquietude which the actions of the Americans betray."

Few intelligent observers will deny that there is still "restlessness in the midst of prosperity" and that this restlessness seeks assuagement in the piling up of possessions, large and small. Few will maintain that it will be assuaged though every home be fitted out with a deep-freeze unit, television, and an electric maid—if only because the passion for things is by its very nature insatiable.

In this restlessness perhaps lies the hope, dim as it often seems, that "virtuous materialism" will raise up the agent of its overthrow, that the millions who continue to "strain their faculties to the utmost to achieve paltry results" will eventually demand more satisfying rewards, and democratic society work out—as Tocqueville said in paying his respects to those who would try to go back—"that species of greatness and happiness which is our own."

T. S. Eliot had something to say on this point in an interview recently published in Horizon. When he was asked, by a rather awkward interviewer, if he saw any "creative future" in view of the ascendancy of technology, he answered:

I think it is possible that that process... may go still further in the same direction, but I think that any tendency like that gives rise to its own opposite, and that in the end, sooner or later... there will be a general rebellion against it, because, you see, that sort of thing leads to something which the technological type of mind leaves out of account. And that is that human beings will just become bored with the kind of life they have from it—and I think that boredom is a very powerful force in life and that people will do the most extraordinary things to escape from it.

The nature of the "greatness and happiness which is our own" is not to be defined or foreseen. It will obviously be as various as the human species; it will involve in some way the creative use of man's peculiar gifts.

Tocqueville, being of his age, often invoked religion. Eliot has invoked it in our age, but for most people religion has become an archaic and impossible refuge. Yet the question persists: "For what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" It persists because it is not a religious but a human question—to which religion has been only one of the answers.

Next week I shall discuss Tocqueville's prognosis of the specific effects of the spread of democracy on the practice and appreciation of the arts.

RUSSIA

★ HER HISTORY

★ HER PEOPLE

★ HER NEIGHBORS

★ HER GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Lecture Courses by

HANS KOHN (Her History), historian and educator, describes the intellectual development of Russia, and the genius of Russian literature.

6 Thursdays, 8:30 P.M. Beginning February 14. $6.

JOSEPH WINSTON (Her People) lived in the Soviet Union for seven years during the 30's as a consulting engineer and worked with her people.

9 Thursdays, 8:30 P.M. Beginning March 28. $9.

VICTOR YAKHONTOFF (Her Neighbors)—his understanding of Soviet Far Eastern policy is based on years of experience and study.

15 Wednesdays, 8:30 P.M. Beginning Feb. 6. $15.

ERICH HULA (Her Government and Politics), political scientist, member of the Graduate Faculty of Political and Social Science.

15 Thursdays, 6:20 P.M. Beginning February 7. $15.

THE NEW SCHOOL

66 West 12th Street • New York 11 • GR 7-8454

H. G. WELLS— Prophet of the Atomic Bomb

Read his latest book:

"CRUX ANSATA — An Indictment
of the Roman Catholic Church"

An historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis.

Cloth Binding $1.75

Paper-covered $1.25

Also get a copy of

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS" by L. H. Lehmann

A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration.

Cloth Binding $1.75

Paper-covered $1.00

COMBINATION OFFERS

Both Cloth Bound Books $3.00
Both Paper Bound Books $2.00

New Pamphlet

"VATICAN POLICY
IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR"

48 pages of Documented Facts 25c

Free to those who return this ad with their order
for the above books

Order From:

AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. 251
229 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

BRIEFER COMMENT

John Henry Newman

OF THE GREAT FIGURES of the Victorian past there is none that stands the years so well as Newman. Non-Catholics are as likely as not to begin to read him with aversion, but the challenge that he offers to one's assumptions is so lively and so real, his sense of the world is so subtle and coherent, and his psychological perception is so complex and shrewd that any reader who takes pleasure in endangering his own fixed ideas must be grateful for the exhilaration that Newman can give. It is unfortunate that neither of the two books on Newman published in the centenary year of his conversion to Catholicism does justice to his intellectual interest. John Moody's "John Henry Newman" (Sheed and Ward, $3.75) is the work of an amateur scholar—the author of "Moody's Manual of Investments"—a Catholic layman who has had a lively religious career, having been, before his own Catholic conversion, a member of the Low, the Broad, and the High groups of the Protestant Episcopal church. Mr. Moody's biography is simple, lucid, and warm, and as such admirable. But it is touched with a certain snippy, parochial condescension to non-Catholic thought; and the modesty of its intellectual pretensions does not justify the inadequacy of its intellectual power; nor is it sufficient in its scholarship, for it omits from its bibliography many of the most notable of the modern studies of Newman. Charles Frederic Harrold's "John Henry Newman" (Longmans, Green, $3.50) is the work of an Episcopalian and a professional scholar. It is free from the limitations of partisanship, and it is as scholarly as one could wish—or as one would expect from the learned author of "Carlyle and German Thought." But Professor Harrold's book, although likely to prove indispensable to students of Newman, is not likely to be attractive to the general reader. It is quite frankly an academic work—after two chapters of condensed and undramatic biography, it goes on to the summary, exposition, and criticism of Newman's ideas and powers. It is impossible not to be aware of how painstaking, balanced, careful, and sound this evaluation is; yet it is equally impossible not to feel that it has the effect of leaving Newman's thought inorganic and remote, and this despite Professor Harrold's own insistence on its vitality and relevance.

LIONEL TRILLING

Working Reporter

ELSIE DANENBERG went to Britain while the bombs were still dropping to report the part, the very large part, that its women were playing in the war effort. She was not content, however, to be taken on conducted tours: she wanted to share experiences before writing about them. Consequently, "Blood, Sweat, and Lipstick" (Greenberg, $2.50), the book which describes those experiences, has a freshness and authenticity lacking in many descriptions of war-time England. Despite the title there is not a great deal of blood in these pages or very much lipstick; there is an abundance of sweat. In the course of twelve months or so Mrs. Danenberg undertook a large number of jobs. Some of them were dangerous, many of them were dirty, all of them involved hard physical labor. They included work with an aircraft rescue squad, in a cotton mill, with the Women's Land Army, on a canal boat, in a fishing-shed gutting herrings, in a railroad repair shop cleaning locomotives. These and other chores gave her an opportunity, such as no other American correspondent seized, of entering into the lives of British workers. Thus her book, while lightly written, offers a revealing picture of social conditions and problems which, now the external enemy has been defeated, challenge the united energies of British men and women.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Flash! 1. Genuine book values: Lin Yutang's THE VIGIL OF A NATION, original J. Day ed., $2.75—only $1.00; ANNA and the KING of SIAM (M. London), the original $3.75 John Day ed.—only $1.50; order now while available.

2. Book Service: We mail everywhere the books reviewed and advertised here and elsewhere. Downtown Book Bazaar, 212 Broadway, New York 7, N. Y.

JUST OFF THE PRESS . . .

SHALL EUROPE STARVE?

By DWIGHT MACDONALD

A thorough factual survey of the U. S. Government's failure to give adequate relief to suffering Europe this winter.

- Overfed America
- The German Horror
- Hungering Europe
- Proposals for Action

10c a copy • 20 for $1.00 • 100 for $5.00

Order from:

POLITICS

45 Astor Place

New York, 3, N. Y.

READ

"A JEW SAYS 'BOO'"

by Kenneth Leslie

THE STORY OF THE ANMUTH CASE BEFORE
JUDGE CLARE FENERTY

PUBLISHED BY THE PROTESTANT

521 Fifth Avenue

New York 17, N. Y.

*Judge Fenerty was the principal speaker at the Friends of Frank Fay meeting at Madison Square Garden on January 10, 1940.

PRICE - 10 CENTS

World War II: an Informal History

"THE STORY OF THE SECOND WORLD WAR," edited, with historical narrative, by Henry Steele Commager (Little, Brown, $3), does not pretend to be a formal or systematic history. It is far too early, as Mr. Commager says, for that effort, since the important records are not yet available. It is with the experience of the war that this book is concerned. An abundant selection of writings by men of all ranks and nations who were eyewitnesses of the campaigns is set in a remarkably clear and substantial narrative framework by the author-editor—quite the most readable thing of its kind so far published. Mr. Commager is admirably catholic in his choice of material. A speech of Winston Churchill's is set beside a Russian colonel's description of action,

"RESISTANCE TO TYRANNY IS OBEDIENCE TO GOD"

"Rt. Hon. Earl of Halifax
British Embassy
Washington, D. C.

"Your nation now seeks a loan from the United States. And I, my lord, as a citizen of the United States, oppose the granting of this loan. I should like to tell you why.

"You, my lord, and certain English governments of the last years, seems to have done your share in upsetting the peace of the world. You sympathized with and backed Mussolini. Various English interests helped arm Hitler. In the Civil War in Spain you helped choke Republicanism, and allowed Spain to be the proving ground of the Fascist war machines. You made Munich. The history of government, my lord, in England, in our time, is that first you armed, then you appeased. And this, my lord, causes me to consider the various English governments of the last years the most inept since George III.

"I say this with deep regret. For England gave the world much of its concept of free men. And the English people in this war sacrificed heroically, and won the admiration of the world. But their governments have been stupid and inept.

"I was appalled, my lord, at your reign of terror in Greece. I deplore the use of American lend-lease materials to massacre Greeks. I deplore your massacre of the Indonesians. And I view with horror and loathing your massacre of Hebrews, both in postwar Germany, and in Palestine.

"I am a Jew, my lord, and an American, and I hope, a citizen of the world. Five million Jews, my lord, were murdered in Germany. And, in my opinion, you, my lord, and your governments, were accessory to the crime. For you could have opened the doors of Palestine. I believe, my lord, the conscience of the world will decry you not having done so. I believe the American people feel perfectly willing for all Jews who want to go there, to go to Palestine.

"Your reasons, my lord, for not opening Palestine to Hebrew repatriation are scant and false. Palestine is no colony of England. England has a mandate there, a mandate in essence being a trusteeship, which has not been administered sensibly or in good faith. The Balfour Declaration, on which the mandate was based, called for a 'Homeland' in Palestine. All quibbling about words, my lord, cannot reduce the implication. A homeland is a homeland, not a place where the people appointed to this homeland are barred, or those already established there experience taxation without representation, or experience trial without jury. . . .

"You are driving a people desirous of freedom to revolution, my lord. And then you will haul out the tanks, possibly obtained through American lend-lease. And possibly use Arab or Hessian mercenaries.

The American League for a Free Palestine, in publishing the open letter by Lester Cohen, internationally famous writer, author of "Sweepings" and the recent best-seller "Coming Home," appeals to the people of this country, whatever their origin or creed, to protest this outrage against mankind.

Make your voice heard. Demand of President Truman and of your Congressman that:

(A) The United States Government forbid the British Government to use lend-lease materials in its unholy war against Hebrew survivors, whether in Europe or Palestine.

(B) The United States Government give full assistance to the immediate repatriation of the Hebrews from Europe to their own territory, Palestine.

For quick action, give us your financial support and help us to bring this nation-wide campaign to a successful conclusion.

GUY M. GILLETTE, President

CO-CHAIRMEN: William S. Bennet, Louis Bromfield, Ben Hecht, Will Rogers, Jr., Harry Louis Selden, Andrew L. Somers, M. O.

"My lord, should the Greeks revolt against the regime you have imposed, should more Indonesians join the revolt, should the Hebrews revolt against you in Palestine, I should be very much for them. Resistance to tyranny, my lord, is obedience to God.

"And it does no good to throttle the press services out of Palestine, and to refer to those fighting for liberty as 'terrorists.' George III put a price upon George Washington's head, and Benjamin Franklin's, and called them 'rebels.' Name-calling and head-pricing, my lord, will not do.

"There might have been some excuse, my lord, for the Imperialistic point of view back in the days when oil was important in war. Some months ago, from the Imperialistic point of view, there might have been some reason for frying the Hebrews in Palestinian oil. But, my lord, the atom bomb has antiquated oil and the oil point of view.

"My lord, the governments you served have proved to be shortsighted and inept. They have collaborated with the tyrannies they later had to resist. They have imposed tyrannies in the midst of a war for freedom. They have made mock of the legend of England. And of the freedoms for which we fought.

"When the 'rebel' Benjamin Franklin was unofficial ambassador to France he wrote the French an essay on economy in which he termed the government of England a very bad risk. In the same sense, my lord, I think you and the government you represent a bad risk. For, my lord, you have crowned the war for freedom, Four Freedoms, if I remember correctly, with a series of tyrannies. And tyrannies, says history, cannot survive the ultimate explosion of those tyrannized.

"My lord, desist. Stop shooting Greeks and Indonesians. And stop killing Hebrews. The Hebrews, my lord, for five thousand years of written history have struggled for freedom. They have struggled for it in many places and have brought the light of freedom to much of the world. That is why they were hated by tyrants from Haman to Hitler. But freedom, my lord, fires in the flames of war and persecution. And I can tell you, from their history, that if you continue your persecution of the Hebrews in Palestine they will find a blood-drenched freedom there.

"I think, in this age there may be a better way of doing things. And I ask you to come to a more sensible way.

"Yours, sir, in the hope of the Peace much talked about but not yet declared or evident."

Lester Cohen

American League for a Free Palestine
25 West 45th Street, New York 19, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

I am heartily in accord with your endeavors and enclose herewith the sum of $—— to help you bring about the early repatriation of the surviving Hebrews of Europe to Palestine and the end of tyranny in Palestine through the mobilization of American public opinion.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY.....ZONE.....STATE.....

Please make checks payable to Mrs. Louis Untermyer, Treas.
By a ruling of Treasury Dept., Contributions to This Organization
Are Tax Exempt.

(N.)

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

THE Nation

- ☐ with Harpers Magazine . . . $6.50
You Save $2.50
- ☐ with Consumers Union . . . $7.00
You Save $1.50
- ☐ with Harpers Magazine
and Consumers Union . . . $9.00
You Save $3.50
- ☐ with Free World . . . $7.50
You Save $1.50
- ☐ with Saturday Review . . . $8.50
You Save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself

- ☐ One Year $5 ☐ Two Years $8 ☐ Three Years $11
☐ Servicemen's Rate $3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

SPECIAL NOTICE TO READERS

To Subscribers:

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please cooperate by renewing your current subscription on receipt of the first notice of expiration.

To Newsstand Readers:

The only certain way of getting The Nation regularly is to enter a subscription. By doing so you will not only insure prompt receipt of your copy, but you will make a considerable saving in money over the newsstand price.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

2-2-40

The NATION

and both beside a report from the New Yorker. (And why not? For that magazine's correspondence in Britain and France has been far more useful than the high-pressure stuff of Life and Time). But, good value as this book is, the prospective buyer should be warned that it is to be published by Pocket Books at one-twelfth of the present price.

RALPH BATES

VERSE CHRONICLE

THE BURNING-GLASS. By Walter de la Mare. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THERE are several beautiful poems in "The Burning Glass"; it is a book which will interest and occasionally delight a reader of any generosity or imagination. It will not satisfy his ideas of what poetry should be, unless his ideas are deplorable ones; but how many poems will? It is important for us to realize that many of the values of good poetry are irreconcilable: if some good poems have a tough reasonableness underneath the slight lyric grace—as the Stagirate says—a great many have a tender unreasonableness. In the old days I should have suggested borrowing a few nuclear physicists to persuade us that it is possible and profitable to use one set of hypotheses on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, and another set the rest of the week; but today it would be like borrowing the murderer from "Macbeth"—one could not listen for trembling. Academic critics will overrate De la Mare's book because he writes the "right" sort of poetry—that is, romantic and traditional; modernist critics will underrate it because he writes the "wrong" sort. I should say that he sometimes writes poetry that is good of its kind, and that this is the only sort of good poetry there is: there is none that is good of all the kinds, and there is no kind superior to all the rest—though some sort of rough, caeteris paribus valuing of the kinds is possible.

De la Mare comes so late in the development of romanticism that though he still believes in the romantic's world he believes in it helplessly and hopelessly, as a long and necessarily, though perhaps not "really," lost cause. For its sweet ghost—a specter that is haunting the industrial and scientific world that has destroyed it—he feels a nostalgic, rapt despair. Restrained by considerations neither of expediency nor of possibility, his romantic doctrines have become extraordinarily characteristic and extravagant: the forlorn hope is always the purest hope. Yet he grieves not so much over what has happened to everybody as over what must necessarily happen to anybody: over Man and the Present and what Is, these terrible crippling actualizations of the Child and the Past and what Might Have Been. This world of potentiality that he loves and needs is the world of the child as it seems to the grown-up. What we are is made bearable for him only by his knowledge that we once were potentially—hence, were—everything that we are not; and dreams and myths and tales, everything else that would be except for the fact that it isn't, are a similar consolation. To him the ordinary rational or practical life resembles the mechanical and rationalized routine, the hysterical anaesthesia of the hypnotized subject:

what is real lies above (God, Beauty) or under (dreams, animals, children) or around (ghosts, all the beings of myth or Märchen). It is children and animals and the heart ("which with a deeper life doth beat/Than any wherein thought hath part") that participate in reality: the blinkers of reason confine our conscious, systematic knowledge to what is unimportant or irrelevant. Yet De la Mare's Heart not only has its reasons but does a surprising amount of reasoning with them; and its sentences are grammatical and full of semicolons. He does not share the characteristic superstition of much modern opinion: that generalization or "statement" has no place in poetry.

De la Mare's world is neither the best nor the worst but the most enchanted of all possible worlds. If reality is not what we would like it to be, it is nevertheless what we feel it to be: to be is to be felt. In the "clear, grave, dark" universe of these poems Falstaff and a ghost are ontologically equal, and both of them are ontologically superior to you, reader, unless you appeal to De la Mare a good deal more than there is any reason to suppose you do. Unfortunately this criterion is a thoroughly accidental one; if De la Mare happened to develop a taste for science a whole new category of reality would suddenly come into being. The images he treats everything in terms of, the choir and furniture of his world, demonstrate beyond question what is Real to him: dreams; intuition; emotions, perceptions—any quality or essence common sympathetically and valued intrinsically; the more appealing universals (Beauty or Truth is real to him, entropy or triangularity isn't); the supernatural—everything from elves and Ariel to those powers or deities with which the natural world is haunted; nature, especially moonlight, the stars, clouds, trees, the pleasanter and better-known animals, flowers, the sea, and such; and children. A child asleep is for De la Mare the archetype of all knowledge: the delicate and secure innocence of the child's face mirrors a knowledge beyond any wisdom, "maps secrets stranger than the seas". In hieroglyphics more austere, And older far than Rameses'." (It is odd that this judgment is never extended to puppies or kittens, which have the same wonderful look.) If we happened to be oviparous, and our children looked like young owls or robins, this idea would hardly have occurred to De la Mare. But such an extension to the universe itself of a principle derived from one contingent, infinitesimal segment of that universe is too common for its recognition to involve much blame.

De la Mare uses delicately and sometimes magically the ordinary vocabulary of the romantic poets ("lorn as curlew's in the hush/Of dewfall. . ."); but he has a feeling for terse, homely, concrete phrasing that is not ordinary, and a surprising Hardyish willingness to use awkward and ineffective abstractions because he spontaneously thinks of a subject in those terms. He uses the most flagrant poetic diction, half for old-fashioned manners and half for love: he seems to share the Collegiate Dictionary's fighting belief that a poem is "a composition in verse, characterized by imagination and poetic diction." Similarly he thinks the gaudiest trappings of Elizabethan tragedy intrinsically valuable, and his fervidly romantic and dramatic speeches in blank verse are interestingly close to those of Kipling's mock-Elizabethan play. (His poems are about part of the pre-1941 world, not our own—

NATION READERS

are cordially invited to the
ANNUAL CONFERENCE, I.L.D.
HOTEL COMMODORE, N. Y. City • FEBRUARY 8-9, 1946 Conference Luncheon on

THE ROLE OF LABOR AND PROGRESSIVES IN THE ATOMIC AGE

SATURDAY NOON, FEBRUARY 9, 12:30

Speakers:

M. J. COLDWELL, M. P., President C.C.F. of Canada; STUART CHASE, Economist; JAMES B. CAREY, Secretary, C.I.O.; MARJORIE D. SPIKES, British Educator; CHARLES S. ZIMMERMAN, Vice-President, I.L.G.W.U.

TICKETS, $3.75

ROUND TABLE DISCUSSIONS: Friday evening, "Progressives and the Social Order"; Saturday, 10 A.M.: "Political Action"; Saturday, 8:15 P.M., "Trade Union Policy"; "International Policy," participated in by a distinguished group of 36 experts. Admission to Panel Discussions, 50¢ each.

Write for Program to Harry W. Laidler

League for Industrial Democracy

112 East Nineteenth Street

New York 3, N. Y.

National Urban League Guild's

Sixth Annual Beaux Arts Ball

Savoy Ballroom, Lenox Avenue at 140th Street

FRIDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 8, 1945

Alan Courtney of Station WOR, Master of Ceremonies

Lucky Millinder and His Orchestra

Three $50.00 Prizes for Most Original, Most Humorous, Most Unique Costumes

Come in Costume and be judged by

ROMARE BEARDEN MIGUEL COVARRUBIAS
KATHRYN DUNHAM NORA HOLT LOIS TIDDEN

For the Benefit of the National Urban League
(for Social Service Among Negroes)

Advance Subscription $1.25 (incl. tax) • Tickets at Door $1.50

Reservations: Phone Miss King, Chelsea 3-1838

You may again buy BOOKS through The Nation

Because of government restrictions on wrapping material, book publishers, for the past two years have refused to accept orders for less than five books. For this reason The Nation was obliged temporarily to discontinue its Readers' Service Department.

Now that these restrictions have been dropped Nation readers can again avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, postfree if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

The Readers' Service Division

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
85th ST.
86th ST.
WEST LEX.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERBIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO

NOW

"Engrossing Melodrama" — N. Y. Times

"Highly Recommended" — N. Y. Herald Tribune

CHARLES

LAUREN

BOYER • BACALL

— In —

'CONFIDENTIAL AGENT'

— With —

KATINA PATINOX • PETER LORRE

Adapted from GRAHAM GREENE'S novel

— And —

'LOVE, HONOR AND GOODBYE'

VIRGINIA BRUCE • EDWARD ASHLEY

"EXCITING FILM"

— N. Y. Times

"A CORKER"

— N. Y. Sun

RENE CLAIR'S

'AND THEN THERE WERE NONE'

AGATHA CHRISTIE'S Masterpiece of Suspense

Starring

Barry Fitzgerald • HUSTON • Louis Hayward

— And —

WALT DISNEY'S

THE WONDERFUL ADVENTURES OF PINOCCHIO

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

Queens
Kelt's
FLUSHING
Kelt's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL

B. G. DeSylva presents
BETTY HUTTON in
"THE STORK CLUB"

— with —

BARRY FITZGERALD
DON DE FORE

Robert Benchley • Bill Goodwin
Iris Adrian • Mikhail Rasumny
Mary Young

and introducing ANDY RUSSELL
Midnight Feature Nightly

In Person
WOODY HERMAN
and his ORCHESTRA
— featuring —
FRANCES WAYNE

— plus —
DOROTHY KELLER

Extra added attraction
BUDDY LESTER

Don Baker at the Organ

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT

TIMES SQUARE

MIDWINTER BOOK NUMBER

ISSUE OF FEBRUARY 23

Publishers wishing to utilize the special advantages offered by this feature issue for advertising of better books are urged to make space reservations as soon as possible. Deadlines: for space reservations, February 8; for final OK's or complete plates, February 14. Publisher's advertising rate, $200 per page. For information, Phone Barclay 7-1066 or write

ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

though there is something prescient in their gloom.) When he writes in the grand manner it is with a certain innocence, as children act out an execution; he is genuinely unassuming, a mouse in a corner, and never thinks to tell you, as better but vainer poets do: "Now I am going to be humble."

It is easy to complain that De la Mare writes about unreality; but how can anybody write about unreality? From his children and ghosts, ideal as they are, one learns little about children and nothing about ghosts; but one learns a great deal of the reality of which both are projections, of the wishes and lacks and love that have produced their "unreality." (We read religious poems not to learn about God but to learn about people.) At the very least De la Mare is a perspective of reality, a way of sight, that satisfies the limitations he and his readers share, and that exposes to his readers the limitations that are peculiar to De la Mare—or to themselves. He has made himself a fool for the sake of Faerie, for the sake of everything that is irrational, impractical, and at the same time essential; and because he has persisted in his folly his best poems—limited and extravagant as they are—are full of the personal distinction, the involuntary individuality that are marks of a real poet. But his poetry represents our world only as the flickering shade pattern of leaves upon an arm can represent the arm; the hard hot flesh in the sunlight has nothing to stand for it but vacancy.

RANDALL JARRELL

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents

MAURICE EVANS

In His New Production of Shakespeare's

HAMLET

Columbus Circle Thea. B'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thu. & Sat. 2:30

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by Music by
DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE B'way at 33rd St. Mats.: Sat. & Sun. Eves. Incl. Sun. 2:30 & 8:30

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, Times

Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
In JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

(from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account")
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4836
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp.

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Heller present

DEEP ARE THE ROOTS

A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW

Staged by ELIA KAZAN

FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings: 8:40, $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Matinees
Wednesday and Saturday, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

"A TREMENDOUS EVENING IN THE THEATRE!"—Morehouse, Sun
KERN AND HAMMERSTEIN'S

SHOW BOAT

Music by JEROME KERN • Book and Lyrics by OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd
Based on the novel by EDNA FERBER • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
ZIEGFELD THEA. 64th Street and Sixth Avenue. CI 5-5200
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

IF IT were not for the classics, ancient and modern, this would be in the theater a very dismal season indeed. Last week it was Molière who alone seemed worth talking about, and next week I hope to say something about the admirable revival of "Pygmalion" offered by the recently formed Theater Incorporated. At the present moment, however, I am too full of the Guild's new production of "The Winter's Tale" (Cort Theater) to think of anything else, and I must announce without further ado that I found it one of the most rewarding performances of Shakespeare I have ever had the good fortune to see.

"Hamlets" good, bad, or indifferent come and go. The very best of them are really always something less than adequate in the simple sense that, however excellent they may be in one respect or another, they never completely realize the whole which any competent reader more or less clearly divines in the text itself. "The Winter's Tale," on the other hand, is not a play whose greatness is self-evident. I confess, indeed, that I had never previously known just how to take it, and consequently I never read it through to the end without a certain embarrassment, without a private admission that, for all the justly famous passages, it seemed as a whole an astonishingly feeble performance to come from the pen of the greatest writer the world has ever known. Those responsible for the present production have, miraculously, found just that "way to take it" which eludes most readers, and the result, so far as I am concerned, is one for which "revelation" is the only adequate word.

On the program B. Iden Payne and Romney Brent are credited jointly with the direction. I have no way of knowing who is chiefly responsible for the general conception of the production, but actors and designer alike have been somehow led to achieve a unified style which successfully interprets a highly unusual dramatic intention to an audience completely unprepared by habit or tendency to understand or appreciate anything remotely resembling what Shakespeare has offered them. The superficial aspects of the style are easy enough to describe. Everything from Stuart Chaney's brightly beautiful costumes and graceful conventionalized settings through the sometimes stately and sometimes prankish performance of a very unusually competent company creates a story-book world to which the criteria employed in everyday life are obviously irrelevant. But what seemed like a similar method was employed in the Helen Hayes production of "Twelfth Night" with no more than merely pleasant results, whereas here the effect is to release from Shakespeare's play a beauty whose very existence I confess I had never more than glimpsed.

Moreover, and despite the often deprecated change in tone and the sixteen-year lapse of time between the two halves of the play, the effect is overwhelmingly cumulative. One begins, as the first scene unfolds, to accept with a willing suspension of disbelief the childlike tale of a king who so unreasonably suspected his impossibly pure and impossibly long-suffering wife; but before one can be aware of what has happened the voluntary credence has become involuntary and one can no

Order by Mail to Get the New,
Hard-Hitting PM Feature

FIGURELLO H. LaGUARDIA

The most provocative new columnist whose weekly articles are as militant and yet as warmly human as his famed radio broadcasts. LaGuardia writes every week for PM SUNDAY EDITION.

Fill out and mail this coupon with check or money order (no cash please) and make sure of mail delivery direct to your door . . . of PM, with the weekly column that is already the talk of the nation.

Extend My Subscription ☐

Enter My Subscription ☐

Name
(Please print)

Street State
(City and Postal Zone)

1 Year

6 Months

Daily and Sunday . . . $16.00 ☐ Daily and Sunday . . . $8.25 ☐

Sunday Only $ 4.90 ☐ Sunday Only $2.50 ☐

Mail to PM, Box 81, Times Square, New York City. These rates apply only to U. S. A. and Possessions. Subscriptions accepted for mailing only outside of New York City.
(Na-LaG)

longer choose but hear. In all literature there is probably no scene more utterly preposterous by the standards of realism than that concluding one in which the statue of Hermione reveals itself to be not a statue but Hermione herself, emerging at last from sixteen years of hiding in a cottage on the palace grounds. But at least two spectators, I know, watched the revelation and the recognition with breathless interest and wept to find everything turning out so precisely as it should. No spectacle is more touching than the spectacle of happiness, and when this particular journey ends in lovers' meetings the representation of so much joy is almost intolerable, affecting one like the triumphant conclusion of a great symphony whose logic and credibility have their existence in a realm equally far removed from that of everyday life. It is perhaps ungracious to do no more than mention the performances of Romney Brent, Jessie Royce Landis, Florence Reed, Henry Daniell, and the rest, but this is one of those rather rare occasions when it is the whole of which one is most aware.

Critics have not usually been at their best in dealing with the plays of Shakespeare's "last period." What they have said about the "deeper wisdom" and "Godlike serenity" of "Cymbeline" and "The Tempest" and "The Winter's Tale" does not seem to illuminate much a mystery which is, to me at least, still almost completely inexplicable. But it does seem that an age in which few can be found naive enough to suppose that a painting is necessarily damned because it does not literally imitate some object would also be an age in which dramatic critics would not gravely point out, as more than one reviewer of "The Winter's Tale" did, that the jealousy of Leontes is "inadequately motivated." However remote the analogy may be, the seeming childishness of "The Winter's Tale" bears no more relation to actual childishness than a painting by Matisse bears to a child's sketch involving similar simplifications as well as similar distortions, and to say that the incident of the statue coming to life is improbable is to be as acute as one would be to object that a chair by Matisse is out of perspective. Shakespeare sets himself to consider certain realities called "jealousy," "faithfulness," "young love," and the like. He makes of them a dramatic arrangement very much as a painter makes an arrangement of objects, and I confess that I have very little idea how he does it. But the effect is overwhelmingly beautiful, and the fact that he did not bother to motivate Leontes's jealousy or to make the reappearance of Hermione probable detracts in no way whatever from the final effect.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

ANOTHER important event which evening of ballet put on by the National Orchestral Association in association with the School of American Ballet. The program consisted chiefly of new works created for the occasion by Balanchine—created for only this one performance of students, but by the same process as the works for professional companies, by the exercise of nothing less than the full measure of Balanchine's great powers, their interaction with the particular music, their operation through the particular capacities of the dancers, with results which, like other works of Balanchine, were astoundingly and excitingly new and beautiful. One of them, to Mozart's Sinfonie Concertante K. 364, provided a striking illustration of something that I pointed out last fall—that in Balanchine's ballets, as in Mozart's concertos, the mind, the language and style, the formula are always the same, but the completed forms are constantly new. Over and over again Balanchine has used the formula of the Adagio of ballerina supported by male dancer, and achieved each time something newly and wonderfully imagined; and here, with the slow movement of the Sinfonie Concertante, was still another such Adagio, different again and wonderful. And on the other hand, to an Elegy of Stravinsky Balanchine created an extraordinary duet—a powerful slow intertwining of two dancers in a "modern" style that I could not recall his having used before—which was, in effect, his way of saying to the "modern" dancers: "I can do it better than you."

Again there was occasion for me to admire Leon Barzin's competence as a conductor and excellence as a musician, and to reflect sadly on the situation in which they continue to be used in the training of players for positions in great orchestras that are conducted by his inferiors.

I didn't see the 1927 production of "Show Boat"; but I have been hearing its great songs ever since; and their appearance in incredible succession provided much of the pleasure I got from the new production. They were excellently sung too by Carol Bruce (Julie), Charles Fredericks (Ravenal), and Kenneth Spencer (Joe), but not by Jan Clayton (Magnolia), whose thin, sharp, tremulous soprano was not agreeable to listen to, and whose appearance and acting were uncomfortable to watch. Other things I enjoyed were Buddy Ebsen's comic drolleries, the period stage-dances devised by Tamiris for the white dancers of the cast, the settings by Howard Bay, costumes of Lucinda Ballard, and staging of the work by Hassard Short. And other things that made me uncomfortable were the arty dances of the Negro dancers of the cast, including the excessively coy Pearl Primus; and almost everything—characters, story, humor—contributed by the book.

A reader informs me that he did listen to the forum and quiz during the intermissions of the broadcast of "Rigoletto," and that I would have been surprised if I had listened. "Not that you would have found that the discussion of the subject of opera in English said anything or got anywhere. What would have surprised you was the viciousness that clothed itself in the observances of surface politeness. The participants complimented and deferred to each other as they tried to catch each other in mistakes, to show each other up, to press a knife into each other's ribs. They did the same thing in the quiz, which may have been frolicsome when you heard it, but was a nasty performance this time." Possibly I would have been surprised by all this; certainly I would have wondered that it should be considered relevant to a performance of "Rigoletto."

From the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe announcement of its coming New York season I learn with joy that "Le Baiser de la fée" is to be restored to the repertory. This is one of the great dramatic ballets that Balanchine produced a number of years ago, filled with the fascinating strokes of imagination that someone once referred to as "fantaisie Balanchine." I am still hoping to see the others again: "Concurrence," "Cotillon," "The Prodigal Son," "The Ball."

There will also be a new work by Balanchine—"Night Shadow." And a praiseworthy artistic gesture is the production of one of the three-act classical works that Petitpas created for the imperial Russian stage—"Raymonda," which will be recreated in its original style by Balanchine and Danilova, both of whom appeared in it in Russia.

Letters to the Editors

Straus: Corroboration

Dear Sirs: Lest some readers be skeptical of Mr. Straus's article in The Nation of January 5, may I, as a member of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, add a few corroborating comments on These Men Block Housing. In a bulletin issued May 15, 1945, by the Columbus, Ohio, Real Estate Board, after a long and practically successful campaign against public housing for slum clearance and a successful campaign against government war housing, this statement was printed: "John and Willard made a trip to Washington, where they were given assurance that no defense-housing project would be built in Columbus unless it was evident that private enterprise could not cope with the emergency, and then only after consultation with officials of your board." Columbus had a housing shortage then—war industries called for housing. However, thanks to this restrictive activity, our shortage increased to such a degree that it now calls for comprehensive federal treatment along the lines Mr. Straus suggests.

Mr. Straus puts his finger on the chicanery going on around housing at the national level when he points out that few G. I.'s can buy or afford $10,000 homes. The great demand, the great need, in Columbus as elsewhere in the nation is for homes renting up to $35 or $40 a month, and homes for sale at $3,000 to $6,000. Setting $10,000 as the ceiling means simply the continuation, and the extension, with government approval, of the "trickle-down home-building system."

With reference to the powerful lobby of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, perhaps your readers will be surprised to learn that membership in this organization is no longer limited to the real-estate field. For the last several years the membership doors have been thrown wide open to all comers; filling-station operators, chain-store operators, automobile dealers, tire dealers, newspapers, printers, real-estate speculators, owners of large property holdings, savings and loan institutions, banks, and what have you, now compose the group.

I feel that private enterprise in Columbus can, if it will, provide housing at the $50 a month level. Private building here levels off at around a $30-monthly (shelter) rent. It cannot and it does not supply housing at lower levels. Here, as Mr. Straus states, the answer indisputably is public housing.

Finally, not one urban redevelopment scheme, federal or state, has the important price-limit safeguard suggested by Mr. Straus. Unless this type of legislation is to become a speculator's dream, the land-price limitation and other equally important safeguards must be included. It is sincerely to be hoped that his suggestion in this direction is accepted by Congress.

HENRY E. WORLEY

Columbus, Ohio, January 24

Straus: a Challenge

Dear Sirs: Nathan Straus's article entitled These Men Block Housing was excellent in many respects. My basic criticism of the article is that while the Congressional attitudes portrayed were absolutely accurate in 1939 and 1940, I doubt very much if they are fully correct today. Mr. Straus's specific recommendations are a challenge to those who are attempting to think through a national housing program at this time. No one could disagree with his objectives, no matter how difficult they would be of accomplishment.

LEE F. JOHNSON,

Executive Vice-President,

National Public Housing Conference
Washington, January 12

Straus: a Genuine Service

Dear Sirs: I read with a great deal of interest the article by Nathan Straus, former USHA Administrator, in the January 5 issue of The Nation. I believe that Mr. Straus, while undoubtedly perfectly sincere, sees certain shadows in the dark which have been magnified in this article. It is and always has been my personal belief that there is no basic conflict between public housing and private enterprise. Mr. Straus in his article not only indicates that there is such a conflict but actually proposes a very definite entrance into the field normally belonging to private endeavor by the public-housing authorities.

It has been my observation that the barrage issued by the private building interests against public housers is primarily the propaganda of the "high command" only, the lobbies of the N. H. B. A. and the N. A. R. E. B. It is my feeling, after discussing the matter with numerous people in real estate and the home-building trades, that they echo the statements of the powerful lobby without rationalizing the statements or subscribing to the points of view expressed. When you sit down to talk with them in a friendly rational fashion you find that they are usually in general agreement with the aims of public housing, and they frequently end up by indicating their support and assistance.

I think Mr. Straus has done a genuine service in presenting the situation as vigorously as he has. However, the figures quoted on the number of dwellings needed in the various rental ranges are, I believe, open to question. Administrator Blandford and Commissioner Klutznick have indicated the present need as totaling 5,000,000 houses with 12,600,000 units in the next decade. Mr. Straus's statement, too, that only public housing can provide healthful, livable homes within the means of people able to pay from $20 to $50 a month in rent is, I believe, not altogether accurate. The public-housing program today is geared to provide accommodations for $10 to $30 per month or at the most $20 to $40. People able to pay above $40 are very definitely within the field of private enterprise.

Mr. Straus's proposal for a Congressional appropriation of $200,000,000 for grants to communities for the purchase of housing sites is an interesting one and deserves considerable study.

In closing I feel that, despite my lack of total agreement with Mr. Straus's statement, he has performed a genuine service in focusing attention on two vital phases of the present housing crisis—the matter of the clearance of slums and the provision of veterans' housing. For these, I believe he is entitled to our gratitude.

FREDERIC A. FAY,

Ass't Executive Director, Housing
Authority of the City of Portsmouth
Portsmouth, Va., January 16

Your Help Is Needed

Dear Sirs: In the December 22 issue of The Nation, I notice that you have listed organizations which are collecting clothing to send to various parts of the world for war victims. This is, it seems to me, a splendid way of indi-

Crossword Puzzle No. 146

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Mirth-provokers with a light touch
- 5 If you wish to wound these Celts, call them this
- 10 Lora, somewhat deranged, embraces a pal in an Italian seaport
- 11 Evidently not the hero in Goldsmith's The Good-natured Man
- 12 This Egyptian peasant sounds like a regular guy
- 14 Suave as Uriah Heep
- 16 The Mississippi or the Amazon, perhaps, in their very early youth
- 17 Elusive when uncollared
- 18 Eyesore that is better curtailed
- 20 An omission from this bit of harness would be one way to cause trouble
- 22 What Julius Caesar said when Brutus stabbed him?
- 24 Looks like the devil, doesn't it?
- 26 "Hark! to the hurried question of -----: 'Where is my child?' An echo answers, 'Where?'"
- 29 The whole crowd, not excluding Kit
- 30 Unwilling to contribute anything to poetry
- 32 May hold you up on the highway
- 33 Praps in the kitchen garden
- 34 A musician I boost
- 35 English king—the Unready one

DOWN

- 1 A commendable virtue—in an ancestor
- 2 No friend of Montague, in the Shakespearean tragedy
- 3 These followers of Wycliffe seem to have been all lords

- 4 Such unrestrained indulgence is nonsense when I am out of it
- 6 You can't see much more of these Yugoslavians than their jackets
- 7 Delete (two words, 4 & 8)
- 8 An ass among the hares
- 9 You should be able to get this small cake in this Scots town
- 13 Got a move on
- 14 Strip of clothing
- 15 Heroine and title of a wartime film paid thus
- 19 A pretty conceit
- 21 It would be contrary if a poet were
- 23 Don Q.'s Rozinante was a sorry specimen of one
- 25 Would he want to hold an inquest on every bridge hand?
- 26 "Our ----- are traitors, And make us lose the good we oft might win By fearing to attempt"
- 27 Innuendoes
- 28 Heed Pa (anag.)
- 31 "Out, damned ---- I out, I say"

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 145

ACROSS:—1 SHRAPNEL; 5 NEWTON; 10 DUELIST; 11 LOITERS; 12 ETUI; 13 CRASH; 16 LOVE; 17 CATSPAW; 19 ENDOR; 20 PEG-LEG; 22 VANILLA; 23 EMBLEM; 25 EVICT; 27 RED NOSE; 31 MILL; 32 LISTS; 33 ONCE; 36 NUTURE; 37 ORIGINS; 38 SINGLE; 39 HEAR! HEAR!

DOWN:—1 SYDNEY; 2 RAEBURN; 3 PHIZ; 4 EXTORT; 6 EREN; 7 TREFOIL; 8 NEST-EGGS; 9 CLASP; 13 CARAMEL; 14 ASSIGNS; 16 HAPPENS; 17 COVER; 18 WEAVE; 21 TERMINUS; 24 BULL RUN; 26 CANDIDE; 28 DIVED; 29 OTIOSE; 30 GEYSER; 34 GULL; 35 LIAR.

cating to your readers something concrete that every individual can do to help.

I was disappointed, however, to see that the Unitarian Service Committee was not among the organizations listed. For over a year now we have been conducting a vigorous campaign for used clothing. Nearly every month, and sometimes twice a month, shipments of clothing are leaving New York. Most of the clothing has gone to France, but some of it has been sent to Czechoslovakia and Holland as well. Just now we are preparing shipments for Austria and Hungary, and all contributions are welcome. HOWARD L. BROOKS
Boston, Mass., December 27

[The Nation regrets that the Unitarian Service Committee was omitted from the pre-Christmas list, and heartily indorses its appeal.]

Brady Did It

Dear Sirs: In his column of January 12 Joseph Wood Krutch was juggling with theatrical history in crediting the Theater Guild with the production of Elmer Rice's play, "Street Scene." I am sure the record will show that it was produced by William A. Brady.

JACOB WILK

New York, January 15

Look It Up!

Dear Sirs: Our newspapers are full of talk these days about decentralization of our cities. Apart from any consideration of the atom bomb, it seems to me this is desirable, and I am moved to call the attention of your readers to a book published thirty-five years ago, "Road-town," by Edgar Chambless.

The author's plan was to build what might be described as a skyscraper laid on its side and extending 1,000 miles or so, with a noiseless road and promenade on top and a noiseless railroad underground beneath the structure. There would be a large number of individual homes as in a city block, and there would be unlimited country when you stepped outside your door. Heat, light, hot and cold water, and telephone would be obtained by pressing a button.

The idea was far ahead of its time, and now might be the occasion to revive it. At the time I called it the most constructive city-planning idea ever published, and that opinion still stands. Look it up!

UPTON SINCLAIR

Monrovia, Cal., January 15

A Request for
The Suspension of ARGENTINA
from
The United Nations

Memorandum Submitted to
The General Assembly of The United Nations by
The Nation Associates

Reprinted as a Special Section of

THE Nation

FEBRUARY 2, 1946

IN TWO PARTS: PART TWO

THE outside world has had little official news from Argentina since June 4, 1943, when a band of army officers headed by Edelmiro Farrell and Juan Perón overthrew the legal government and seized power by armed force. But American newspapermen in Buenos Aires have succeeded, despite intermittent censorship and covert and open threats of reprisals, in giving the people of the United States a fairly comprehensive picture of the Nazi-fascist regime that rules Argentina. Together with statements made by our own government, their first-hand observations constitute a damning indictment of an Axis satellite that has violated every pledge made when it signed the Chapultepec Agreement and was admitted to the United Nations Organization. On the basis of these reports The Nation Associates has compiled the memorandum which follows. It has been submitted to Paul Henri Spaak, president of the United Nations Assembly now meeting in London, and to the leading delegations. Copies have also been sent to the President of the United States and to the State Department.

A PROPOSAL FOR ACTION BY THE UNITED NATIONS

ON MARCH 27, 1945, the Farrell-Perón regime of Argentina declared war on Japan and Germany. On April 4, 1945, it signed the Act of Chapultepec incorporating the agreements of the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace.

Thus it fulfilled two conditions precedent to its admission to the United Nations Conference at San Francisco.

The first condition was laid down by the inviting powers; the second by the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace, which met early in March in Mexico.

On April 30, 1945, acting on the initiative of the American delegation and backed unanimously by the Latin American republics, the San Francisco conference voted to seat Argentina.

On September 8, 1945, the Farrell-Perón regime formally ratified the United Nations Charter.

On October 24, 1945, the United Nations Organization came into formal existence after fifty-one member nations had signed and filed their ratifications.

The first session of the General Assembly of the United Nations is now in progress in London. Its purpose is to establish the machinery, and initiate the acts through which the principles of the United Nations Charter may be implemented.

Article I of the charter provides that the initial function of the United Nations "is to maintain international peace and security."

In the interests of international peace and security, we propose that the General Assembly initiate action to suspend Argentina from membership in the United Nations Organization.

This action is proposed on the score that:

1. The present regime in Argentina is a totalitarian government which has persistently and deliberately violated all obligations assumed under the United Nations Charter and the Chapultepec Agreement.

2. That its purpose is aggression.

When the representatives of the Perón-Farrell regime were admitted to the United Nations Conference at San Francisco in April, 1945, no one was under any illusion about the character of the regime. It was known to be a military dictatorship, totalitarian in form and method. It was known that many Axis agents and much Axis wealth were finding a haven in Argentina.

The military dictatorship which Colonel Perón controls made its first bid for power when the government of President Castillo was overthrown by a military coup in June, 1943.

In February, 1944, one month after the government of General Ramirez had announced a break of relations with Germany and Japan in accordance with the Rio de Janeiro agreement of 1942, power was seized by General Edelmiro

J. Farrell and Colonel Juan D. Perón. According to a Bulletin of the United States State Department issued on July 26, 1944, extremist pro-Axis elements forced the change in government. The Farrell-Perón regime refused to implement the break with the Axis. Instead, Axis agents and spies arrested by the Ramirez regime were released, and affirmative assistance was given to Axis business concerns both through large government contracts and through the requisitioning of materials from firms friendly to the democratic cause.

Pro-Axis newspapers enjoyed official support and assistance in obtaining newsprint, and carried on a bitter propaganda campaign against the United Nations and for the Axis.

These charges are made officially by the State Department of the United States. As a result of Argentina's acts the United States and all Latin American republics withdrew diplomatic recognition from the Farrell-Perón regime in 1944.

On January 11, 1945, another State Department Bulletin declared:

Argentina is being used as a base for intensive Axis subversive activities directed against the American continent and the United Nations. . . . Axis diplomatic officials were flagrantly abusing the principles between civilized nations. . . . These diplomats had organized and were directing, financing, and coordinating the activities of different groups or cells of agents, and it was also shown that diplomatic channels were being used for the transmission of information to the High Command in Berlin.

Although Argentina was not present at the Chapultepec conference, every effort was made to secure its subsequent agreement to the proposals accepted there. When, on March 27, Argentina finally grudgingly declared war, it was notable that the declaration was made first against Japan, and second against Nazi Germany, on the ground that Germany was an ally of Japan.

When, on April 4, the Farrell-Perón regime signed the Chapultepec Agreement it was hoped that at long last hemispheric solidarity might be achieved. On the basis of this hope, and in the belief that in exchange for membership in the victorious United Nations the Argentine government would adhere to its pledge, the United States delegation at San Francisco took the initiative in urging and obtaining the admission of Argentina to the United Nations on April 30, 1945.

Nine months have now passed since the San Francisco conference. During this period Germany has been defeated in Europe and Japan in the Far East. During this period, too, the Farrell-Perón regime has become an outright totalitarian government, fashioned in the image of Nazi Germany with Perón the undisputed dictator. Deliberately and brazenly it has violated the Agreement of Chapultepec and the United Nations Charter.

The entire country is being mobilized for war; more than 50 per cent of the national budget has been allocated to military purposes.

Children of both sexes, from the age of twelve on, are subject to military training.

Civil liberties have been suppressed.

Education has been regimented.

The democratic press has been intimidated or destroyed.

Freedom of labor has been destroyed, and important labor unions have been converted into puppet organizations.

More recently the Perón regime, adopting the scapegoat strategy of the Nazis, has made anti-Semitism an integral part of its program.

A police Gestapo under the direction of Perón and his satellites now supplements the army. The concentration camp and the torture chamber have become everyday instruments of internal control.

While the population of Argentina is suffering cruel oppression and the denial of fundamental freedoms, important Nazi agents continue to find protection, and Axis business and Axis schools flourish.

Following the pattern of his Nazi masters, Perón is now planning to obtain so-called "legal" sanction for his totalitarian rule by a presidential election scheduled to be held on February 24, 1946. The outcome of this election can be forecast today. The democratic parties are making a courageous and united stand against Perón's candidacy, but the government controls the police, the military, and the electoral machinery.

THE NAZI-FASCIST PATTERN

AT NUERNBERG an Allied tribunal is conducting the trial as war criminals of leaders of the Nazi Party and their military satellites. The principal charges against them are crimes against humanity and crimes against the peace. The indictment presented by Presiding Judge Robert H. Jackson emphasizes that the first act of the Nazi Party was to acquire totalitarian control of Germany in order to carry out its objectives.

In the following pages we present evidence of the extent to which the Perón regime, patterning its acts after the Nazi model, has already gone in its preparations for war and in the furtherance of its totalitarian aims.

Preparations for War

The philosophical basis for the war policy of the Perón government was set forth in June, 1944, by Colonel Perón himself in a speech at La Plata University, in which he stated that "war is an inevitable social phenomenon," and that "all other activities must be subordinated to the purpose of national defense—not simply by the armed forces of the nation, but through the subordination of all government departments, private institutions, and the entire people." He continued:

Throughout the ages there have lived philosophers—and I will not hesitate to call them Utopians—who have stated that it is possible to avoid war. Always within a short space of time some new conflagration has broken out to disprove this theory. . . .

The concept of "the nation in arms" or "total war" which was expounded by Marshal von der Goltz in 1883 is in a certain sense the most modern theory of national defense by which nations direct in time of peace as in time of war every living force within the state in order to attain a political objective. . . .

It is essential that all the intellectuals of our nation, whatever may be their particular field, should study and understand war, realizing it to be the only means of solving a situation we may be called upon to face, should God one day decide that war must reach the borders of our country. . . .

If diplomacy is unable to procure the desired political objectives, then it is imperative to be prepared to do so by force, whenever the situation compels the use of such extreme methods. . . .

He then summarized as follows the points he had made:

1. War is an inevitable social phenomenon.
2. All so-called peaceful nations, and among them our own, if they desire peace must prepare themselves for war.
3. The problem of national defense of the Fatherland is one to which all activities must be subordinated. National defense cannot be improvised at the moment that war is at our door, but requires many years of constant and conscientious preparation. It cannot be regarded as a problem for the armed forces only, but must be established through the harmonious integrated work of the different government agencies, private institutions, and all the people of Argentina, whatever may be their particular sphere of work. National defense gives rise to such enormous problems requiring profound professional knowledge that no single person can be absolved from taking part. Finally, whatever demands it may make on us represent contributions to the glory of our nation and the happiness of our people.

In line with this position, on November 17, 1944, a new organic Law of the Army was announced compelling all Argentine citizens to prepare for the defense of their country. While conscription for active military duty applies only to males, girls and women are to be prepared for service in the army in various women's auxiliary corps. Military training for men falls into three periods—pre-conscription, conscription, and post-conscription. Pre-conscription begins at the age of twelve and continues until the age of twenty, when conscription starts for a maximum of two years. Upon their discharge all males are subject to post-conscription until the age of fifty.

During the year 1945 the military budget of the Argentine government was five times as great as that of 1942, the year before the Perón-Farrell revolution. As the declaration of war against the Axis in April, 1945, a month before the cessation of hostilities in Europe, was purely symbolical, no legitimate justification for this huge increase in military expenditures can be offered. For the year 1946, presumably a year of peace, the Perón regime has passed appropriations for military expenditures approximating 50 per cent of its entire budget. This at a time when the national deficit is mounting and many other department budgets have been cut, notably the National Board of Education.

As a supplementary arm, a nation-wide secret service and police force of over 30,000 has been established in the past year, with functions parallel to those of the Gestapo and Storm Troops in Nazi Germany.

The neighboring republics of Chili and Uruguay live in constant fear of acts of aggression. Paraguay and Bolivia are already under the domination of Argentina.

"The size of the standing army has been increased, and military construction along Argentina's frontiers with Chili, Brazil, Bolivia, Paraguay, and Uruguay is greater than ever before. New barracks have been built in frontier areas, most of them by German companies which were on the Allied black list because of Nazi connections," according to Joseph Newman in the New York Herald Tribune of January 10, 1946.

On January 29, 1945, Gabriel Gonzalez, Chilean ambassador to Brazil, charged the Perón regime with having as its principal objective a war on the continent and warned that Chili would be its first victim.

In October of 1945, Dr. Juan Antonio Rios, President of Chili, during a visit to New York, corroborated the fears of the threat against Chili.

The government of the United States is presumed to have in its possession information concerning shipments of arms by the Perón regime into neighboring republics to "provoke revolutions" for the establishment of regimes favorable to the present Argentine government.

Indicating knowledge of the aggressive intentions of the Perón regime, Dean Acheson, as Acting Secretary of State of the United States, on October 4, 1945, announced: "In view of recent developments in Argentina, the United States government does not feel that it can properly negotiate or sign with the present Argentine regime a treaty of military assistance."

That this is still the attitude of the United States government was confirmed by Acting Secretary of State Acheson in a public statement on January 11, 1946.

The Totalitarian Character of the Regime and Its Methods of Terror

As far back as July 26, 1944, the State Department of the United States publicly characterized the Farrell-Perón regime as totalitarian. In a Bulletin issued that day the State Department declared:

The dominant power in Argentina was and continues to be in the hands of pro-Axis elements determined to impose their desires. Furthermore, it is significant that these same elements control the most important ministries and agencies of the national government, as well as the governments of the provinces, and have rapidly and energetically implanted a dominant totalitarian system that fully complements and supports their pro-Axis foreign policy through control of the press, the courts, and other key institutions. The basic civil rights have been either nullified or so modified as to have no real meaning. Every effort was made to stamp out democratic opposition to the government's totalitarian program.

The seizure of power by Perón on October 18, 1945, served only to advance the development of the totalitarian system in Argentina. How a program of repression and intimidation has been carried out in torture chambers by methods borrowed from the Nazis and applied by a Gestapo, trained by leading operatives of Himmler, was described by John White, one of the most informed writers on Latin America, in an article appearing in The Nation of March 3, 1945.

Declaring that the Gestapo's barbaric use of torture had been transplanted to the Western Hemisphere, Mr. White charged that soon after the Farrell-Perón regime came to power, Gestapo agents from Germany expanded a city detective bureau in Buenos Aires into a great national organization specializing in persecution and torture. "This organization," he said, "has set up concentration camps for political prisoners similar to those in Nazi Germany, tortured thousands of victims guilty of nothing more serious than belonging to labor unions or democratic political parties, killed or caused the death of hundreds of people bearing Jewish, Polish, or Russian names, and caused the disappearance of other hundreds."

In describing the techniques used, he said that diplomatic agents of United Nations governments had sent information corroborating the use of these techniques to their home governments:

The "electric spur" is the favorite instrument of the new school of native sadists who have been trained by Gestapo experts. It is a simple electric cable with several fine steel needles at the end. These electric needles are applied to the most sensitive parts of the naked body, such as the eyelids, the sexual organs, and the rectum. The torture usually is applied at two or more parts of the body simultaneously and has such terrific effect on the entire nervous system that it frequently produces insanity. In less extreme cases it paralyzes the muscles and causes great painful swellings and deep sores. It is persistently reported that at least five thousand people in Argentina have been tortured with the electric spur.

A simpler but equally effective method is to jab long hatpins through the testicles. Another frequent "treatment" subjects political prisoners, women as well as men, to a third degree in which their naked bodies are burned with lighted cigarettes in an effort to force them to answer questions the way the police want them answered.

The "cup" is a device in the form of a funnel which is pressed against the body and from which the air is then pumped out. The resulting vacuum causes a huge swelling inside the cup and draws the blood to the surface, leaving a large black-and-blue sore. This device is used on prisoners known to be suffering from heart ailments. When applied in the region of the heart it aggravates the affection and often causes death from "heart failure."

The "bucket" is a huge vat filled with urine and excrement. The prisoner who is given this "treatment" is hung by his feet from the ceiling and then lowered until his head is submerged in the contents of the vat. This particular technique has the attraction of producing two forms of torture at the same time—semi-drowning in filth, and congestion of the brain from the downward flow of the blood.

One form of torture makes use of a familiar office appliance. In many European and South American countries letters, contracts, and other business documents are written in copying ink and preserved in duplicate by being put between the pages of a "copybook" which is then squeezed between iron plates. The Argentine political police have found this office press a convenient method of smashing the fingers of prisoners who refuse to sign certain declarations.

The "slab" is a torture machine made of two huge sheets of steel. The victim is placed between the sheets, which are pressed together gradually until he suffers internal hemorrhages and vomits blood.

The "whip" and the "rod" have been seen in the movies. The long leather whip is usually dipped in water before the lashes are applied; the rod is made of fine steel bars that cut into the flesh like knives.

Professional boxers are employed to beat up certain prisoners since they know how to produce the desired effect without leaving telltale wounds.

One highly refined form of mental torture drives the prisoner almost to the point of insanity without actually causing any physical hurt. The victim usually is awakened at two or three o'clock in the morning and told that he is to be executed by a firing squad. He is then "taken for a ride" in an automobile, accompanied by two or three guards armed with rifles and obviously members of the firing squad. Finally he is stood against a wall and the firing squad is lined up, but at the last minute he is reprieved and taken back to his cell. . . .

Sometimes as a variation a prisoner who is to be released is "taken for a ride" in an automobile, accompanied by armed guards. When the automobile gets to a deserted region outside the city, the prisoner is told that he is at liberty. Being familiar with the famous ley de fuga by which prisoners are shot while supposedly trying to escape, he stands there afraid to move and under mental torture that may induce insanity.

La razzia is an importation from the Sicilian Black Hand societies and is used for intimidating the opposition, especially the working classes. Gangs of armed thugs terrorize entire neighborhoods by breaking into and wrecking houses and by storming meetings of associations and trade unions, beating up those present and destroying the furniture and fixtures on the pretext that the meeting is plotting against the government. Schools, libraries, and newspaper offices have been raided frequently, and on two occasions movie theaters in Buenos Aires were stormed while crowded with people.

Even when they are not tortured, political prisoners are demoralized and intimidated by being subjected to what is popularly known as el mal trato. Women of the working class, especially wives and daughters who have refused to testify against their husbands and fathers, are put into cells with prostitutes and women criminals. They are not permitted visits from their families or from a lawyer; nor can they receive decent food from outside the jail.

The mal trato is applied to men prisoners in even worse form. If they are ill they usually are sent to regions where it is certain that their illness will get worse. They are given very poor food or deprived for entire days of anything to eat or drink. They receive no medical attention and may be put into cells with criminals of the lowest order.

So many lawyers have been punished for defending political prisoners in Argentina that it is practically impossible now for prisoners to find lawyers, except the ones who occasionally are assigned as "defense lawyers" by the government.

Suppression of Civil Liberties

In the agreements reached at Chapultepec the American states:

1. Reiterate and fervently adhere to the democratic principles which they consider essential for the peace of America.
2. Declare that "the purpose of the state is the happiness of man in society; the interests of the community should be harmonized with the rights of the individual; the American man cannot conceive of living without justice just as he cannot conceive of living without liberty."
3. Proclaim "the adherence of the American republics to the principles established by international law for safeguarding the essential rights of man and declare their support of a system of international protection of these rights."

In possession of the military and backed by a police Gestapo and a civilian army of bureaucrats, the Perón regime since its admission to the United Nations Conference has proceeded systematically to destroy the rights of its own citizens, in defiance of elementary principles of human decency and in violation of its commitments under the Chapultepec Agreement and the United Nations Charter.

On May 3, 1945, the police deliberately charged and opened fire on unarmed citizens celebrating the fall of Berlin.

On August 15 similar assaults were committed by the police on persons celebrating the Japanese surrender.

On August 16 crowds of soldiers commanded by non-commissioned officers terrorized the center of the city, killed two citizens, and wounded many others. They laid siege to the building of the pro-democratic paper Crítica, which they attempted to set on fire. Cheering Hitler, Mussolini, and Perón and shouting "Death to the Jews," soldiers were permitted to commit their outrages without any interference from the police. Dr. Alberto M. Candiotti, former Argentine ambassador to Mexico, says that the rioting soldiers told him they were obeying "superior orders."

On August 18 Colonel Perón announced that civil war was the only solution to the situation existing in the Argentine. In an interview with Dr. Pedro Cue, director of the Cuban daily El Mundo, Perón declared: "I do not fear civil war because I am prepared for it. I have at my disposal 300,000 soldiers and 4,000,000 workers armed with clubs."

On September 27, 1945, there were wholesale arrests of prominent citizens guilty only of signing declarations in favor of freedom. Among them were editors of liberal papers, political leaders opposed to the Perón regime, and ordinary citizens who had expressed a belief in democracy. Perón himself went to the Buenos Aires jail to look over the prisoners. Included among those arrested were three of the six rectors of Argentina's national universities.

On October 7 the police charged a crowd near a cemetery paying homage to a nineteen-year-old student killed in a clash between university students and supporters of Perón. In a wholesale lockup 1,594 students were arrested, including 149 girls. The University of Buenos Aires was closed, its president and executive officers dismissed. Six professors were also taken into custody.

On October 21, 1945, Arnaldo Cortesi, writing in the New York Times, declared:

Argentina again is witnessing the shameful spectacle of citizens being obliged to find protection against their own government in foreign embassies. The Peruvian embassy, for instance, has taken in several persons, including former Federal Judge Ramón S. Vasquez who filed a complaint in court against the police for having tortured political prisoners. In the Uruguayan embassy, along with others, are former Foreign Minister José María Cantilo and the family of Rear Admiral Leonardo MacLean. . . . Several newspapers were attacked in various parts of Argentina, as were also some private homes, such as that of Dr. Alfredo Calcagno, rector of La Plata University. In some industrial districts of Avellaneda anyone who appeared in the streets wearing a tie was subject to assault. In Cordoba the offices of the Argentine North American Cultural Institute were stoned while police looked on without interfering.

On December 9 a mass-meeting of the Democratic Union (a coalition of four political parties, including the Radicals, Socialists, and Communists) comprising between 150,000 and 200,000 persons assembled to hear speakers urge the defeat of Perón in the presidential election. It was fired upon; and two persons were killed and sixty seriously injured. The shooting, according to the New York Herald Tribune of that date, was supposedly intended to stampede the throng and break up the meeting.

On December 19 Norah Pines reported in the New York Post:

Supporters of Colonel Perón were urged to release a wave of terrorism to insure his election, and if he lost to put the country on fire, in a speech by Dr. Federico Cantoni, political boss of San Juan Province and one of Perón's top advisers. Dr. Cantoni threatened that should Perón lose the elections, "we will paralyze the country with one strike after another as long as it is necessary to impose our will."

The extent to which the elementary rights of man have been subverted in the Argentine was described by Spruille Braden on August 29 in his farewell speech in Buenos Aires prior to his return to the United States. He declared:

One by one there appear all the elements used by fascism in its stupid stratagems since the day of the so-called March on Rome. Subversion and disorder organized by the government itself and using paid assassins under an honorable disguise, utilization of coercion by the state not to suppress but to protect subversion, bragging by the coward who attacks those he believes fallen but who humbles himself before the powerful, calculated and underhanded use of violent methods, cunning maneuvering showing false respect for established norms and launching an attack while hiding its origin, violation of the law of hospitality which forbids any treacherous attack on him who is sheltered under the same roof, practice of the so-called "tactics of confusion," . . . use of intimidation and threats against the precise persons whom that government was under obligation to protect and respect. . . .

On October 27, after his appointment as Assistant Secretary of State in charge of Latin American affairs, Mr. Braden said: "The Argentine regime is just as fascist as any which existed in Germany and Japan." And the following day, he amplified that statement by declaring:

The state of siege recently imposed on Argentina by Perón is the negation of that very Bill of Rights for the preservation of which we have fought this and other wars. In more concrete terms, a state of siege permits swaggering officers to beat any peaceful citizen because he refuses to hail the leader. It permits a hoodlum with brass knuckles to strike the face of a young girl because she cries "Long live democracy!" It permits arrests without charge; it permits saber-wielding mounted police to ride down men, women, and children.

In the city of Buenos Aires the normal police force of 8,000 to 9,000 has been increased to more than 30,000, and according to Police Commissioner Velasco, the men "would rather charge a crowd than eat." Campo de Mayo, once Argentina's most powerful garrison, with a peak force of 27,000 men, has been reduced to a complement of 6,000 or less, and the security authority has been turned over to Velasco. This is attested by a report in the Inter-American of January, 1946.

Another army of supporters of the Perón regime is found in the civil-service bureaucracy, which in the three years since the dictatorship was established has been increased from 172,000 to 250,000. This means that more and more persons are dependent for their livelihood on those who control the state. The increase in civil-service employees has been matched by wholesale dismissals of government employees who do not sympathize with Colonel Perón's methods, according to a report in the New York Herald Tribune of December 29, 1945.

Regimentation of Education

The signatories to the Chapultepec Act agreed:

1. To recommend to the governments of the American republics the most careful deletion from the official textbooks used in their schools of everything which might tend to jeopardize the inter-American system.

2. To recommend to the governments of the American republics that they exercise the greatest vigilance to see that the teachings in their schools are based on the principles of freedom, peace, justice, and equality that are found in the bases of the inter-American system.

3. To recommend to the governments of the American republics the deletion from official textbooks used in their schools of everything which sustains directly or indirectly racial or totalitarian theories or which might therefore be susceptible of compromising the friendly relations between the states of the continent.

The regimentation of the education of the Argentinian population is part of the program of the Perón regime.

In the primary schools of the country children are taught to copy and discuss the following phrases in accordance with a ruling of the Ministry of Justice and Public Instruction, from the text of which we quote in part:

Women to procreate heroes—not to be mothers of renegades.

Argentine woman must fulfil faithfully her natural obligations.

To be worthy of our traditions we must live arrogantly.

We are a liberating nation and therefore have the right to carry out correction in Latin America.

To be an Argentine does not mean pacifism, speculation, or anything literary; it means one must be dynamic.

The extent to which the Perón regime has attempted to regiment the higher institutions of education can be judged by the fact that on September 29, 1945, all six national universities decided to suspend their activities as a protest against the unprecedented wave of oppression.

On October 5 this act of defiance was countered by the police, which stormed and took by force the University of La Plata, imprisoning 315 unarmed students. Following this act the government prepared a decree dismissing all university presidents and replacing them by so-called government interventors.

On October 8, according to the New York Times, the police themselves reported that some 2,100 students were being held in jail. According to this report five or six rectors of the universities, many deans of faculties, and dozens of university professors had passed some time in jail during the previous two weeks.

On December 5 the New York Herald Tribune reported that students of the University of Buenos Aires refused to take their annual examinations as a protest against the Perón regime. The only students reporting for the examinations were a handful belonging to the anti-democratic Nationalist faction.

While regimenting its own educational system, the Argentine regime has permitted Japanese and German schools to continue unmolested. All but 9 of the 200 German schools and all but 1 of the 16 Japanese schools continue to function. As a token of its adherence to the Act of Chapultepec, the government has dismissed 27 foreign teachers.

Suppression of Freedom of the Press

The Charter of Chapultepec recommended:

1. That the American republics recognize their essential obligation to guarantee to their people free and impartial access to sources of information.

2. That having this guaranty in view they undertake upon the conclusion of the war the earliest possible abandonment of those measures of censorship . . . which have been necessary in war time. . . .

3. That the governments of the American republics take measures, individually and in cooperation with one another, to promote a free exchange of information among their peoples.

4. That the American republics . . . make every effort to the end that when a juridical order in the world is assured, there may be established the principle of free transmission and reception of information, oral or written, published in books or by the press, broadcast by radio, or disseminated by any other means, under proper responsibility and without need of previous censorship, as is the case with private correspondence . . . in time of peace.

The Perón regime has imposed direct and indirect censorship upon the democratic press of the country. It has arrested editors and arbitrarily suspended the publication of opposition papers. It has harried foreign correspondents.

Police maintain a strict supervision to make certain that nothing in opposition to the Perón regime is published.

For their refusal to obey orders hundreds of provincial papers throughout the country have been suspended and their editors jailed.

In addition to silencing published opposition, the Perón representatives function actively to insure that every statement by the government is published.

Typical of the brutality and intentions of the Perón regime is the fashion by which it acquired the support of Critica, a pro-democratic evening newspaper with a circulation of between 200,000 and 250,000. On October 18, 1945, 5,000 armed supporters of Perón, accompanied by 100 policemen and supported by four armored cars, attacked the paper. The assailants poured lead into the Critica office, according to the New York Herald Tribune, for two hours. The police then took over, arrested sixty-six employees, and closed the paper. A week later Critica was permitted to resume publication but was told, "either cooperate or be destroyed."

Raul Damonte Taborda, publisher of Critica, was dismissed through a legal action, and the operation of the newspaper was turned over to an official interventor after Mrs. Salvadora Medina Onrubia de Botana, who inherited the enterprise from her husband, had decided to make peace with Perón. The interventor took over in an official ceremony after midnight attended by Mrs. Botana and representatives of Perón.

Foreign correspondents have been subjected to intimidation. On July 2 Joseph Newman, correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, took refuge in the American embassy because of threats made by telephone by a man claiming to be Captain Moretti of the Ministry of War.

The United States had to intervene officially with the Argentine Foreign Office because of the coercion exercised upon John Nasht of Newsweek. Before permitting him to leave the country the Perón government tried to force Mr. Nasht to sign a statement saying that his cabled material had been incorrect.

The Associated Press, the United Press, and the International News Service on various occasions were informed that all their dispatches would be censored. Early in October the censorship was lifted, but only after a strong official protest to the Argentine Foreign Ministry by the United States government.

In contrast is the permission granted for the publication of a new German language newspaper, Freie Presse, on December 1. The editor of the new publication is Herr Müller, an Austrian, for many years on the editorial staff of the Deutsche La Plata Zeitung, a Nazi-controlled paper.

As late as September, 1945, moreover, pro-Nazi publications such as Junges Volk, organ of the Hitler Youth, Teutonia, and the Herold were still operating.

On January 17, 1946, the American embassy in Buenos Aires released a number of documents showing Nazi connections with Argentine government officials and the government's partial control of the Nazi press.

The story, as recounted in the New York Herald Tribune, shows how the Nazi-subsidized press serves now to push Perón's candidacy for the Presidency. The Herald Tribune dispatch follows:

BUENOS AIRES, Jan. 17.—The American embassy in Buenos Aires released to the press today part of a quantity of documents discovered by American authorities in Berlin, proving Nazi connections with Argentine government officials and Nazi control over part of the Argentine press which at present supports Colonel Juan Perón for President.

On authorization from the State Department, John Moors Cabot, American chargé d'affaires, made public thirteen of four hundred German documents which were sent here from Washington. They consist of "top secret" telegrams sent between March 9, 1942, and July 6, 1943, to the Foreign Office in Berlin by Otto Meynen, then chargé d'affaires in the German embassy in Buenos Aires.

The telegrams reveal the clandestine links between the Germany embassy and a number of Argentine newspapers, including El Pampero, Cabildo, El Pueblo, Abora, and the Deutsche La Plata Zeitung. They explain how these Nazi propaganda organs got newsprint despite the efforts of the United Nations, in accordance with the Rio de Janeiro resolutions, to prevent their getting it. They also disclose how the German embassy used these organs to influence Argentine internal political affairs.

The first telegram asked the German government for authorization to spend 73,450 reichmarks monthly to subsidize these papers (the mark was worth about 40 American cents at the time). The greatest amount, 42,000 marks, went to Pampero. Directors and members of the staff of Pampero now publish La Epoca, Colonel Perón's principal political organ.

Three thousand marks were allocated to El Pueblo. Asked by reporters why El Pueblo was never placed on the Allied black list with other Nazi organs, Mr. Cabot explained that it was also the principal organ of the Roman Catholic church in Argentina, and was kept off the black list out of deference to the church.

The second telegram shows payments and relations established by the German embassy with Andi, an Argentine news agency which the Argentine military government selected last year as its official government news agency but later abandoned as a result of public opposition. The telegram says, "Andi was induced by the embassy to place press agents in the Ibero-American countries who are obligated to send the regular press survey down here. In this way the embassy could receive material and political information which goes beyond the North American agency reports."

A third telegram disclosed plans to continue distribution of Nazi material to Argentine newspapers in the event of a rupture of diplomatic relations between Argentina and Germany. It suggested the embassy "leave certain sums of money behind in loyal hands." This correspondent was informed that Ludwig Freude, one of the principal Nazi agents in Argentina and now one of Perón's close collaborators, was one of the men in whose "loyal hands" the German embassy left money.

Antonio Delfino, who resigned only two months ago as director of the Argentine National Bank, a government-controlled institution, was named as the man with whom arrangements were to be made for the transfer of funds to Argentina from neutral countries. He was president of the Hamburg American Shipping Line and is a known Nazi agent.

Fulvio N. Cravacuore was named as the agent to whom religious material was to be sent for El Pueblo. Cravacuore is now one of the principal writers for Democracia, one of Perón's new newspapers.

Another document revealed the German embassy's relations with Manuel Fresco, former Governor of Buenos Aires Province. It said, "Fresco has just come directly to the embassy with a concrete proposal for the creation of a new popular morning newspaper, La Tribuna, and asked for a financial contribution for the purchase of newsprint that allegedly will be furnished to him by President Castillo."

This Nazi organ actually appeared under the name of Cabildo and assumed the name of La Tribuna only recently, after Cabildo was suppressed by the present regime in its attempt to show its support for the United Nations. Cabildo was described as a paper "oriented to the support of the governmental policy of Castillo and the maintenance of Argentine neutrality."

Suppression of Labor Unions

The American republics agreed at Chapultepec to collaborate for the attainment of "a constructive basis for the sound economic development of the Americas through the development of natural resources, industrialization, improvement of transportation, and the improvement of labor standards and working conditions, including collective bargaining, all leading to a rising level of living and increased consumption."

Further, they resolved "to consider of international public interest the enacting by all the American republics of social legislation that will protect the working class and that will embody guaranties as well as rights on a scale not inferior to the one recommended by the International Labor Office."

On October 31, 1945, the International Labor Office, then meeting in conference, refused to admit the Argentine workers' delegate and his adviser, Juan Rodriguez and Manuel E. Pichel. The reason given was that the Argentine government "was a de facto war government that had established a state of siege in the country, suppressed essential human liberties and rights that are incorporated in the ILO's constitution, and deprived trade unions of freedom of action and even of their leaders. Under present conditions workers' organizations in the Argentine Republic do not enjoy freedom of association, freedom of action, or freedom of speech."

Rodriguez, it was subsequently disclosed, is a paid employee of the Secretariat of Labor, a branch of the government established by Colonel Perón.

The attempt to take over the labor unions was begun by Colonel Perón in 1943 when he served as Labor Under Secretary. At that time he began a general reorganization which, following Nazi lines, has had as its objective to win the political support of the working masses, especially the unorganized and unskilled.

The fashion in which this was done was described in the New York Herald Tribune of December 26, 1945, by Joseph Newman, Buenos Aires correspondent of that paper:

It was not an accident that the first office which Perón himself created and directed after reaching the government was the Secretariat of Labor and Social Welfare. This was actually a new ministry, but was not so described because the constitution limits the number of ministries to eight and the government was not yet ready to flout the constitution openly.

From the Secretariat of Labor Perón began to convert the purely military revolution into a National Socialist revolution. He was aware of the great poverty which prevailed among the masses, despite the agricultural wealth of Argentina. The great landowners who ruled Argentina through their conservative party up to 1943 did less than they might have done to raise the economic and educational level of the Argentine population. . . .

Like Hitler and Mussolini, Perón began to agitate the working masses, making them conscious of their poverty and of the disproportionate wealth of their employers. He did this through branches of the Labor Secretariat which were established in cities, towns, and villages throughout the country. His propaganda agents turned out literature by the tons, and Perón himself made hundreds of speeches in person and over the state radio urging industrial and farm workers to unite behind him for a better deal. To factory workers he promised more pay, better working conditions, and paid vacations. To peons and exploited agricultural workers he promised some of the rich lands of the wealthy landowners. . . .

As part of the Secretariat of Labor he established a National Agrarian Council, which is preparing to divide up big estates and turn them over to the workers. As in the Axis countries his Labor Secretariat organized government-controlled unions which all workers were urged to join. Independent unions which refused to submit to government control were suppressed and their leaders were jailed.

As a result of internal and external pressure independent unions were permitted recently to resume restricted activities. Though these unions may have succeeded in regaining control of most of the 500,000 organized workers, no one knows the extent of the influence and control which Perón has secured over the 2,500,000 unorganized workers.

On September 13, 1945, police closed the headquarters of the Local Labor Union, comprising some 200,000 members, and arrested six of its leaders. The union included such independent labor groups as workers in construction, meat, textile, metallurgical, printing, shoemaking, restaurant, and associated industries.

Seven days later Colonel Perón issued a decree by which a general increase in wages was granted to workers and employees throughout the country.

Joseph Newman, writing in the New York Herald Tribune of December 21, characterized the measure as follows:

It was clearly designed by its author to win the labor vote. From the point of view of the democratic opposition, it constitutes a form of veiled fraud by attempting to buy the labor vote almost on the eve of the election through the official device of ordering all-around increases of 30 per cent in the annual income of the working class. This involves many millions of pesos, which, in political terms, amount to forced contributions by employers to Perón's campaign.

Such independent union groups as are still able to function are supporting the Democratic Union's opposition to Perón.

Anti-Semitic Program

At Chapultepec it was also resolved:

1. To reaffirm the principle, recognized by all the American states, of equality of rights and opportunities for all men, regardless of race or religion.

2. To recommend that the governments of the American republics, without jeopardizing freedom of expression, either oral or written, make every effort to prevent in their respective countries all acts which may provoke discrimination among individuals because of race or religion.

The Perón regime has recently instituted, in its emulation of the Nazi pattern, a program of terror against the Jews. On October 20, 1945, the return of Colonel Perón to power was signaled by anti-Semitic riots which were described by Joseph Newman in the New York Herald Tribune:

Bands of Peronistas celebrating the victory of their leader entered the extensive Jewish quarter of Buenos Aires and stoned individuals, homes, and buildings. With the tacit approval of police they engaged Jewish youths in fist fights and shouted offensive slogans. Carrying Argentine flags and posters bearing portraits of Perón, the Peronistas cried: "Death to the Jews! Viva Perón!" Police stood by, permitting the bands to go about their work in freedom. Some were seen giving the Peronistas a lift in police cars from one block to another.

As the streets were deserted, the Peronistas shouted: "Jews, come out and fight!" They approached the synagogue on Paso Street with rocks in their hands and were intercepted by a group of Jewish boys who engaged the band in a fist fight and dispersed it. Another group entered the basement of the synagogue and arrested twenty of the defenders. These were later released, but this is believed to be the first time police have violated the immunity of a religious edifice in Argentina.

Peronistas attempted to stone El Diario Israelita, a Yiddish newspaper which was closed by the military regime when President Pedro Ramirez was in power and permitted to reopen after a vigorous denunciation by President Roosevelt.

Another clash occurred in front of the Jewish bank, called Banco Industrial, the walls of which were painted with slogans such as "Death to the Jews. Viva Perón!" On Avenida de Mayo, the principal avenue, the following inscription can still be seen painted on the sidewalk: "Kill a Jew and be a patriot." In Plaza de Mayo, where Peronistas had staged a mass demonstration and had been addressed by their leaders the previous night, impromptu speakers harangued small groups with speeches blaming Jews for all the ills of the country and of the world.

On November 25 a new attack on the Jewish quarter was made by 30,000 of Colonel Perón's supporters. Reporting the episode Arnaldo Cortesi declared in the New York Times:

Anti-Jewish disturbances of considerable gravity took place in Buenos Aires during the night after a meeting of 30,000 or so of Colonel Juan Perón's supporters invaded the Jewish quarter of the city, where they broke the signs of several Jewish-owned shops and insulted everyone in sight, attacking and brutally beating anyone who attempted to protest or defend himself. . . .

The police, who were present in great force, stood by passively while the Jews who had been knocked to the ground were savagely kicked. Finally the police intervened, but only to arrest the victims instead of the perpetrators of these aggressions. Later the police raided a peaceful Jewish social club, pointing their revolvers at about one hundred persons inside. Then they arrested several of the club's officials and members for no apparent reason. . . .

The disturbances . . . have occurred with such regularity whenever large numbers of Peronistas have gathered that it is hardly possible to doubt any longer that anti-Semitism forms a part of Colonel Perón's political stock in trade. This circumstance is perhaps owing in part to the fact that he now has the support of a considerable section of the Nationalists, who adopted anti-Semitism along with many other ideals of clearly Nazi character.

Three days later, Cortesi reported again:

Several episodes of anti-Jewish hooliganism occurred last night after a relatively small crowd of former Vice-President Juan Perón's supporters had held demonstrations in the center of the city. . . . This time the attacks on Jews were carried out by small bands of about fifty young ruffians who entered the Jewish district shouting "Long Live Perón" and "Death to the Jews" and proceeded to damage property and to assault passers-by. More than thirty pistol shots were fired and some noise bombs were thrown. . . . No casualties were reported.

The police took no effective measures against the assailants and eventually arrested one man who, judging by his name, is a Jew. . . . When it became known yesterday that a sudden meeting of Peronistas had been called, many Jews sought refuge away from their homes. Others barricaded themselves in their houses. The pro-Perón paper Epoca said today that the anti-Jewish demonstrations were staged by Colonel Perón's enemies, who thus planned to bring him into disrepute. . . . This suggestion is sufficiently disproved by the attitude of the police, which never showed mercy for Colonel Perón's opponents but stood passively by while Jews were being attacked.

On December 19 Dr. Federico Contini, one of Perón's top advisers, discussing the anti-Jewish demonstrations, declared in a speech: "It is a pity that a substantial number of Jews were not killed. It would have served to frighten the others."

On December 30, 1945, Joseph Newman, in the New York Herald Tribune, disclosed that the Committee against Racism had discovered a plot which originated in police headquarters to stage a pogrom after planting bombs and leaflets in Perón's political offices and in Catholic churches, attributing them to the Jews. The plot was publicly denounced during the first week in December and therefore failed to materialize.

Perón Harbors Enemy Agents and Axis Businesses

The parties to the Act of Chapultepec further agreed:

1. To recommend that the governments of the American republics do not give refuge to individuals guilty of or responsible for or accomplices in the commission of such (war) crimes.

2. To recommend that the governments shall upon the demand of any of the United Nations . . . surrender individuals charged with the commission of such crimes to the United Nations making the request. . . .

3. To reaffirm the determination . . . to prevent individuals or groups within their respective jurisdictions from engaging in any activities fomented by the Axis powers or their satellites for the purpose of prejudicing the individual or collective security and welfare of the American republics:

a. To intensify efforts to eradicate the remaining centers of Axis subversive influence in the hemisphere. . . .

b. To take effective measures to prevent Axis-inspired elements from regaining or securing any vantage points within the territory subject to their respective jurisdictions from which such elements might disturb or threaten the security or welfare of any republic.

4. They resolved that measures be undertaken "to uncover, disclose, immobilize, and prevent the concealment or transfer of property and rights located within the American republics . . . which . . . whether or not in name belong to or are controlled by or for the benefit of Germany or Japan or individuals or entities within those countries.

Committed by the Act of Chapultepec and the UNO Charter to turn over enemy agents and to expose enemy holdings, the Perón government has done neither.

On November 30, 1945, Dr. Carlos Adrogué, secretary of the Committee for Vigilance and Liquidation of Enemy Property, resigned, accusing the Foreign Minister of unwarranted interference with the committee's work. The committee itself declared that the Foreign Minister had introduced a number of legal technicalities to prevent the liquidation of the Ricardo Staudt Company, chief Argentine operator in wool, with a capital of between forty and seventy million pesos. Its head, Ricardo Staudt, a German by birth, came to the Argentine in 1924 to avoid punishment for his criminal activities in Belgium during World War I and obtained Argentine citizenship. In 1941 Adolf Hitler conferred the Order of the Grand Eagle on him for his "outstanding services to the Nazi cause in Argentina." Counsel for Herr Staudt is the law firm of Cooke Brothers, of which Juan I. Cooke, Foreign Minister of Argentina, is a member. The fact that on January 8, 1946, Dr. Adrogué was kidnaped and beaten up by thugs seems more than a coincidence.

Colonel Perón himself has on various occasions intervened in behalf of top German industrialists, among them Ricardo Staudt, Ludwig Freude, and Fritz Mandl. Ludwig Freude is allegedly one of the key leaders in Nazi underground activities on the South American continent. Although on the United States and British black list, Freude's firm, Compañía General de Construcciones, early in 1945, had a contract with the Argentine government for twenty-two million pesos. In February, 1945, an investigating commission made an attempt to examine the books of Freude's company. Later an investigation of Freude's activities was ordered. This time Colonel Perón appealed personally to President Farrell, vouching unconditionally for Freude, with the result that the inquiries were suspended. Moreover, the report of the interrupted investigation of Freude was torn out of the minutes of the commission and destroyed on an order from Colonel Perón.

On October 26 the Commission for the Liquidation of Enemy Property determined to seize all the property of Ricardo Staudt on the ground that investigations showed that large funds had been transferred from his company to Germany during the war, and that he himself regarded Berlin as his headquarters. Staudt, warned in advance of the impending action, secured an injunction. The commission appealed to a higher court and resolved to proceed with its seizure. But this action was vetoed by Foreign Minister Cooke, with the result that Staudt is still in possession of his property. Staudt is alleged to be the principal financial backer, together with Fritz Mandl, of Perón's campaign for the Presidency.

On June 25 Assistant Secretary of State William L. Clayton, testifying before a subcommittee of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, declared that the Nazis' grandiose scheme for finding "safe haven" in neutral and other countries while preparing for another world war was a matter of grave concern to the Allies. He said that in Argentina, where 108 major Axis economic enterprises are known to be operating, not one of these Nazi spearheads had been wholly eliminated.

On November 5, 1945, Virginia Prewett, writing in PM, reported:

Despite official assertions to the contrary, many known members of the Nazi economic spearheads are still operating in Argentina with perfect freedom and bright prospects for the future. . . . On September 11 the government officially reported that it was meeting its pledge, made at Chapultepec, to extirpate Nazi influence. However, only a little more than 50 per cent of the long list of German firms has been placed under government control. . . .

The Compañía General de Construcciones has continued operations with immunization from governmental interference. It is now working on fat government contracts and is bidding on others. . . . Its head is Ludwig Freude, who received the Cross of Merit from Adolf Hitler. . . . Among the contracts that the untouchable Freude has received from the Argentine government are: construction of a new military air base at Reconquista, 6,500,000 pesos; contracts for building military barracks in towns of Ezequiel, Juín de los Andes, and San Martín de los Andes, 17,000,000 pesos. Freude is also constructing a government shipyard at Río Santiago and a torpedo depot at Puerto Belgrano. . . . His company built the new big state hotel at Llaoliao. . . . where the German agent Hans Nobel—who also circulates freely—teaches Argentine high society how to ski. . . . With the exception of two German banks and six insurance companies all the important German spearhead firms in Argentina still retain the titles to the businesses, which are now more flourishing than ever.

Since the government's statement last September that it was "eliminating" Nazi-controlled business, the following German-owned firms have obtained government contracts: Wayass and Freytag, associated with a firm of the same name in Germany, signed a contract to do the concrete work on bridges 3, 4, 7, 8, and 11 at the new national airport. . . . outside of Buenos Aires. Compañía General de Obras Públicas, which is a branch of the Philip Holtzman firm of Berlin, has signed for the concrete work on bridges 5, 6, and 16 at the same airport. Since the government statement the government has also received bids now under consideration for construction of state roads, etc., from the following: Compañía General de Construcciones, Wayass and Freytag, Compañía General de Obras

Públicas, Siemens-Schuckert, Thyssen-Lamental, Grün and Bilfinger, and Calera Avellaneda.

As recently as December 6, 1945, Assistant Secretary of State Braden made new representations to Argentina because of its alleged failure to deport seventy-one Nazi agents.

On August 24, 1945, Nelson Rockefeller, former Assistant Secretary of State, and largely responsible for the admission of Argentina to the United Nations Organization, announced, five months after Argentina's declaration of war against the Axis:

Of the 15 Japanese and 223 other persons investigated for Axis espionage, only 70 German agents are under arrest. There is very little if any control over the directors and officers of Axis firms and associations, and practically no progress in seeking out Axis individuals and assets which may be seeking refuge in Argentina and whose existence is therefore concealed.

On September 15, 1945, the New York Times declared that among the men released, thirty-three have definitely been identified as enemy agents. No enemy agent has been interned or deported. On that same day Spruille Braden, on the eve of his departure from Argentina for the United States, said, as reported in the New York Times:

The Nazi element is still extremely dangerous. Unless it can be extirpated it will remain a serious threat for the future. I am not competent to state whether there will be an aggressive Germany again, but if there is to be one, then in my opinion the Nazis here in Argentina would be a spearhead against this hemisphere and the United States.

On October 20, 1945, Damonte Taborda, former chairman of the Argentine Committee on Subversive Activities, charged that the political upheaval in the Argentine was the result of a Nazi plot to regain military supremacy and world power. He also suggested the possibility that Nazi research on atomic power was continuing in Argentina.

Even arrested Axis espionage agents receive special treatment. Augustine Rodriguez Aray, a former Radical Party deputy held as a political prisoner by Perón for many months, in a formal charge to the Federal Court accused the police of aiding and abetting Axis espionage agents. He said that during his five months' stay in the Villa de Vota prison in Buenos Aires Colonel Velazco's treatment of convicted Axis spies was so friendly, partial, and benevolent that they were allowed to continue their operations both outside and inside the prison. In their cells were short- and long-wave radio sets, photographs of Hitler, typewriters, and all the material they needed for their work, as well as ample stores of food. What is more, they were allowed to leave the prison without guard day and night, some remaining absent for as long as two days.

Conclusion

We submit that the actions of the Perón regime as cited above are identical in practice and purpose with the actions of the Nazi regime when Hitler came to power. The Nazi Party also began its war program by acquiring totalitarian control of the government and by instituting a terror against the opposition within Germany. From this point it proceeded systematically to apply the same methods against other countries, conquering half of Europe bloodlessly and finally precipitating the war which has only just been concluded. The Perón regime, if left in power, will certainly launch a war in the Western Hemisphere.

On September 29, 1944, President Roosevelt discussed "the extraordinary paradox of the growth of the Nazi-Fascist influence and the increasing application of Nazi-Fascist methods in the Argentine." "The Argentine government," he said, "has repudiated solemn inter-American obligations on the basis of which the nations of this hemisphere developed a system of defense to meet the challenge of Axis aggression." He insisted that "unless we now demonstrate a capacity to develop a tradition of respect for such obligations among civilized nations, there can be little hope for a system of international security, theoretically created to maintain principles for which our peoples today are sacrificing to the limit of their resources."

On January 5, 1946, Assistant Secretary of State Spruille Braden, speaking on an official State Department broadcast, again branded the present regime in Argentina as Nazi, and explained its ability to stay in power in the following terms:

They have the police, an important section of the army, armed action groups, and a typically National Socialist program; not excluding the old formula of bread and circuses for the millions. Following recognized Nazi tactics, they secure control of certain strategic labor unions, take over the transportation facilities and a few important unions. With the help of the police you can control a nation.

We submit that the United Nations, in proof of its intention to protect world peace, should act at the earliest possible moment to brand the Perón regime as an enemy of peace and security and as such to suspend it from the United Nations. Such an undertaking by the UNO is clearly an act of self-protection which will be supported by freedom-loving peoples everywhere.

The millions of casualties of World War II should guard the conscience of the world against a new appeasement. The time to act is now.

"THE IMPOSSIBLE CANDIDATE"

[To supplement the Memorandum of The Nation Associates, we publish below a manifesto by the Argentine Committee of Democratic Lawyers which has just reached us from Buenos Aires.]

THE Committee of Democratic Lawyers, in accordance with its principle of struggling for constitutional rule and its avowed purpose of orienting public opinion on present problems of government, believes it necessary to examine more closely the personality of the Impossible Candidate. . . .

Article 16 of the constitution provides that candidates for public office must be fit to hold such office. The Impossible Candidate does not fulfil this requirement in view of irrefutable proofs of his ties with Nazism. It is easy to demonstrate the complete parallel that exists between Hitler and the Impossible Candidate: identical philosophies, methods, aims, and spontaneous reactions. . . .

Both initiated their programs with strong condemnations of the previous governments. Hitler said: "The National Socialist revolution has overthrown a republic of treason and falsehood and replaced it with a government of honor, loyalty, and decency" ("My New Order," p. 193). The Impossible Candidate says: "The revolution of June 4 has an ideal and a reality which will transform the political, economic, and social picture of Argentina. From it will emerge a whole new political process. Until now everything has been distorted—liberty, citizenship, administrative functions, justice, and morals" ("Discursos," Ed. Of.; p. 206). . . .

Hitler headed the "Workers' Party" ("Mein Kampf," vol. I; p. 215); the Impossible Candidate has founded the "Labor Party" (Partido Laborista). Both maintain that they are the champions of the underprivileged classes. Hitler says: "I fight for the sons of the farmers and workers" ("My New Order," p. 88). The Impossible Candidate asserts: "Encouraged by hundreds of thousands of Argentine workers, we pledge ourselves to the attainment of a superior social order" (Ed. Of., p. 61). . . .

Naturally, they declare that they are opposed by the same adversaries. Hitler says the "Judeo-Marxist plutocracy" opposes him ("My New Order," pp. 611, 849); the Impossible Candidate says that the "Communist oligarchy"—and his followers add with venom, "Jewish"—opposes him. . . .

They apply the same instruments of domination. Hitler assumes the title of defender of what he calls the classes ("Mein Kampf," p. 56) and seduces them by unbridled demagoguery. . . . He creates Nazi trade unions, ostensibly to protect the rights of workers (Heilen: "History of Nazism," p. 196). He defines the basis of his domestic policy: "To raise the economic standards and remove all obstacles that might exercise a destructive influence on the social body, the Nazi corporation must be the organized concentration of the different groups which participate in the national economic life" ("Mein Kampf," p. 596). The independent trade unions are persecuted and then destroyed. The official trade unions are grouped in the Deutsche Arbeitsfront headed by a Reichsleiter. Their familiar slogan is "work through joy" (Stoffel: "The Dictatorship of German Fascism," p. 90). This organization fixes conditions of work, settles labor disputes, and signs collective-bargaining agreements. The law of February 26, 1935, completes the system: every worker must carry a work card and those even "suspected of holding ideas hostile to the state" can be expelled from the union.

The Impossible Candidate has copied Hitler's plan and applied it carefully in every detail ("Discursos," Ed. Of., p. 108). He, too, has assumed the role of defender of the working class and plagiarized Nazi propaganda. In similar language he proclaims that the trade unions are the base for his domestic policy: "Modern experience has shown that the better-organized working masses can more easily be directed and led. That gave me the idea of forming an organization that could guide the trade-union movement, organize it, and make of it a mass which acts rationally in accordance with the directors of the state" (La Nación, September 3, 1944; p. 1). The Secretariat of Labor and Welfare, the equivalent of the Deutsche Arbeitsfront, is created on November 27, 1943. The independent unions are persecuted and many of them outlawed. In order to transform the remaining organizations into official trade unions, it is necessary to introduce a statute for each profession. The decree of October 2, 1945, establishes the legal system of trade-union associations and places them under the authority of the Secretariat, just as the Nazis had done. The decree of December 20, 1945, provides for the creation of a National Institute on Wages which will serve as an instrument through which to manage the workers now corralled into the official unions by basing wage rises on the decree of docility manifested. "They must not concern themselves with politics" ("Discursos," Ed. Of.; p. 97). The only thing still lacking is the work card without which a worker cannot obtain employment; this will tie the last knot in the noose around labor's neck.

The articles of our constitution are in fundamental conflict with the statutes introduced by the present regime. Article 14 guarantees the right of assembly for lawful purposes and, thereby, the right of workers to associate in independent unions and to concern themselves with politics if they so desire. The same article guarantees the right to seek work, with or without a card, and to obtain a reasonable wage without fear of persecution.

Thus Hitler's legislative program has been reproduced with touching fidelity. On February 28, 1933, Hitler suppressed civil rights; in Argentina a state of siege has been imposed. On May 2, 1933, Hitler dissolved all German associations; in Argentina democratic associations were dissolved on January 17, 1944, including the Junta de la Victoria, the Confederación Democrática Argentina, and the Junta de Ayuda a la Cruz Roja Británica (Committee of Aid to the British Red Cross). On May 2, 1933, Hitler abolished the independent trade unions; the Argentine trade unions were replaced by official unions under the decrees of July 20, 1943, and October 2, 1945. On May 4, 1933, Hitler created the Ministry of Propaganda; in Argentina the Subsecretariat of Press and Information was created on December 31, 1943. On April 4, 1933, Hitler issued a statute on the press; in Argentina a statute on the press was issued on December 31, 1943. On July 10, 1933, Hitler dissolved the political parties; political parties were dissolved in Argentina on December 31, 1943. On January 30, 1934, Hitler ordered the reorganization of the Reichstag; in Argentina the Congress was dissolved on June 14, 1943. On April 29 and December 30, 1934, Hitler defined crimes against the state; in Argentina the decree of January 15, 1945, defined crimes against the security of the state. On February 10, 1936, Hitler established the Gestapo; in Argentina the Federal Police was established on December 24, 1943.

The process is the same in both cases: when the universities intervene, the professors are dismissed, the students are persecuted, and the books are destroyed. Jewish merchants are assaulted with the same gusto in Buenos Aires as in Nürnberg (Ed. Of., November 29, 1945, p. 1). Hitler established concentration camps; Argentina, too, has concentration camps where prisoners are tortured because they dared assert their inalienable rights as citizens.

All this does not prevent the two men from proclaiming themselves ardent partisans of democracy. Hitler says: "Germany too has a democratic government . . . it is a true democracy . . ." ("My New Order," pp. 192, 309). The Impossible Candidate says that he, too, wishes to establish "a true democracy" in this country. "We shall have an integral democracy" ("Discursos," Ed. Of., pp. 187, 223).

Their promises sound the same note. Hitler professes his hatred of war: "National Socialist Germany, by fundamental conviction, wants peace . . . Germany needs and desires peace" ("My New Order," pp. 313, 475). The Impossible Candidate also "wants to live in peace with all nations of good will" ("Discursos," Ed. Of., p. 69).

Hitler seeks the "unity of the nation" ("My New Order," p. 152). The Impossible Candidate likewise desires "the unity of all Argentines" ("Discursos," Ed. Of., p. 98). Both believe it can be accomplished by hanging and shooting.

Hitler says that he alone can save Germany from communism ("My New Order," pp. 212, 302, 411); the Impossible Candidate offers himself as the only one who can "make this grave danger disappear" (La Nación, September 3, 1944; p. 1).

Hitler announces that his regime will last a thousand years, and the Impossible Candidate repeats, like a distant feeble echo, that his will last sixty years (La Nación, December 13, 1945).

The Impossible Candidate cannot conceal his sympathies for the Axis. One has only to read his speech of July 10, 1944, on national defense: his admiration for Nazism, "for its political, diplomatic, and military conduct," crops out in every paragraph ("Discursos," Ed. Of., p. 69)—at a time when Argentine had already severed relations with the Axis.

The followers of the Impossible Candidate have obstreperously demonstrated their true feelings. The streets of the Republic echoed their cries of defiance before the defeat of the Axis. Their slogans are: "Viva Perón!" "Death to democracy!" "Death to the Jews!" "Books—No!" "Build the country; kill the students!" (La Nación, August 14 and 17, December 23, 1945; La Razón, August 11 and 16, 1945; etc.). These demonstrations need no label. . . .

The examples cited above prove that the Impossible Candidate is not fit, under Article 16 of the constitution, to be President of the Republic. The destiny of the nation cannot be intrusted to a man whose principles are incompatible with the institutions for which the great leaders of the past fought. To deliver the government to him . . . would be to compound the crime of President Hindenburg, who on January 30, 1933, named Adolf Hitler Chancellor of the Reich, and to launch our country into a similar adventure. We have seen the destroyed cities, the ravaged land of Germany and Italy, the starving people, crushed through the fault of a savior like the Impossible Candidate, and we are resolved that our country shall not suffer such devastation.

Only the tradition of Rivadavia, of Echeverría, and of Alberdi—the glorious tradition that made our country great under the ægis of justice and law—can save this nation.

If I Had to Choose

AS a long-time disciple of Jefferson, I hold that if I had to choose between a free press and any other agency, I would choose a free press; for where the press is free, no bad cause can long exist. And by freedom of the press I mean that no influence, whether of money or power or any other thing, either directs its policy or inclines it to suppression, or advocacy, for any consideration except the common good. The independence, fearlessness, and ability of The Nation make it an influential agency in an era when leadership without strings is the hope of a drifting world.—Josephus Daniels

THE Nation

20 VESEY STREET - NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 9, 1946

NUMBER 6

The Shape of Things

WE DON'T PRETEND TO KNOW THAT IRAN was pressed by the British into laying its quarrel with the Soviet Union before the United Nations, though the long-standing British-Russian rivalry in the area gives the charge credibility; but we are glad, in any case, that Iran was not pressed to withdraw. For the results of the controversy, so far, are all to the good. First, it has refuted the pessimistic theory that the infant organization must not be baptized lest it drown in the font. Mr. Bevin, for Britain, spoke bluntly concerning Russia's role in the recent revolt in Iran's Azerbaijan province, and Mr. Vishinsky, for Russia, replied in kind. Diplomatic double-talk was refreshingly absent. Yet a compromise was reached, a common-sense procedure was agreed upon, and the dignity of a small power was preserved as an encouragement and guaranty to others. Above all, the authority of the UNO was established, and the world was informed that peace depends not on evasiveness and cant but on a frank airing of genuine differences. Returning the dispute to the principals for direct negotiation, the UNO has insisted on its duty to review the results. Acceptance of this decision in good grace by the Soviet delegate and his country's return of important rail lines in Northern Iran to the Iranian State Railway offer hope of a quick and equitable settlement.

★

THE ROW BETWEEN BEVIN AND VISHINSKY over Greece was equally frank, but the issue is not susceptible to as easy a compromise. Britain is deeply committed in Greece, and the results of its intervention are well known. They have been reported in these pages and elsewhere in terms widely at variance with the version presented by Mr. Bevin. The British Foreign Secretary was treading on particularly shaky ground when he announced, "We could have done as was done in Rumania by Mr. Vishinsky. . . . We did not do that. We have not set up governments in Greece. . . ." The whole world knows that the Papandreou government was, in fact if not in legal fiction, set up by Britain and maintained in power by British arms and by Greek forces trained by the British and pledged to loyalty to the Greek crown. Subsequent governments, equally creatures of the British, were installed by methods not easy to distinguish from those applied by Vishinsky in Bucharest. Bevin may be correct in claiming that British forces are today maintaining a semblance of order among the contending factions in Greece, but no belated, half-hearted show of impartiality can cancel out the fact that British intervention crushed the liberation movement, armed the collaborators, and put reactionaries in office. Vishinsky is very likely using the Greek case cynically, as a weapon of retaliation, but he could have chosen no sharper one. What action will be taken is still uncertain as we go to press, but in spite of Bevin's demand for a clear-cut answer to the Russian charges, the Council cannot possibly apply a simple coat of whitewash. Perhaps the old device of an impartial inquiry would offer the best way out.

★

LISBON, A PARADISE FOR NAZI AGENTS during the war, has now become headquarters for the Spanish Pretender. A procession of royalists headed by the Dukes of Alba and Sotomayor arrived from Madrid in time to take part in the show, and to contribute glamour to the monarchist campaign abroad. The British government facilitated Don Juan's journey by granting him passage through England. "When his request was first received," said a press cable from London, "it was going to be turned down, but a similar request . . . came from Dr. Giral, Premier of the government in exile, and it seemed politic to grant both requests." Bully for Mr. Bevin! From now on, no one can justly accuse the Labor government of partiality toward the Spanish Republic! Opinions are divided concerning the Pretender's chances. Certain details, especially the manner in which Franco's brother, the Spanish Ambassador to Portugal, welcomed Don Juan after rushing to Madrid for instructions, would suggest that a deal had been made. On the other hand, the insistence in the Falangist press that Franco's position has never been stronger indicates his reluctance to step aside. The Madrid correspondent of the New York Times attributes this new optimism to the refusal of Secretary Byrnes "to divulge at present the contents of the Franco-Hitler-Mussolini correspondence." A perfect harmony pervades both foreign offices; while London distributes amenities impartially among Republicans and Monarchists, the State Department one day expresses its

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	153
The British Loan	155
Intervention for Democracy by Freda Kirchwey	156

ARTICLES

Swastika over the Senate by I. F. Stone	158
Of Meat and Men by Willard Shelton	159
Haunted Housing by Maurice Rosenblatt	161
Philippine Aftermath, III. The End of the Road by Mildred Adams	163
Adventures in Medicine by Martin Gumpert	166
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	168
The People's Front by Del Vayo	169

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	170
Never-Never Land by Israel Epstein	172
Music and Musicology by Charles B. Farrell	173
Briefer Comment	174
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	176
Art by Clement Greenberg	176
Records by B. H. Haggin	177

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 179

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 147 by Jack Barrett	180
---	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall
European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside, Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting, Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879, Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kelllogg Building, Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $5; Two Years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

dislike of Franco and next day suppresses evidence unfavorable to him. We entirely agree with Henry Morgenthau, Jr., who in his Milwaukee address recommended "to the President of the United States and the Secretary of State that they vigorously support the French proposal of a three-power conference and a concerted program which will help the Spanish people get rid of Franco."

✱

THE UNFITNESS OF EDWIN W. PAULEY TO BE Under Secretary of the Navy has been amply demonstrated at the hearings before the Senate Naval Affairs Committee. Pauley has been a familiar example of the oil man in politics, grinding his own axes and those of Standard of California. As an oil man he has a right to advance his point of view but he has no right to use his political power as Treasurer of the Democratic National Committee to push his private interests. That he has done so is clear. The hearings fully confirmed the revelations about about Pauley's Mexican oil deal first made by our Washington editor, I. F. Stone, in The Nation of May 15, 1943. The hearings also indicated that Pauley used his influence to stall off a suit asserting the federal government's right to tideland oil, in which both Pauley and Standard of California have interests. Certain interesting questions have been raised, however, which remain unanswered. How did Pauley manage to delay the tideland suit? How can Mr. Ickes justify the retention of Ralph K. Davies as his deputy in charge of the Petroleum Administration after claiming that Davies, a salaried vice-president of Standard of California who has worked closely with Pauley, had misled him into supporting Pauley's appointment? And is it true that Ickes has been promoting Davies for the post of Under Secretary of the Interior?

✱

CHINA SEEMS ASSURED OF A DEMOCRATIC and unified government as a result of the ratification of the decisions of the Political Consultative Council by the Kuomintang standing committee. The agreement had previously been approved by a Communist Party conference at Yen-an, and acceptance by the Democratic League of a plan that will greatly enlarge its influence is a foregone conclusion. Revision of the Kuomintang's draft constitution is to be undertaken immediately to provide wider provincial autonomy than had originally been granted. The Military Council, which has exercised virtually independent powers, will be brought under the control of the coalition Cabinet. Other significant constitutional changes will include a Bill of Rights giving unrestricted civil liberties to the Chinese people, the establishment of a national bicameral legislature, and new, democratic election machinery. While the Kuomintang retains a small majority in the new State Council and the Cabinet, the opposition parties will have enough seats to assure them a real voice in the transitional government. Although General Marshall took no direct part in the negotiations, his realistic handling of the situation was a vital, if not decisive factor in the final settlement. What remains is for all parties to carry out the agreement in the same spirit of conciliation that brought it into existence.

✕

THE AMERICAN LEGION PULLED A BONER IN the unwise and unwarranted assault by its national commander, John Stelle, on General Omar Bradley, chief of the Veterans' Administration. Stelle charged last week that the Veterans' Administration was suffering a "tragic breakdown" and demanded a Congressional investigation of the agency and the replacement of Bradley by a "seasoned business man" who would presumably bring order out of chaos. The attack was met by a sharp counter-attack: a cool defense of his position by the General, a speedy supporting movement by his old chief, General Eisenhower, a statement by President Truman that he didn't think Stelle represented Legion opinion, and a barrage of brickbats from new veterans' organizations which insist that the Legion is incensed because General Bradley has been taking his own line instead of following the Legion's and doling out patronage to legionnaires. These views were strengthened by General Bradley's suggestion that Stelle was piqued by the refusal of the Veterans' Administration to locate a hospital in the exact section of Decatur, Illinois, recommended by Stelle. The fact is that all the present inadequacies of the Veterans' Administration about which the Legion complains were piling up under the administration of General Hines, a strong legionnaire who played the game and was therefore never subjected to criticism by the Legion. General Bradley is doing now what should have been done a year ago, when the Legion was avowedly the watchdog of the Veterans' Administration.

✕

WHERE ARE THE FASCISTS OF YESTERYEAR? Not in Germany, certainly, where any G. I. will tell you that the hair shirt has replaced the brown shirt. And not in Spain or Argentina either, it seems. We had thought that Generalissimo Franco and Colonel Perón were fair examples of the species. But it seems we were wrong. Both statesmen gave interviews last week in which they proved themselves democrats by saying so. Franco told DeWitt Mackenzie of the Associated Press that "he never subscribed to the policies or to the political views of Hitler and Mussolini," and that he "is heading for absolute democratic rule by the people." Moreover, said the Caudillo, "Spain was with the United States all the time in the war against Japan." What must have led us astray were those occasions early in the war when Franco said that Spain was an "integral part" of Axis Europe and stood firm "against the democratic liberal alliance with Communist Russia." Then there was that message to Hitler which said, "May your arms triumph"; and that other message congratulating José Laurel on forming a Japanese puppet government in the Philippines. Colonel Perón, in a similar effort to straighten things out, summoned Frank Kluckhohn, newly arrived correspondent of the New York Times, and "insisted that his regime was closer to the New Deal than to Nazism and fascism." President Roosevelt's death, he said sadly, was "the greatest blow Argentina had suffered." This really confused us, because at that very moment Gerald L. K. Smith, laughingly attributing his reputation as an anti-Semite to "Jewish Gestapo" propaganda, was telling the Rankin committee that the only effective fascist agency he knew of in this country was Roosevelt's "New Deal bureaucracy." Well, we knew there were fascists somewhere.

The British Loan

IN HIS message to Congress urging approval of the British loan the President presented his case with sober logic but in too academic and unimaginative a manner. This was unfortunate, for the great debate about to begin on Capitol Hill will not turn on fine points of economic theory. The opponents of the loan can be relied upon to appeal to every prejudice, to muster every special interest. They must be answered by arguments that state the problem in plain terms of bread and butter, of war and peace. We have to make it abundantly clear that this loan is not a thoughtless hand-out but a prudent investment in the recovery of a trading partner whose sickness, if not cured, must soon infect our own welfare. More than that, it can justly be urged, the loan is an investment in peace, for unless we can re-establish a system designed to facilitate a world exchange of goods, we shall rapidly find ourselves plunged into all-out economic warfare. From that point to atomic bombardment the distance is very short.

Considerations of this kind make most of the arguments against the loan appallingly irrelevant. The crudest of those arguments, the stock in trade of the isolationist forces, start from the premise that the United States has twice been dragged into war in behalf of Britain, getting nothing out of the deal but bad debts.

Therefore, says the New York Daily News, instead of giving more money to be dissipated, "the sensible thing to do would be to teach England that war is a horrible and costly jag by letting England sweat out its World War II hangover unassisted."

We turn, retching, from the unctuous venom of such statements to arguments which are more dangerous because, unlike those of the Daily News, they are calculated to impress others than maniacs and morons.

There are, for instance, groups of people sincerely opposed to a loan on the ground that its effect will be to bolster British imperialism. Any such aid, they feel, should be strictly conditional on British agreement to clear out of Greece, or to give India its freedom, or to abrogate the Palestine White Paper. Our own views on British imperialism are a matter of record, but we do not believe that the way to combat it is to deny assistance to the British people at this time. The result would be to force them into a grim self-sufficiency: since under no circumstances can their small island supply them with even the barest means of existence, they would be impelled to organize an autarchic economy on an imperial scale. The bonds of empire would have to be tightened, not loosened; colonial production would have to be more intensively exploited to meet Britain's needs; colonial markets would have to be reserved exclusively for British products.

Forced to practice a more intensive economic imperialism than ever before, Britain would be bound to strengthen its political grip on the Empire. More than ever it would be obliged to guard its communications in the Mediterranean and the Middle East, keep Greece under its thumb, and follow whatever policy in Palestine enabled it to maintain its Asiatic bridgehead at the lowest cost.

In this country it is rather commonly believed that the Empire is already a tightly knit economic unit affording few opportunities for outside traders, but this is not in accordance with the facts. In 1938, for instance, Britain supplied only 24 per cent of the imports of the crown colonies and bought only 35 per cent of their exports. That left plenty of room for others, and the United States before the war found both its largest markets and its chief sources of raw materials within the British Empire, including the dominions. Britain itself was, indeed, the largest single foreign purchaser of American goods, taking 17 per cent of total exports. Moreover, Britain was the best customer of many of our best customers, providing the foreign exchange that enabled them to buy American automobiles and steel. Our foreign trade, therefore, was closely connected with that of Britain. In the years ahead when, once current shortages are overcome, we shall need overseas markets more than ever to absorb our industrial surpluses, the closing of the open door to the British Empire and its inclusion in an exclusive trading bloc would be a very severe blow to our economy.

Britain, we must realize, has had its margin of economic security dangerously curtailed by the war. It has lost 25 per cent of its wealth while ours has been enhanced. Its standard of living has been reduced while ours can rise 50 per cent above the pre-war level if we are intelligent enough to make use of our vast capacity for production. The loan will do little to relieve British austerity immediately; it is not large enough for that.

It will provide a breathing-spell while run-down industries are reequipped and lost markets recovered.

Britain needs aid but not so desperately as to suffer dictatorship of her foreign and imperial policies. Our economic strength has enabled us to strike a bargain obtaining in return for a loan British support for the kind of international trading system which corresponds to our economic needs. But should we attempt to introduce extraneous political objectives we should merely convince the British that our purpose is not to assist but to dominate. The upshot would surely be the sacrifice of economic objectives together with the loss of all power to influence British policies in the direction we desire.

Intervention for Democracy

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

INTERVENTION has almost as bad a name in Latin America as non-intervention in Europe. Both have come to signify, paradoxically, the same thing: big-power support of the forces of reaction. Non-intervention—or the treachery that bore that label—made possible the triumph of fascism in Spain. Intervention kept or put tyrants in power in half a dozen American republics. Known less respectfully as the policy of the Big Stick, it was symbolized by United States marines streaming ashore at Latin American ports to establish "order" in the name of Standard Oil or the National City Bank.

When the Good Neighbor era was inaugurated by Franklin Delano Roosevelt, it had many features that delighted its administrators and coordinators—good-will tours by Hollywood personalities, doctorates conferred upon unlettered dictators, cultural missions and, above all, financial benefits distributed with calculating discrimination, particularly among those countries whose friendship was least to be trusted. But in Latin America the Good Neighbor policy had only one important meaning for the ordinary man: it marked the end of gun-boat diplomacy and economic imperialism. Because the people of Latin America trusted Roosevelt, they forgave innumerable blunders and inconsistencies. It was enough, for the moment, that intervention had been repudiated as an instrument of policy. Only one fear remained, lurking in the wings. What would happen when Roosevelt's rule ended? Would his successor honor his pledge of non-intervention? Any change was certain to arouse misgiving.

It is a tragedy whose consequences are already visible that the death of Roosevelt should have coincided with the end of non-intervention as a workable policy in Latin America. Today the peoples of the continent are faced with the necessity of adopting an attitude against which their whole experience has conditioned them; they must accept intervention as the only alternative to the rapid consolidation of fascist tyranny. So far they are not prepared to do so: the great question is whether they will be able to recognize the facts and act in time.

The question is not an abstract one. It has been posed in concrete and challenging terms by the Perón dictatorship in Argentina. The program of Perón is as familiar as "Mein Kampf" and far more coherent. It has been expressed in a series of acts and pronouncements which establish the fascist boss of Argentina as the legitimate heir of his Axis predecessors. Readers who studied the memorandum submitted by the Nation Associates to the general Assembly of the UNO and published with last week's issue of The Nation know how far that program has already been carried into effect. Another document, telling the story chiefly in terms of dispatches, official notes, speeches, and decrees, is "The Argentine Regime" put out by the C. I. O. Committee on Latin American Affairs, and also submitted to the Assembly. Together, these compilations present an overwhelming indictment of the government which last spring joined the United Nations under the sponsorship of the United States. The Nation Associates has demanded Argentina's suspension on the basis of its flagrant violations of its commitments under the Act of Chapultepec. So far no action has been taken at London, although it is reported that the question may be raised this week in the Economic and Social Council. But the Memorandum and the C. I. O. report have generated wide discussion in the press and exposed the full meaning of Argentine facism to non-American delegates with little access to first-hand information. Whatever is done or not done at the present meeting of the UNO, the Argentine issue is out in the open. It will not be allowed to subside.

Luis Rodriguez, Mexican ambassador to Chile, is reported to have said that if Perón becomes president, nothing can prevent a general war in Latin America by 1950. This is certainly true if the Latin republics, backed by liberal opinion in the United States, continue stubbornly to reject all forms of intervention. Times have changed. International relations are threatened by a force more ugly and dangerous than Yankee imperialism at its toughest. The old interventionism consistently supported reaction; the new interventionism must organize the popular, democratic forces against fascism. Otherwise Perón and a host of other Peróns up and down the continent will make nonsense of the Act of Chapultepec and every attempt at pan-American friendship. The issue is as clear as that. How to create general support for this position is far from clear.

Uruguay's proposal of "collective intervention" by the American republics in countries where basic human rights are denied by dictatorial governments has aroused wide opposition; a recent Washington dispatch indicates that only six republics fully favor the plan. Nor is the opposition limited to countries with reactionary governments of their own. On the contrary, its most vehement expression has come from Mexico, and, in Mexico, from progressive persons and organizations. Anti-gringo feeling dies hard. It seems quite unlikely that the proposal in its original form can be adopted within the near future; it may not even be added to the agenda of the Rio conference.

Another plan, which would obviate many of the political and psychological difficulties inherent in the Uruguay suggestion, has come from Argentina itself. A number of prominent Argentine democrats of various parties signed a petition to the UNO asking for "multilateral intervention" to eliminate foci of Nazi-fascist infection wherever they may develop. The proposal is based upon the premise that any state which tolerates or protects the activities of foreign or domestic fascists is guilty of a threat to the peace justifying action by the Security Council. By shifting responsibility to the UNO, the signers obviously hope to eliminate the danger—and fear—of North American domination. Many Latin American republics would look with favor on a scheme which offered security not only among themselves but against the United States as well. Whether it will be equally acceptable in Washington is questionable.

To hand over even part of the task of inter-American security to the UNO involves a modification of the Monroe Doctrine which is bound to horrify many conservatives; for if Latin America is suspicious of interventionist policies sponsored by the United States, this country is even more wary of intervention originating outside the hemisphere. On the other hand, since we are at last committed to collective action on a world basis, it will be impossible in the long run to prevent cracks in the wall reared by President Monroe. The United States should in my opinion, endorse and defend the plan for multilateral sanctions against fascism—even in our own carefully guarded sphere of influence.

IMPORTANT EXPOSE

In next week's Nation

JUAN PERON: NAZI HEIR

By Stanley Ross

Argentina's fascist leader at first hand: his character, his boyhood, his training by the Nazis, his campaign tactics, and many other facts never before published in America.

Swastika Over the Senate

BY. I. F. STONE

Washington, February 1

EVER since January 18 the United States Senate presumably has been engaged in debating a motion by Senate Overton of Louisiana to incorporate in its journal the opening prayer delivered by the chaplain the day before. This parliamentary device, in Wilson's famous words, has again made it possible for "a little group of wilful men" to render "the great government of the United States helpless and contemptible." Despite a good deal of elephantine humor by some Southern Senators, there has been no attempt to hide the purpose of the maneuver. On January 17 Chavez of New Mexico took advantage of the delay in presenting the President's message and the presence of a Northern Democrat (Myers of Pennsylvania) in the chair to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of S 101. This bill, for a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission, has been blocked ever since it was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Education and Labor last May 24. "I ask the Senator," Chavez pleaded with Overton as the Chaplain's Prayer filibuster began, "whether he does not think that the bill should be voted down or voted up, one way or the other, after adequate and ample debate?" "The Senator might just as well ask me," Overton replied, "whether I do not think it ought to be voted up, because I think the Senator knows, as I know, that if the bill were put to a vote at the present time by the Senate it would be passed."

It is one of the minor paradoxes involved that this fight against fair treatment for minorities in the United States is being waged by a legislative minority, which boldly asserts its contempt for majority rule. "A mob," said Bilbo, who should be an authority on the subject, "is a majority. . . . Without the filibuster the minority would be at the mercy of the majority." When Taylor of Wyoming asked Tydings whether democracy was not "predicated upon the rule of the majority," the latter was derisive. "The rule of the majority," Tydings burst out. "The rule of votes. Majority to hades! The rule of petty political preference. The rule of the majority. The rule that has brought more bloodshed and turmoil and cruelty on this earth than any other thing I know of." So rapidly do recollections of the Axis dictatorships and their cost to the world vanish from the mind of a Maryland Senator.

S 101 forbids employers to deny jobs and labor unions to deny membership to any person because of his "race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry." The bill covers any employer with six or more workers who is "engaged in interstate or foreign commerce or in operations affecting such commerce." It would not make discrimination of this kind a crime but "an unfair employment practice," and the mechanism of enforcement would be the filing of a cease and desist order by the FEPC with a United States Circuit Court of Appeals. The FEPC would be an administrative body like the National Labor Relations Board or the Federal Trade Commission, and full rights of hearing, counsel, and appeal are of course provided. No penalties for non-compliance are provided other than those which the Circuit Court of Appeals may impose for disregard of its orders. This summary is made necessary by the extraordinary descriptions of the bill in the filibuster. Russell of Georgia said the result of the bill "would be the absolute nationalization of all business, industry, and agriculture." Bankhead of Alabama declared it would give the FEPC "wide-open authority, even going to the extent of capital punishment." McClellan of Arkansas termed the bill "the most vicious and destructive assault on human liberty that ever has been made in America." Even for a Southern Senator, this was a high fever.

In this anthology of absurdity, the honors seem to be divided between Tydings and George, the former for a picturesqueness verging on blasphemy, the latter for a lack of logic bordering on a kind of Senatorial delirium tremens. "It was cloture," Tydings cried, "that crucified Christ on the cross." For a breathless moment one wondered whether he would go on to accuse Pontius Pilate of being a Republican. George's prize remark came during his peroration. "We are called upon," was his solemn summation, "to go Nazi." However inadequate as a description of the bill, the remark accurately described the frame of mind in which most of the Southern Senators waged their filibuster. If any such naked racism is displayed by a German political assembly, we shall be forced to lengthen our term of occupation. There was, of course, the familiar charge that the bill would lead to miscegenation; reactionary Southerners have a profoundly revealing way of at once leaping into bed with the Negro problem. But they made it very clear that it was not the Negro alone whom they wanted to keep in his place.

Bilbo of "Dear Dago" letter fame played his expected part in the filibuster. There were sneers by Eastland of Mississippi at Jim Dombrowski of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare for his "typically old Southern name." There was much talk of "Anglo-Saxon Americanism," and digs at Mexicans which finally brought the angry retort from Chavez, "I am an American, and I am not begging the permission of anyone to be an American, notwithstanding my national origin." Chavez's Catholicism also figured in the debate, and even the American Indian did not escape slurs, Bankhead defended business men who do not wish to employ them. "There is something peculiar about an Indian," Bankhead advised, "which causes the white American not to want to be too closely associated with him." The filibuster was shot through with anti-Semitism. Eastland said that if the FEPC bill was constitutional and "if the Congress of the United States says that 10,000 Jewish drygoods merchants represent a discrimination against the Anglo-Saxon branch of the white race . . . then we may limit the number of Jews . . . in interstate business."

This kind of talk is dangerous business in a country which, unlike Germany, has more than one tiny minority. A country with 22,000,000 Catholics, 13,000,000 Negroes, 5,000,000 Jews, 3,000,000 persons of Spanish-speaking origin, 11,000,000 foreign born, and 23,000,000 children of foreign born is not a country in which it is safe to play with the matches of Anglo-Saxon white Protestant supremacy. The cruel and unjust treatment of the Negro, whom the South would suspend halfway between slavery and real freedom, may easily prove America's undoing. Even Senators like Lister Hill and Fulbright joined the filibustering pack. Pepper alone had the courage to stand aside, supporting cloture, though disclaiming an intention to vote for FEPC. "Nigger lover" is a potent political cry in the South. More disheartening than the Southerners, however, are the apathy displayed by some Northern Senators and the open support of the filibuster by Midwestern reactionaries.

Chavez has borne the brunt of the fight, with aid from Morse, Guffey, Myers, La Follette, Ball, Smith, and Aiken. The indifference of the majority has made this the easiest filibuster the Southerners ever waged; sessions end at 6 p. m. or earlier. Although Overton said frankly that the Democratic Party ought to remain "the white man's party" and that "the Negro made a very bad bargain" when he left the G. O. P. for the New Deal, Republican leadership is selling the Negro down the river in this fight despite the FEPC pledges of 1944. Vigorous action by the White House and Republican leadership could easily force cloture, but the White House is flaccid, and the Republican leader, White of Maine, said he would vote against the bill. This is the spectacle presented by the United States in the wake of a war against fascism and racism.

Of Meat and Men

BY WILLARD SHELTON

Of the staff of the Chicago Sun

Chicago, January 31

BY GOLLY, we beat the packers!" So said Herbert March, district director for the C. I. O. United Packinghouse Workers here in the nation's meat capital, to a cheering union meeting the day after the workers trooped back to their jobs.

The exuberance was a little premature. Union leaders had been assured by Secretary of Agriculture Anderson, who was operating the plants for the government, that any wage increase recommended by a Presidential fact-finding board would be put into effect. But they were not yet sure how much cash on the barrelhead the men would get from the fact-finders; they were frankly skeptical about Washington.

For twelve hours after government seizure President Lewis J. Clark refused to order his membership back to work; he and the other leaders felt the seizure order itself should have contained guaranties of wage increases. One spokesman added the safeguard, "The strike isn't over. If we don't get the raises, we will go out again." Yet, despite the uncertainty, the unionized workers in the meat industry had good reason to be proud of what they had accomplished by their eleven-day walkout.

The burden of the fight was carried by the C. I. O., which has by far the largest organization in the major packing companies. But the A. F. of L. Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen walked out at the same time; and their contribution, while relatively small in Chicago, helped the united front in other cities.

The strikers in Chicago gained a degree of community support which in the old days would have been inconceivable. Informed citizens are under no illusions about the character of one wing of Chicago's big industry. In it is found Sewell L. Avery of Montgomery, Ward, whose influence extends through United States Gypsum, Pullman-Standard, and Armour. In it also are numerous other powerful gentlemen who, in their interlocking directorates, have shown considerable reluctance to accept the spirit of the Wagner act. When, a few weeks before the packinghouse strike, Captain George Barnes of the police labor detail raided the picket lines outside some C. I. O.-struck gear plants, he was egged on by the Chicago Tribune, which inveighed loudly against "mobs." The union suspected that precedents were being created for the coming packinghouse and other strikes.

The anticipated police raids on packinghouse workers' picket lines did not materialize, except to a minor extent. This may have been partly due to the other newspapers, which reminded the Chicago police of their part in the massacre of Memorial Day, 1937. It was due more directly, however, to the extraordinary support mobilized for the workers by the so-called Back of the Yards Council. This curious institution is, in a way, the lengthened shadow of one Saul Alinsky, author of "Reveille for Radicals." The book has aroused a good deal of controversy, but among Chicago packinghouse workers there is complete agreement about the usefulness of the Yards Council. The stockyards community, sprawled across the southwestern part of Chicago, has been cooperating in the council for years and was organized in advance for the strike.

Three priests of the community were on the picket line the first day of the walkout, wearing large signs proclaiming themselves "On Strike!" They made it a little difficult for the police to raid the line. Corner grocers and druggists had been canvassed beforehand by the union and had agreed to grant credit to their customers. When local reporters asked business men in the area which side they favored, they replied something like this: "We sell to the workers, not the packing companies. Where do you think we stand?" An officer of the Drovers' National Bank, controlled by the packing interests, said the workers needed a raise and "knew what they were doing."

Packing is a low-wage industry, and the workers' relative position deteriorated during the war. For many years, even before unions came in, the common-labor rate in steel and packing was identical. But in October, 1945, the average straight-time hourly wage in packinghouses was only 87.6 cents, as contrasted with $1.06 in steel, $1.18 in automobiles, $1.27 in shipbuilding. There are industries in which wages are lower, but none in which the work is more unpleasant, few in which it is more dangerous. Packinghouse workers had no general pay increase after Pearl Harbor, though in a two-year fight they forced some "fringe" increases through the War Labor Board. The higher scales negotiated in 1941 merely lifted their pay above the shockingly low previous average of 66.6 cents an hour—equivalent to $26.64 a week. That was little above the factory average of twenty years earlier.

The day the strike began, Swift and Company announced that its hourly-wage employees had averaged $48.85 a week in October—but neglected to specify that this resulted from a forty-nine-hour week, including nine hours of overtime. When President Truman appointed his fact-finding board, the packers argued that this overtime would continue; the union neither believed the claim nor wanted the overtime. The workers asserted quite frankly that the companies preferred to pay penalty overtime now so as to check future wage demands when the labor market "loosened." They believed they deserved a living wage for a normal forty-hour week.

In the old days the packers used bloodshed to break the efforts of their workers to organize. The hog-butcher princes fought unionism in 1904 and 1921 as viciously as old George Pullman, in his "model" company town, fought the Chicago "anarchists" of the Haymarket riots. The C. I. O. Packinghouse Workers organized in the late '30's under the joint impetus of the Wagner act and the C. I. O. drive in the mass-production industries. They called a few strikes against the so-called "independent" packers, and in 1941 against the Chicago United Stockyards Transit Company, but had never before attempted a major walkout. They got their contracts with the Big Four, headed by Swift and Company, without being obliged to strike.

This does not mean that the Big Four welcomed collective bargaining. The first master contracts, covering whole companies, were signed only in 1942, through the intervention of the old National Defense Mediation Board. A brief filed with the WLB listed over 600 instances of alleged "provocation" of union members by management. The union leaders believe that the packers, like some other industrialists, had no serious objection to a strike at the present time—and hoped that public antagonism would break the union. The company negotiators, in any case, stubbornly refused to consent to an increase of more than 10 cents an hour. There was one moment when, in an exploratory way, they talked about 15 cents; but after an adjournment they went back to 10 cents.

In view of their lack of experience, the Packinghouse Workers did a remarkable strike job. The innumerable details of proper picket allocation, soup kitchens, mass-meetings on the long week-ends when worried wives might complain about the lack of pay checks were well handled. The picket lines were orderly but determined; there were few "incidents." The packers didn't operate, and didn't try to.

The union leaders, as I said above, were not very happy about government seizure and the fact-finding board. They are deeply suspicious of packer influence in the Department of Agriculture; they feared the fact-finders had 15 cents fixed in their minds as the proper figure for an increase, partly because the A. F. of L. seemed willing to accept 15 cents. The C. I. O. pointed out that with steel already ahead of the packinghouse workers and with Ford and Chrysler and the oil companies granting 18-cent increases, a 15-cent rise for them would place their industry even farther behind others.

They didn't like the prospect. But they ran their strike, ran it successfully, and got a pledge from the government before they went back to work. They have met their first big test of power without breaking. Perhaps they will "beat the packers" yet.

Haunted Housing

BY MAURICE ROSENBLATT

Former editor of the City Reporter; during the war a special agent with the Army Criminal Investigation Department

A BLIND veteran in New York writes that he cannot get an apartment for his mother and his seeing-eye dog. Another soldier returned from overseas finds the four members of his family compelled to live in four different counties. The mayor of Racine, Wisconsin, reports that "as many as sixteen to twenty persons are living in one or two rooms." In Texas a large ice-box is offered as a dwelling; in California the racing tipster has been joined by the "housing tout," a suave fellow who for $50 will tell you where to find a home. Newspapers no longer play up stories of five-way exchanges of city apartments; the humor of the situation has worn thin. With 10,000 soldiers becoming civilians daily, the 1,200,000 million families who now live doubled up will reach 3,000,000 in 1946.

Out of the welter of statistics and estimates some basic figures emerge which tell the story of America's housing problem:

New dwellings needed in 1946	3,500,000 units
Needed in the next ten years	12,600,000 units
Required minimum yearly building	1,260,000 units
Amount built in 1925, our greatest home-building year	937,000 units

To meet this need, it is estimated that at best 460,000 units can be constructed in 1946. More significant than any estimate is the number of units now actually being built—less than 70,000 in the whole United States, or no more than enough to take care of one week's discharged service men. The figures present us with the paradox of a demand so great that it could create a six-and-a-half-billion-dollar industry employing four and a half million men for ten years—outstripping even automobiles—and a limping building industry producing but a puny trickle of new construction.

Housing has been wrongly described as a war casualty. Many other factors, some predating the war by years, have contributed to the present crisis: an acute housing shortage existed before the war; families have increased by 3,000,000 since 1940, and some 1,400,000 service men have married; while there was considerable building after 1941, it was "temporary war housing," the government guaranteeing that it should not be used as permanent dwellings.

The war did create a shortage of materials and labor. We practically closed down brickyards and ceased making bathtubs, hardware, and essential fixtures. An unknown quantity of building materials was hoarded by dealers awaiting the repeal of the excess-profits tax. But at present the supply of materials is starting to flow, and most bottlenecks should be broken by spring.

One would have expected Congress to move swiftly after V-J Day, and to have passed remedial legislation by now. But the only action it has taken is the appropriation of $191,000,000 for dismantling 100,000 temporary units and setting them up in communities where they are needed. All other proposals, emergency or long-range, are still in the discussion stage. The most comprehensive housing program ever prepared, the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, has not yet reached the floor of the Senate; its passage there is expected, but after that it must run the gauntlet of the realty-minded members of the lower house. The bill provides for low-cost public housing, slum clearance, thirty-two-year-credit for owners of small homes, research into construction techniques and materials. It is a plan designed to insure that we shall not find ourselves in a similar housing crisis in 1956. We cannot look to it for immediate relief.

The lack of adequate housing, however, is hardly the fault of Congress or the Administration. The building and real-estate business has long been a stoutly defended citadel of private enterprise. If its speculative economics, its octopus financing, its outmoded techniques, and its creaking psychology were known to the public, the cause of the shortage would be no mystery.

The builder and real-estate operator imagine that the pressure for houses from a growing army of homeless people will send prices and rents to dizzy heights. The signs of this were clear enough during the war, when prices of old houses—on which there were no ceilings—went up 47 per cent in Chicago, 59 per cent in Los Angeles, 95 per cent in Denver. A bonanza at the end of the war seemed certain if only the government would get out of the way and let the ceilings collapse.

The OPA fears that an uncontrolled building boom will go up like a rocket and down like the stick. This happened after the last war when costs flew out of hand and buyers grew timid. The present tremendous demand for new housing comes largely from people in the middle income brackets and will evaporate if prices start rising. According to a survey conducted by the Architectural Forum 490,000 families are ready to buy or build homes right away, but they are thinking in terms of a median price of $5,345; 37 per cent of these families would put off building if costs rose $1,000.

If the building industry is to escape the disaster which followed the last war, four things must be avoided: in-

Here's What Went Wrong:

As Costs Went Up, the Volume of Building Went Down

flated building-material prices and construction costs, inflated selling prices of homes, early collapse of post-war activity, an epidemic of mortgage foreclosures. John B. Blandford, National Housing Administrator, says that the boom will be short-lived unless the new housing is within the means of the average family. To deal with the emergency the OPA favors a bill sponsored by Representative Wright Patman, which would give the federal government authority to set price ceilings on old and new dwellings and to allocate critically short materials to residential building.

After V-J Day the building industry, bent on a suicidal price binge and undisturbed either by the experience of the past or by the warnings of the OPA, set out to end all government controls. The first target was WPB Order L-41, which restricted home building to structures costing $8,000 or less. Shortly after the end of the war a Houston realtor, Hugh Potter, became assistant to Reconversion Director John W. Snyder, who administered L-41. Potter worked fast, and on October 15 L-41 ceased to operate. Having delivered this victory to the real-estate men Potter retired from public service.

Throughout the country real-estate dealers cashed in; one Washington builder made $50,000 overnight by raising the price on 50 houses from the $8,000 ceiling to $9,000. But with the lifting of regulations, priorities for home building were lost, and instead of going into the promised housing, materials went into commercial construction—gas stations and hot-dog stands. By Christmas the predictions of the OPA had become painful realities, and Mr. Snyder asked President Truman to bring back controls; this time 50 per cent of the critical materials were allocated to houses costing less than $10,000. Three months, however, had been lost.

The real-estate lobby in Washington is careful to speak in the name of "the American home owner," but actually it represents the speculators in real estate, many of whom build nothing and merely gamble in property. To them the American dream is a never-ending land boom. The lobby enjoys the backing of mortgage companies, chambers of commerce, and numerous banks in its fight against rent control, price ceilings, and the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill.

The National Association of Real Estate Boards, representing some thirty thousand brokers, dealers, and builders, maintains elaborate headquarters in Washington. Recently it established the National Real Estate Foundation to "supply information needed to clarify public issues which concern real property and stimulate property-owner groups to organized effort in order to protect their interests." The foundation was launched with an elaborate dinner for Congressmen. Senator McCarran proposed a bill to give it the dignity of a Congressional charter, something heretofore reserved for non-lobbying patriotic organizations. Originally the foundation sought a fund of $500,000, but its sights were raised when it received pledges for $125,000 and $100,000 from two Pittsburgh builders. With that kind of money around, the trustees finally decided to aim at $5,000,000 in the next twelve months. Contributions to the foundation are tax-exempt on the ground that its work is "educational." However, witnesses against the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill may obtain any of the foundation's "research material."

The scarcity economics and speculative attitude of the building industry are as much a result of the way we build houses as are cracks in the plaster or leaks in the roof. Embalmed in the typical American house are all the inefficient, expensive methods of an obsolescent industry. As far as construction and materials are concerned, there is no great difference between a house built today and one built in George Washington's time. A Bureau of Labor Statistics survey showed that in 1938 64 per cent of the home builders in seventy-two cities produced one house each, and only 6 per cent built as many as ten. Operating on so small a scale, a builder is unable to provide steady employment for the many skilled workmen required to build a house; frequently he distributes the various operations among subcontractors, whose respective profits are reflected in the price of the house. He cannot take advantage of the economies in either buying or production which a big output makes possible. He can only build for the well-to-do.

With home building still a handicraft industry it is no wonder that the most we can hope for is 500,000 new units in 1946 and 1,000,000 in 1947. However, not everyone is permanently wedded to the notion that we must go on building with archaic materials and techniques. Senator Kilgore wants home building to take advantage of the scientific and industrial advances made during the war. Many new materials have been developed which are suitable for mass-production of houses—new light metals, plastics, wall boards, cements, and so forth. With Senator Mitchell he is sponsoring a bill which provides that the National Housing Agency shall act as a centralized purchasing agency for local housing organizations, placing orders with private manufacturers when it has accumulated a sufficient number for low-cost volume production. These manufacturers' war plants are now standing idle. In buying houses from the National Housing Agency for resale or rent to veterans, local organizations would be aided by loans from that agency. No house would cost more than $5,000. Hearings by the Senate Banking Committee on the Mitchell-Kilgore bill will begin shortly. If it is passed, orders can be placed at once, and homes will be available in a few months instead of years. Only a measure of this kind can meet the present emergency.

At present people think of the housing crisis as temporary. Once they realize that they have no prospect of anything better than the abandoned busses, vacant stores, and Turkish baths in which they are now living, they will lose patience. The riots in Detroit, Pittsburgh, and Harlem were largely housing riots. Today many white communities have reached the pre-war density of Negro communities, and the urban Negro population is crowded beyond all endurance. There is no organized pro-housing lobby, and if the real-estate interests' multi-million-dollar machine prevails, explosions will occur. Present policies promise that the shortage will get worse in 1947 and reach a climax by the election year of 1948.

Philippine Aftermath

BY MILDRED ADAMS

Journalist and critic with a special interest in Hispanic American affairs

III. The End of the Road

FOR forty years we have been proud of our record in the Philippines. The best work was done in the first two decades, but the momentum continued. When we bungled in Cuba, contradicted ourselves in Puerto Rico, brought the Virgin Islands to the brink of starvation, we liked to rest our mind and our conscience with visions of little brown Filipinos smiling in little red schoolhouses. Nor was self-congratulation all. Our achievement there gave us a toe-hold from which to criticize other colonial powers.

The sin of pride has at last caught up with us. Unless something unforeseen happens, we are about to put the capstone on magnanimity by giving the Filipinos the independence we withheld from them forty-eight years ago. Unhappily, it is not going to be as generous a gift as we intended. It will be wrapped up in the tissue paper of fine speeches and mutual congratulations, but the truth is that political and economic independence will create problems in the islands so far-reaching as to cast doubt on our entire record.

In order to reexamine that record it is necessary to look back for a moment at 1898. We took the Philippines from Spain in an eight months' war that started in Cuba. To most Americans they looked like a by-product, and it was a favorite joke that most of our citizenry had to hunt up school geographies in order to find out where they were. However, our government thought enough of them, with Guam and Puerto Rico, to pay Spain $20,000,000 for them after taking them. It was a sum far larger in those days than in these.

What did we get for our money? Sovereignty over 114,400 square miles of tropical islands and seven million people—now increased to eighteen million—of assorted Oriental races, some fine harbors, and good rock for a military outpost. The Filipinos were not pleased. While we were dickering with Spain, by force and otherwise, they were setting themselves up as a republic, establishing a capital, choosing an assembly, making a constitution. Two days after they proclaimed their constitution we ratified a treaty with Spain. It took us three years of jungle fighting to prove to the Filipinos that our treaty had more power than their constitution.

Meanwhile debates were raging at home. Americans were not united on this new policy of conquest. It seemed to many no part of the role of a freedom-loving nation to take other peoples into subjection. The Taft Commission, appointed by President McKinley in 1900 to go out and construct a civil government for the islands, was told to bear in mind that "the government which they are establishing is designed, not for our satisfaction or for the expression of our theoretical views, but for the happiness, peace, and prosperity of the people of the Philippine Islands."

So we entered on our new role with a divided mind. One day we were a nation of liberators rescuing people from the feudal tyranny of Spain; the next we were budding imperialists. The net result was an attack of conscience that showed itself in programs of education, sanitation, road-building which were gradually welded into what we liked to call an American colonial policy. That policy was founded on the belief that the American pattern of self-government was the best in the world for any people, no matter what their background, that democracy and self-support were synonymous, and that the highroad to both led through the American schoolhouse.

The population of the islands was made up of forty-three separate ethnic groups, mutually distrustful, speaking no common language, having no common religion. Only 18 per cent of the people had been taught to read and write Spanish by the religious orders that controlled education. Land was held, agriculture managed, trade carried on by perhaps 250,000 of the seven million people living there. Government was in the hands of Spanish officials and persons of pure or mixed Spanish blood who had made money and acquired position. The social structure was the squat pyramid familiar in Europe and Asia, with a huge peasant class at the bottom and a small élite on top. The efforts of the United States since 1898 have been directed toward narrowing that pyramid at the base and widening it at the center by encouraging the growth of a middle class.

To what extent those and other of our efforts have succeeded is told succinctly in the report made for the year ending June 20, 1941, by Francis Sayre, then High Commissioner for the Philippines.

From the beginning of American occupation of the islands to the present time efforts have been concentrated [he said] on advancement of education, public health, self-government, and an increasing national income, apparently with confidence that success in these fields would automatically bring about an improved social organization. That substantial success was achieved in these aims is incontestable. Literacy rose from 18 per cent in 1903 to over 48 per cent in 1939. All serious tropical epidemics have been either practically eliminated or brought under definite control, with a surprising decrease in infant mortality and a marked increase in longevity. Self-government has reached its maximum short of sovereign independence. . . . The national income as measured by overseas and domestic trade values has increased fivefold. And yet . . . neither a sizable independent middle class nor an influential public opinion has developed. The bulk of the newly created income has gone to the government, to landlords, and to urban areas, and has served but little to ameliorate living conditions among the almost feudal peasantry. . . . Maldistribution of population, of land, and of wealth in many forms continues . . . and social unrest has reached serious proportions.

That was the state of affairs six months before the Japanese struck at Pearl Harbor and the Philippines. Economic problems were bulking even larger than social problems. Nor had the dream of democracy—a dream obviously hard to put into practice among a people half of whom were illiterate—been strong enough to bar out the competing voices. José Laurel, then justice of the Supreme Court, told law students at the University of the Philippines in 1941 that he would accept "a benevolent dictatorship," and cited Japan as "an excellent example" of such a dictatorship. Pedro Abad Santos, an agrarian Socialist deputy, declared that "our country is dominated economically and politically by Spanish and Japanese fascists, through Filipino dummies, saboteurs, and traitorous public officials."

There were other disquieting straws. Licensed gambling was increasing. The Philippine government cut elementary-school education from seven to six years and abolished compulsory learning of English. It declared a modified Tagalog to be the national language, but only a portion of the population could speak or understand it. In spite of the imminence of freedom, the national economy was still tied tight to the United States; 80 per cent of the islands' commerce was with us, and dependent on a continuance of free trade. It was not a hopeful picture, and the war made it infinitely worse by adding enormous physical destruction to existing difficulties.

How far are we responsible for the present unhappy situation, and what can we do about it? To an industrial nation accustomed to performing feats of rapid large-scale construction the physical damage resulting from the war is perhaps less daunting than it looks to the Filipinos. The army has both equipment and material in the Pacific for a vast amount of building. The most cautious estimates of war damage run around $250,000,000. That is more than ten times the sum we paid for all the islands, but values have changed in forty-eight years. The physical destruction could be repaired were we minded to do it.

Far more serious are the ills for which we are more directly responsible—the political cynicism and irresponsibility of political leaders who found Japanese totalitarianism a tenable ideal, economic methods which though obsolete are deeply rooted and strongly defended, the half-completed program of national education which seems now to be going backward, the social maladjustments, the widening gulf between leaders and people. Half a century was too short a time in which to do as big a job as we undertook.

Hardly less important than the time element is the wavering course we have pursued. When we took the Philippines from Spain, the Republican Party with its emphasis on centralized power was in control, and it stayed in control until 1912. Educators, road builders, sanitation experts, governors were sent out to do the kind of job that would bind the Philippines closer to the United States. With the election of Woodrow Wilson in 1912, an entirely different set of men and theories took command. Where the Filipinos had been treated with kindly paternalism they were now encouraged, at least in theory, to act as equals. Francis Burton Harrison, sent out as the new Democratic Governor General, brought them a message from President Wilson explaining that "every step we take will be taken with a view to the ultimate independence of the islands and as a preparation for that independence." In 1916 the Jones bill—which Filipinos called, in good Spanish, the "bill Jones"—was passed to start them on the road to independence.

Then the pendulum swung the other way. President Harding, elected in 1920, sent out the Wood-Forbes Mission to survey conditions, and the report it brought back was that independence at that time would be premature. Governor Harrison was replaced by General Wood, and then by Henry Stimson. In 1932 the Democrats were back in power. That meant a better chance for early independence. The Filipinos strengthened their mission in Washington, and by January, 1933, an independence bill had been passed in Congress and vetoed by Hoover, still in office. They had found friends among American sugar and dairy men who wanted nothing better than to be free of the competition offered by the Philippine products. Under the guise of sentimental interest in Filipino aspirations the Tydings-MacDuffie act was framed and passed in 1934. The Filipinos were to set up their own Commonwealth in 1935 and to be free of all allegiance to the United States in 1946.

During these years, in spite of the change of Administrations, there was a measurable progress toward island self-government. High Commissioner Paul McNutt, in his famous report for 1938, charged that in economic matters just exactly the opposite had been happening.

Since 1913 American trade policy has forced the Philippine economic establishment into a position of complete dependence on the United States, until today it is doubtful whether any other sizable colony is as economically dependent on its metropolis. . . . In economic policy America has bound the Philippines to her, while at the same time in political policy America has presumed to sever the Philippines from her.

The Tydings-MacDuffie act, which will cut the final cord in 1946, was, in Mr. McNutt's opinion, the result of "a clever but dangerous trade-off."

On one side the representatives of American groups, smarting under the competition, whether real or assumed, of Philippine exports, would have been content with correction of the economic policy without reference to the political. On the other side, Philippine political entities, fretting under what little remained of colonialism, wished fulfilment of the political policy without change of the economic. Each made use of the other: the former conceded political points; the latter conceded economic points. In this bargain the American group shunned responsibility for their country's fair acquittal of colonial obligation, and the Philippine elements abandoned consideration of the material welfare of the fifteen million people.

The charge was serious enough seven years ago. But there was still time, then, to do something about it, and as a matter of fact the act was somewhat modified.

The independence date, however, was not changed, and today it is only five months off.

Rightly or wrongly we assumed certain obligations in the Philippines in 1898, and no fair-minded person can assert that we shall have adequately discharged them by dropping the islands into depression and chaos under the pretense of handing them the gift of independence. Freedom to starve is not what we promised. There seems little hope that they will get much more than that. We cannot withdraw our promise to grant them independence on July 4 without creating grave international difficulties. Philippine politicians cannot ask us to postpone the gift without "losing face" at home and abroad.

All that can be expected is an effort to mitigate the situation, and High Commissioner McNutt will presumably make it. The Filipinos elect a new government in April, and incoming officials will have two months in which to make their proposals to Washington. There is still a rumor that Roxas, if elected, will consider asking that after independence becomes a fact we invite the islands back into a kind of dominion status. Meanwhile the Bell bill before the House would extend virtual free trade to the Philippines for the first eight years, followed by a twenty-five-year period in which tariffs on Philippine imports would gradually reach the level of duties on goods from other countries. One of the four Tydings bills before the Senate would hand them a kind of going-away present of $100,000,000 with which to repair the physical damage wrought by the war. And plans for American military and naval outposts there, whatever evils they may bring, would at least assure the continued circulation of dollars.

President Osmeña

With all these factors in mind, the realist's guess as to the future is a kind of pseudo-independence in which the Philippines will be nominally free but actually under an undefined protection exercised by the United States for its own purposes with little consideration of its effect on the Filipinos. Perhaps the islands will become the Cuba of the Pacific, but too far away to reap the financial advantages of a prosperous tourist trade. Any Cuban will tell them it is not a happy fate.

[This is the last of a series of articles by Miss Adams on the Philippine problem.]

Adventures in Medicine

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

IN NO other field, not even in politics, is the gap between knowledge and action of such immediate and catastrophic consequence as in the field of medicine. Thousands of lives are sacrificed every year because available knowledge cannot be adequately applied or has not been intensely enough developed. Our state of health mirrors a combination of miraculous accomplishment and utter confusion, of daring advance and shabby stinginess. If science is to make our lives healthier and happier, there must be concerted action by both progressive physicians and progressive patients, citizens all. These articles will try to spread knowledge of medical facts so that the decisive battle for public health can be fought more efficiently and with greater hope of victory.

Despite its constant need of money, medical research is the cheapest buy in human happiness. The tremendous achievements of medical research in war time, saving uncounted lives, were performed on a total budget of fifteen million dollars, less than the cost of a single day of destructive warfare. One of the most important research projects I know about is being carried on as a result of a private grant of $15,000 made to an outstanding scientist by the parents of a boy who died of an "incurable" disease. What can be done in a short space of time with $1,100,000 provides another striking example. Many decades ago, Dr. Simon Baruch impressed his son Bernard with the possibilities of physical therapy. In October, 1943, Bernard M. Baruch invited a committee of forty scientists to draw up a program for the development of physical medicine in the United States and six months later gave the generous sum of $1,100,000 to activate the recommended program.

When he did this, not quite two years ago, physical medicine in this country was one of the least respected of medical specialties. According to a recent definition of the American Medical Association, physical medicine is "the employment of the physical and other effective properties of light, heat, cold, water, electricity, massage, manipulation, exercise, and mechanical devices for physical and occupational therapy in the treatment and diagnosis of disease." Today, largely as a result of Mr. Baruch's efforts, medical science has discovered the immense possibilities in this relatively new field. A fact-finding survey conducted by Dr. F. H. Krusen, the director of the Baruch committee, has just published its report in the Proceedings of the Staff Meetings of the Mayo Clinic (December 26, 1945). It reads like a "physician in Wonderland," but gives a mere glimpse of the future of physical medicine.

On one of his visits to college and industrial research laboratories, Dr. Krusen saw a one-million-volt electron accelerator which by providing radiation right up to the edge of the cosmic rays opened a whole new field for investigation in the realm of physical medicine. He saw electronic tubes which can direct microwaves of high-frequency energy along a beam toward a certain part of the body and focus on a spot five centimeters in diameter—a most important device for the study of the effect of microwaves on human tissues.

Dr. Krusen reported that it will soon be possible to make binaural hearing aids enabling the deaf to tell from what direction a sound comes. There will also be hearing devices operated with the electric current from a household light socket which will be far superior to our present portable devices.

A new photo-electric spectrophotometer has been perfected which will be helpful in dealing with nearly all color problems. A new exposure meter measuring time against intensity of radiation will make dosage in radiation therapy much more accurate. New types of cathode-ray oscillographs can be applied to the medical study of electrical circuits—as in the electro-cardiograph.

Dr. Hillyer of the University of Toronto has developed a table model of an electron microscope which gives a clear picture of an object magnified one hundred thousand times. "The medical possibilities are almost beyond imagination." An electron analyzer can dissect microscopic substances far smaller than have even been examined in the past, opening new fields of medical physics. Dr. Hillyer said only half jokingly that by a process called electronprobe it would be perfectly possible to write one's name on a bacterium. Dr. Engstrom, a leading radio engineer, said, "The main thing lacking is proper liaison between radio engineers and physicians." The tools for many still unforeseen achievements are ready and waiting for medical science to take up.

The new concept of "physical medicine" has already tremendously improved the traditional stagnant methods of "physical therapy" in the rehabilitation of disabled soldiers. As Major Henry B. Gwynn of the Reconditioning Consultants' Division of the army recently wrote, "No more will we hear patients told, 'Your stitches are out now, you can go home tomorrow. When you get home, take it easy for a while, and when you feel strong enough, go back to work.'" The convalescent routines applied to the sick and disabled have been completely revolutionized. Dr. George Deaver of the Institute for the Crippled and Disabled in New York has analyzed thirty-seven basic skills which each disabled person must strive to acquire in order to become self-reliant. These include opening and closing a door, crossing a street from curb to curb while a green light is on, climbing bus steps, holding on to an overhead strap in a bus, dressing and undressing, rising from a chair, feeding oneself, using a telephone, opening and sealing letters, writing. Dr. Gwynn foresees that public opinion will force the development of reconditioning projects for civilians also. "However," he says, "to be successful such a program must also have the enthusiastic support of the medical profession. This will only be obtained when sufficient scientific data are assembled to change ideas which have been in vogue for hundreds of years."

Progress in collecting these data will be largely due to Baruch's humanitarian effort to revive research in physical medicine and improve its practice. Columbia University's College of Physicians and Surgeons has received $400,000 to organize a model center for such research; the Harvard Medical School, $30,000 for fellowships; the University of Minnesota Medical School, $40,000 to promote the teaching of physical medicine;

the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, $50,000 for research in biophysics, electronics, and instrumentation; the University of Southern California, $30,000 for teaching and research; the Medical College of Virginia, $250,000 to inaugurate a center for hydrology; New York University's College of Medicine, $250,000 to establish a center devoting special attention to structural mechanics; $200,000 has been set aside for fellowships and minor projects in the field.

What has been done for physical medicine by Baruch can be done for other neglected areas of medical research—for the study of vascular diseases and of arthritic conditions, to name only two of the most urgent tasks. But we cannot afford to wait for the generous impulse of rich humanitarians. The community itself must raise and spend the money needed for scientific research. Compared with what is wasted every year by our local and federal governments on all kinds of unnecessary projects, the amount required is negligible.

[Dr. Gumpert, a New York physician, will contribute regular discussions of new developments in medicine and related fields.]

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

The Unsettled Air

IN THE relaxed atmosphere of Bermuda an Anglo-American conference has been seeking to complete the Temple of Freedom of the Air which was left in a sadly unfinished state at Chicago in 1944. At that earlier conference, in which fifty-two nations participated, the United States and Britain emerged as the protagonists of two very different theories. The United States argued for maximum freedom of the international air on a purely competitive basis. Britain protested that there must be provision for orderly regulation of air traffic lest freedom breed license.

Although self-interest was the instructor of each country's attitude, both could make out a respectable case on general principles. Maximum freedom undoubtedly offered the United States maximum opportunity to win a major share of the world's air traffic. It had made great strides in the design of civil aircraft during the war and built up an unequaled experience of inter-continental flying. It had the men, the machines, the "know-how," and was all set to go while the other principal air powers were slowly disentangling themselves from their war wreckage. Yet American spokesmen could claim reasonably enough that rapid development of air communications would benefit the world at large. Progress, they said, should not be stifled because of temporary American ascendancy; air travel should not be established as a costly luxury by freezing fares at levels protecting the least efficient operators.

Before the war American international air business had been conducted by a monopoly concern largely along non-competitive routes. Britain, on the other hand, had had plenty of experience of competition and had found its fruits bitter. Since considerations both of national prestige and national defense were involved, air transport was promoted by many countries without regard to economics, and competition, being subsidized, lost all meaning as a stimulant to efficiency. The British observed that development of air transport had proceeded swiftly inside the United States under conditions of regulated competition and urged an international authority to control international air routes as the Civil Aeronautics Board controls American domestic air routes. This sounds fair enough, but such an authority, made up of national representatives, could not be a judicial body; it could merely furnish a forum for the compromise of conflicting national claims. No doubt it would provide a breathing-spell for countries like Britain, but its effect on American aviation would be stifling.

Weeks of effort at Chicago produced no reconciliation between these two points of view. Britain, with most other countries, was willing enough to sign a "two-freedoms" convention providing for rights of passage through the air of other nations and of landing for technical reasons, but only a minority of the delegates joined the United States in approving the full "five-freedoms" convention, which supplemented privileges of flight with privileges of trade. The third and fourth freedoms embody the right to discharge traffic carried between the country of origin of an air transport and the country of its landing and to pick up traffic for the return journey; the fifth confers on an air carrier whose route crosses several countries the privilege of picking up and putting down traffic along the way, provided a frontier intervenes between embarkation and discharge.

At Chicago the fifth freedom aroused the most controversy, and it is still causing trouble in Bermuda. From the American point of view it is essential for the profitable development of long-distance routes. Without it an air line flying from New York to Istanbul would cross Europe with a diminishing number of seats occupied, as its original passengers reached their various destinations. However, it can readily be seen that for countries on the western rim of Europe the grant of this freedom means increased competition for local traffic. Moreover, it is not so valuable a privilege for European air lines entering the United States. True, on reaching New York they can take on passengers for Mexico or the Orient. But under the principle of "cabotage" domestic traffic is reserved for domestic concerns; so that a foreign plane en route to Australia cannot accept traffic from New York to San Francisco even though it is half-empty. Thus European air lines are likely to stop at America's Atlantic seaboard, while their American competitors flying east, once assured of the fifth freedom, can profitably hedge-hop across Europe's numerous frontiers.

To safeguard their position the British feel that the fifth freedom should be limited, if granted at all, or that some method of preventing a cutthroat fight for traffic should be devised. A few months ago the International Air Transport Association, to which fifty-seven air lines of various nationalities belong, decided to set up a number of regional "conferences" covering all international routes. Modeled on the conferences which have regulated international shipping for many years, these bodies were to deal with tariffs, rates, schedules, and other matters of common interest. The British appear to be willing to accept this method of curbing competition as a substitute for an official controlling body; in the recent row over Pan-American's rate-slashing they professed their readiness to accept any transatlantic fares indorsed by the I. A. T. A. The Civil Aeronautics Board, on the other hand, has been hesitant about giving its blessing, fearing that participation by American companies in the conferences would violate the anti-trust laws. However, reports from Bermuda suggest that the board may be modifying its stand, since by its power to approve or disapprove specific agreements reached through the I. A. T. A. machinery it would retain some control over foreign air rates.

If these and other outstanding issues can be satisfactorily cleared up at Bermuda, there should be good hopes of an early expansion of international traffic, particularly on the North Atlantic route. At present about fifteen round trips are being flown weekly between the United States and Europe; soon, it is expected, there will be six trips daily. Over a period there ought to be a steady fall in fares and, as a result of the immense saving in time, an exchange of travelers between America and Europe on a scale vastly greater than ever before.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

DURING the recent French crisis the Yankee dollar presided majestically over the discussions. The Socialists and Communists together might have formed a Cabinet, but they were paralyzed by the fear that a left coalition would get no financial aid from the United States. It was the dollar that finally decided the moderate M. R. P. to join a three-party government without De Gaulle. "If we had said no," explained General Secretary Maurice Schumann, "the irreparable schism would have precipitated the financial stampede which already threatens us. France would have lost any hope of support from the other side of the Atlantic for her currency."

The example of the British loan is present in every French mind; though the Labor government retained the conservative Viscount Halifax as its ambassador and sent as principal financial negotiator a non-Labor economist, Lord Keynes, the fact that Labor is in power has increased Britain's difficulties. The campaign against "propping up socialism and communism with U. S. money" is not confined this time to the Chicago Tribune and the Daily News. Bernard Baruch himself has expressed the view that America should not make loans to countries whose post-war economic policy is geared to nationalization of industry. Even the gospel of liberalism is not quite broad enough to include dollar credits for nations which stray too far from economic orthodoxy.

In Poland, where the government has decided to nationalize basic industries, pre-war American investments are a stumbling-block. The American ambassador, Arthur Bliss Lane, recently indicated that he would not, under present circumstances, advise the United States to lend funds to Poland for rehabilitation purposes, charging that the government's economic policy violates the 1931 treaty of commerce and friendship.

Even when it is not planning an early visit abroad, the dollar exerts tremendous influence. Two years ago no one in Italy was thinking in terms of an immediate loan from the United States; American aid was a dream for some distant day in the future. But that day, nevertheless, weighed heavily on Italian political developments. The magnificent spirit of revolt that animated the underground of the north was soon dampened by the realization that partisans and maquisards were not popular in Wall Street. The fear of alienating American capital became an obsession and provided one of the weapons used by the House of Savoy and the Vatican in their fight against the left. The new Holy Alliance, directed today as in the time of Metternich against the revolution, has found in the dollar its twentieth-century emblem.

Homesickness may hasten the return of the armies of occupation, but the dollar never gets homesick. It can be kept in Europe indefinitely, maintaining America's position in world economic affairs. Today this country is about to enter a period of unparalleled industrial and commercial prosperity; its financial power, by absolute standards enormous, is still greater in a world of devastation. In the course of one man's lifetime the relationship of the United States to Europe has undergone a profound change. Before 1914 the three leading industrial countries of Europe—England, France, and Germany—were all creditor nations with capital investments throughout the world. The United States was a debtor nation. After World War I Germany disappeared as a creditor country. France began to go downhill, and World War II finally pushed it into the queue of borrowers.

There remained only Britain with its empire. Today it is anxiously hoping that the United States Congress will approve the loan just negotiated here. With the exception of Sweden and Switzerland, two little countries, Europe has become a continent of debtors, while the United States has emerged as the one great creditor nation of the world. Europe lacks food, machinery, transport; left and right are engaged in a bitter struggle for power. This is the moment, American reactionaries believe, to drive the old Continent along the path they think it should take. In five years perhaps the European nations will have found a way out. Until then, the dollar can make the rules.

It can make them just as long as the left in Europe clings to the policy of gradual change. But if it is driven by despair, by misery, by the pressure of reaction at home or abroad to take the hard road of revolution, then it will sweep over all obstacles; hardships will not count. In October, 1917, Kerensky said, "I should like to see who is fool enough to take over the government in the present disastrous situation." Lenin answered, "Here we are." And until 1927, when it got a loan of three hundred million marks from Germany, the Soviet Union fought and won its struggle for existence without a cent from abroad. As a delegate of the Nansen Committee of the League of Nations, I visited one of the worst famine areas of the Ukraine in 1922. I still remember as a nightmare the suffering I saw there. But when I reached Moscow, the Russian leaders were talking not of loans but of expelling foreign relief agencies that were trying to buy off the revolution with bread and money.

Europe has not gone that far. There is still a possibility of peaceful, democratic change, provided the dollar's role is restricted to normal financial operations. The rebuilding and restocking of the old Continent offers enough opportunities for profit at a legitimate rate, no matter what its social system. It is not necessary to fabricate an inevitable clash between free-enterprise nations and nations with a controlled economy. But if American capitalism tries to use its power as a political instrument, instead of preventing, it will only precipitate, revolution. Leaving aside moral considerations, the attempt to manipulate Europe's future would make sense only if the leftward trend were transitory. But Europe's swing toward socialism is part of the historical process, and while it may be delayed or distorted, it cannot be stopped.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

TOCQUEVILLE'S prognosis, in "Democracy in America," of the possible effects of the spread of democracy on the practice and appreciation of the arts makes fascinating reading more than a century after it was set down. Even a less perspicacious man than Tocqueville could have foreseen that a social development which brought to millions of people their first heady and releasing experience of adequate food and shelter, personal liberty, and literacy would be accompanied by a reaction against everything associated with aristocratic society—the intellectual and aesthetic values it had forged as well as the social, political, and economic vices it had perpetuated. Nevertheless, it is interesting to set his picture of "literature in democratic ages" beside the reality, particularly in America in 1946.

Taken as a whole, [it] can never present, as it does in the periods of aristocracy, an aspect of order, regularity, science, and art; its form, on the contrary, will ordinarily be slighted, sometimes despised. Style will frequently be fantastic, incorrect, overburdened, and loose, almost always vehement and bold . . . there will be more wit than erudition, more imagination than profundity, and literary performances will bear marks of an untutored and rude vigor of thought, frequently of great variety and singular fecundity.

Democratic nations will cultivate the arts that serve to render life easy in preference to those whose object is to adorn it. They will . . . prefer the useful to the beautiful, and they will require that the beautiful should be useful.

If it should happen that the men of some one period were agreed upon . . . rules, that would prove nothing for the following period; for among democratic nations each new generation is a new people.

They prefer books which may be easily procured, quickly read, and which require no learned researches to be understood.

Democracy not only infuses a taste for letters among the trading classes but introduces a trading spirit into literature.

The ever-increasing crowd of readers and their continual craving for something new insure the sale of books that nobody much esteems.

Democratic literature is always infested with a tribe of writers who look upon letters as a mere trade; and for some few great authors who adorn it, you may reckon thousands of idea-mongers.

The warnings of a thousand Tocquevilles could not have prevented the dilution and decline of taste in its pre-democratic manifestations, the scorn of conventions of style and form, the distaste for tradition or "what is ancient." And all these tendencies have had, of course, some wonderful as well as some unfortunate results. The spread of democracy brought, and will continue to bring, into potential play a truly limitless reservoir of human talent and vitality. It was

—and I persist in thinking it still is—logical to assume that the cultural achievements of a democratic society may outstrip those of the past. Yet in America today the practice and appreciation of the arts are for the most part carried on at a level which must be the despair of people like myself who feel that man cannot live by technology alone, and that the arts are one great means both of expressing and of satisfying man's deepest needs and aspirations.

One measure of what seems to me nothing less serious than a crisis of culture in this country is the very fact that culture is still regarded not only as something extraneous to life but also as a refinement, a decoration, which he-men and true democrats can very well do without. (This attitude took a new lease on life during the war when the arts were looked upon, even by some "enlightened" liberals, as a branch of human endeavor which might be forgone until after the slaughter had ended.) The civilized world was shocked at the notorious Nazi statement: "When I hear the word culture I reach for my revolver." Here, too many people when they hear the word culture are likely to reach for a guffaw if not for a revolver, and culture is a word that one hesitates to use seriously for fear of being dismissed as a snob. As a people we have still to learn that culture is not an outmoded aristocratic pastime but a life-giving, life-renewing force as essential to the welfare of the race as reproduction is to its continuation.

Yet though the word culture is scorned, the substance of it is still demanded, for the simple reason that it fills an elementary human need. The tragedy is that a substitute has been offered and widely accepted which not only fails to fill the need but which seems to me to threaten the very production as well as the appreciation of the real thing.

The substitute is a commercial commodity known as entertainment. It is what one gets at movies, over the radio, and in a large proportion of books, especially books of fiction. This entertainment is in all basic ways the antithesis of genuine art. Being mass-produced, it is aimed at what is called the average but is actually the sub-adult if not sub-normal intelligence; it is not rooted in the real world; and its function is the very opposite of catharsis. Tocqueville predicted that men in democratic societies would be susceptible to an inordinate love of physical gratification. He could not foresee that even the arts, in the hands of exploiters of the ordinary man's non-material needs, would one day be converted into merely another form of "virtuous materialism," a gratification comparable to an easy chair or a warm bath. For what else is the average movie, the average radio program, the average best-seller?

The passivity of the American movie audience has often been noted. How could it be otherwise when we consider that the movies are forced in dealing with sex to adhere to a set of hypocritical and outmoded attitudes, that they invoke religious assumptions which no longer regulate behavior, that no political question can be explored, that an honest film about American life is as rare as hen's teeth, and that the productions of Hollywood are largely enervating daydreams wrapped in cellophane. How could it be otherwise, in a word, when every human emotion, every political impulse, every aesthetic drive is passed through a mill where it is sterilized and molded into pink pills of "harmless" entertainment. And the American people have been so thoroughly conditioned to this fare that even a serious film must be presented as only another pink pill.

The other evening in a movie theater I saw a preview of "The Last Chance," a film depicting the desperate struggle of a group of refugees to escape from German-occupied territory. At the end the following "promotion" line was thrown on the screen: "The Last Chance! The Last Word in Entertainment." That line seems to me to epitomize the vicious elements in mass-production entertainment—its commercialism, the deep contempt for human beings which underlies it, and finally what can only be called its brutalizing effect. "Enervating," "brutalizing," "vicious" are strong words. They are not too strong to apply to entertainment which titillates but does not satisfy, and which exploits and perpetuates not the adult but the adolescent desires of millions of people.

The stock defense of the masters of the entertainment industry is that they give the people "what they want." This is to my mind one of the most cynical half-truths ever invented to salve a guilty conscience. I know that most people devour what they get and crave more. But we all know that "what the people want" is largely what they have been led to think they want—and my own theory is that they ask for more of what they get not because it satisfies them but precisely because it does not satisfy but only exacerbates their hunger.

Even so, I am convinced that people don't even think they want many of the idiocies perpetrated on the screen; and if all the radio listeners who hate and scoff at commercials or at the latest regurgitations of dead jokes or at the painful frenzy of the gag writers could be organized for a march on Radio City, the earth of Manhattan would tremble and the towers fall. The marchers would probably be joined by many of the gag writers and by the otherwise harmless people whose rich, deep commercial reiterations are so offensive.

But the cultural revolution I dream about is, I'm afraid, not imminent. For one thing, mass-production entertainment induces apathy. For another, the very element of mass-production raises a formidable barrier to effective resistance. The man who sits before a screen or a radio, even though he may be outraged, also feels helpless.

What remedies then? I can think of two remedies, but neither, alas, seems very probable. One would be an organized movement to abolish the Hays code of censorship, of which the influence is not confined to films and which in its attempt to keep public entertainment from being "offensive" has made it genuinely offensive, morally, intellectually, and politically. The other is a concerted, widespread, and continuing attack by a corps of honest and intelligent critics. It seems little enough to ask or expect, but at least in the literary field, which is the one I know best, the prospects of such a development are very slim. On the contrary, the so-called critics, it seems to me, are going over to the

MICHAEL SAYERS
and ALBERT E. KAHN

authors of
SABOTAGE and THE PLOT AGAINST THE PEACE

The Great Conspiracy

THE SECRET WAR AGAINST SOVIET RUSSIA

This book about Russia, which sets the record straight after 25 years of misrepresentation, is an absorbing narrative about the actual personalities who fomented treason and terror within and the international plots without, which almost separated the democracies from their natural ally, the Soviet Union.

Frederick L. Schuman, Woodrow Wilson Professor of Government at Williams College, says: "Documented and indisputable even in its most startling episodes... the book is an unanswerable challenge to the new war-mongers of today."

At all bookstores • $3.50

LITTLE, BROWN AND COMPANY

+ MIDWINTER + BOOK NUMBER

Reviews of the more important books of the season will be featured by THE NATION in its regular Midwinter Book Number to appear on February 23.

Publishers wishing to utilize the special advantages offered by this feature issue for advertising of better books are urged to make space reservations as soon as possible. Deadlines: for space reservations, February 8; for final OK's or complete plates, February 14. Publisher's advertising rate, $200 per page. For information, phone BAR-clay 7-1066 or write.

ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT

THE Nation

20 VESEY STREET

NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Flash! Book Values: World of Washington Irving, Van Wyck Brooks, $1.50; Seas of God, ed. Whit Burnett, $1.50; Cross and the Arrow, A. Maltz, $1.00; Leaf in the Storm, L. Yutang, $1.00; Vigil of a Nation, L. Yutang, $1.00; China To Me, Emily Hahn, $1.50; Cuckoo Time, R. Temple, $1.25; Gravediggers of France, Pertinax, $1.50; Ann and the King of Siam, London, $1.50; The Last Frontier, H. Fast, $5.00... Downtown Book Bazaar, 212 Broadway, New York 7, N. Y.

enemy in an accelerating rush of abdication and collusion. It is bad enough for purveyors of trash to claim that they are giving people what they want. It is unspeakably worse when those who bear the name of critic proclaim it good—and that tendency is growing rather than diminishing. It is partly a case of the blind leading the blind. It is partly the result of pressures, direct and indirect. There is the obvious pressure of advertising; there is the much more subtle pressure to affirm that what is, is good. When shall we learn that to be a good democrat it is not absolutely necessary to be optimistic?

I have painted a dark picture, perhaps out of my own feeling of helplessness in the face of the mass-production and consumption of inanity which must "enervate the soul, and noiselessly unbend its springs of action," the collusion of the critics, and the complacency of a great many people who should know better. Still I, too, find myself offering a minor note of hope.

A few weeks ago I talked to the librarian in a small village in Virginia. She was lamenting the fact that so few of the excellent volumes on her well-stocked shelves ever moved from their places, while the demand for "Forever Amber" was such that she would be justified, as she put it, in buying more copies. (She hadn't done so, bless her heart, and vowed she wouldn't.) But what interested me particularly was her further remark that most of the people in the village who had insisted on reading the book, if it can be called a book, were disappointed or bored or disgusted.

Here is at least one small answer to the exploiters of man's cultural needs, a breed of men quite as ruthless and greedy as the exploiters of his physical needs, who on the one hand do their utmost to debauch the public taste and on the other excuse their highly profitable enterprises by affirming that the public taste is low.

Never-Never Land

FOREVER CHINA. By Robert Payne. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.50.

TWO hundred years ago the French philosophers, who knew a great deal about contemporary Europe and very little about contemporary China, used a rococo version of the wisdom of China's ancients to set off the facts of Europe's feudal decadence, of which they could not complain too openly for fear of losing their heads.

The fashion they set has persisted, in different times and under different conditions. During the ill-fated London Conference of Foreign Ministers, a liberal radio commentator mused aloud that while Molotov, Byrnes, and Bevin wrangled, the thoughts of China's Dr. Wang Shih-chieh, representative of a culture that had antedated and would survive that of the West, must have been "long, long thoughts." Dr. Wang's thoughts may have been long ones, since he had little to say, but they were not couched in terms of the ages. That mild little university professor most probably thought of his own nagging dyspepsia and the ironic contrast between China's nominal position as one of the Big Four and the sad state to which the misrule of the men and forces that he represented had actually reduced her.

Robert Payne is the latest recruit to the ranks of writers who set up a mythical Orient as a backdrop to their reflections on life in general. These ranks include Voltaire at one end and Sax Rohmer at the other. There was of course more excuse for Voltaire than for Sax Rohmer. There is, to my mind, no excuse at all for Robert Payne, who knows the Orient and who has a mastery of phrase and imagery that could be applied far differently, and to much better purpose.

Mr. Payne is at his best in his word pictures of the shapes and colors of Chungking and Kunning. He is at his vicious worst when he writes of a China that is composed of virtuous sages—among whom he includes Chen Li-fu, torturer of Chinese students and head of the CC clique—vital peasants, soulful young intellectuals, and "beautiful" corpses of teen-age soldiers, Chinese and Japanese, on war-time battlefields (necrophilia is one of his main characteristics). I say vicious, because he knows the university campuses of Kuomintang China, knows the struggle that goes on there, and prefers to forget it.

Instead, he mystically contemplates and reads hidden noble meanings into such modern Chinese phrases as "New People" (Hsin Min), neglecting to tell us that this was the label slapped by the puppet Peking regime in North China on the "mass organization" by which they impressed the population into the service of Japan. He writes rather beautiful English poetry suggested by Chinese originals which he pretends to translate and sometimes assigns, obviously because it makes no difference in his dream world, to the

WHY has the Catholic Church

Supported

{ Mussolini
Hitler
Tiso
Franco
Salazar
Peron

?

Why did the Catholic church support Roosevelt's domestic policies and oppose his foreign policy?

Why is the Catholic church anti-Capitalist as well as anti-Communist?

What kind of a political, social and economic system is the Catholic church attempting to bring about?

How has this affected your life and how may it affect the lives of your children?

READ:

"The True Nature of Roman Catholicism"
by L. H. Lehmann

An important series of articles describing aspects of the Catholic church never before revealed.

Beginning in the January issue of
THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE

Edited by former Catholic priests

Subscription only $1.00 a year (10 issues)

Sample copy 15¢

A limited number of January copies are being reserved for readers of The Nation. To make sure of getting your January copy include Dept. number in the address as follows, or return this ad.

Agora Publishing Company, Dept. S-251

229 WEST 40th STREET

NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

wrong poet. He almost justifies the rape of Nanking by picturing the Japanese killers as hag-ridden creatures assuaging their own unbearable sense of guilt in blood. He makes real characters who have much to say, like Rewi Alley, utter his thoughts instead of their own. To judge from his book, the Chinese Communists do not even exist; yet the book pretends to be a report.

There is no doubt that Mr. Payne loves China, but even this love is necrophiliac because he broods on a revised past and refuses to see the living China except in terms of the eternal vigorous maleness of its young men, which of course does not prevent these same young men from dying of famine or being killed in civil wars. His "Forever China" is composed of a half-understood ragbag of quotations from the ancient books, the unchanging landscape, and the physical continuity of the race. The complex reality passes him by, as indeed it must because it is not this he seeks but an anodyne for his own Weltschmerz, which could be called China or anything else. One wonders how Mr. Payne, who knew Spain in its heroic agony and writes of it, in retrospect, with appreciation and understanding, can avoid mentioning the Chinese analogies to Spain's travail, which have hit everyone else in the face within a week of arrival in the country.

Orville Prescott recommended this book as the greatest of current works about this much written-about, brave, and suffering country. It is no wonder, for Mr. Payne takes the reader away from the real and urgent problems of today into a never-never land that is opium to jaded nerves and leaves him with a feeling that everything is beautiful, though sad, cannot possibly be understood, and does not matter much anyway.

If Mr. Payne had called the fictitious land he creates by a fictitious name, this would not matter. But his book is skillfully set in the physical background of China, uses real people as its puppets, purports to tell us about a crucial world area peopled by 450,000,000 human beings, and is recklessly and completely misleading about China's past, present, and future. A writer who could have brought China closer has removed it to the realm of fantasy.

ISRAEL EPSTEIN

Music and Musicology

CHALLENGE TO MUSICAL TRADITION. By Adele T. Katz. Alfred A. Knopf. $7.50.

THE NATION is not the place to dissect Heinrich Schenker's system of tonality analysis, which is presented in this book. Suffice it to say that if it is correct, everything Tovey believed and taught about the relation of classical tonality to classical forms is desperately wrong, for here are two mutually irreconcilable systems of analysis to explain one phenomenon.

Tovey's method is, as he says, "rigidly confined to generalizations from the behavior of musical compositions." Schenker begins with a prior conclusion based not on what he observes but on what he wants to prove. Possessed by the great Germanic will to order and authority, he constructs on his conclusion a typical cellular, pyramidal, totalitarian

*"As absorbing as any novel of Chinese life."
—Saturday Review*

A Chinese Village By MARTIN C. YANG

This engaging study of a typical agricultural village by a distinguished sociologist is "...probably one of the most interesting publications of the decade... To read it thoroughly is to know China better than any American has ever yet learned to know it through the printed page."—Saturday Review

At all bookstores • $3.00

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
MORNINGSIDE HEIGHTS, NEW YORK 27

You may again buy BOOKS through The Nation

Because of government restrictions on wrapping material, book publishers, for the past two years have refused to accept orders for less than five books. For this reason The Nation was obliged temporarily to discontinue its Readers' Service Department.

Now that these restrictions have been dropped Nation readers can again avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, postfree if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to
The Readers' Service Division
THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

system, in structure amazingly like the one shown in the organization handbook of the Nazi Party, into which he forces as much of the behavior of musical compositions as he can. It only remains to create a mystical derivation from nature to justify the system:

[Because the first four overtones] in their relation to the fundamental and to each other represent the simplest mathematical ratio that exists among any group of tones, they manifest a nature-given principle of unity that has made the triad the dominating factor in the development of man's harmonic resources.

But as Tovey points out, "harmony has not yet found a place for so simple a natural phenomenon as the seventh note of the harmonic series," and while "many a 'clang' contains . . . in appreciable strength" the first sixteen notes, no fewer than four are outside our system. Furthermore:

The theory of "added thirds" was no more scientific than a classification of birds by the color of their feathers. But birds do have feathers of various colors, and classical music does build up chords by sequences of thirds.

When a system is derived backward from the conclusion to the data, a fact which cannot be tortured to fit the conclusion must be explained away. Thus when K. P. E. Bach makes an abrupt transition to the tonic which does not follow the laws of Schenker, and this cannot be explained by Bach's "inexperience in dealing with the structural problems of the form" because he continued the practice in mature works, the analysis must be: "We can only assume that this specific treatment was motivated either by a desire for a startling effect or by a technical idiosyncrasy."

Schenker is bad enough; but Mrs. Katz is one of the most confused writers I have ever encountered. I shall not waste space on the confusion in her own statement of her argument that just as elementary grammar is not enough for understanding Shakespeare but is only a preparation for the advanced work in oral and written English, so elementary harmony is not enough for understanding a Mozart sonata but is only preparation for the advanced harmonic analysis—presumably Schenker's—which does lead to the understanding of it. It is necessary, however, to point out that the argument is incorrect; that the author confuses applied work with understanding in literature and music, because she fails to understand the real basis of understanding of art. The ability to understand—let us call it sensitiveness—is an inherent capacity; when it exists one learns to understand poetry by reading poetry which awakens and develops one's sensitiveness to it, and the understanding of music is achieved in the same way. When one understands music this way, technical information will be of value, but only "knowledge that is relevant to the understanding of works of art," not "knowledge which is relevant only to the discipline of an artist's training"—which is a distinction Tovey is careful to make. Tovey's system imparts this first kind of knowledge; Schenker's imparts neither kind, but only false knowledge.

Moreover, understanding not born of sensitiveness and experience will not be acquired through technical knowledge. We have the conspicuous example of Dr. Einstein to prove that vast learning about a thing can be coupled with failure to comprehend the thing itself—in this case, the music of Mozart. Given knowledge and no sensitiveness, the second-act finale of "Figaro" may seem an interesting and even exciting derivation from the formulas of Paisiello, Martin, and others, but its great psychological truths and unique musical justness will never even be imagined.

CHARLES B. FARRELL

BRIEFER COMMENT

Great Episode

"ARNHEM LIFT, THE DIARY OF A GLIDER PILOT," by Louis E. Hagen (Rinehart and Company, $1.50), is another good and brief war book which will certainly give pleasure to Nation readers, and for three reasons. In the first place it is good to read because it proves a major point in the liberal conception of the war. Louis Hagen is a German who in 1933 was confined in a concentration camp for anti-Nazi utterances. Released because of his youth he was sent to England by his parents. Upon the outbreak of war he volunteered for service in the British army, became a glider pilot, and was decorated for bravery in action. The second distinction of this book lies in the magnificent episode it describes. Sergeant Hagen's first mission was that extraordinary attempt by British and Polish parachutists to secure the crossing of the lower Rhine. It was as daring and imaginative and tragic an action as the war histories will contain. (It was betrayed by a Dutch Nazi working in the British and Dutch Intelligence Service.) The third feature of the book is its style, which is clearly a reflection of Sergeant Hagen's character. "Arnhem Lift" is as precise a distillation of experience as I have read in a long while. In its choice of exact imagery, its absence of undue emotional stress, its candor and calm gravity it is a model to be followed by other writers about war. RALPH BATES

James Monroe

AT TWENTY-TWO JAMES MONROE began the study of law under Thomas Jefferson. He went to school to him for the rest of his life. Monroe was an industrious and conscientious student, and if he was possessed of no brilliant original genius, he had the good sense to seek out and accept able counsel. His "nature demanded a confidant and adviser," writes Arthur Styron in "The Last of the Cockeyed Hats: James Monroe and the Virginia Dynasty" (University of Oklahoma Press, $3.50), and he was fortunate that Jefferson and Madison were usually close at hand.

Monroe, who had served as Madison's Secretary of State, was his logical successor in the Presidency in 1816. He was reelected in 1820, when he received every electoral vote but one; the "era of good feeling" was at hand. The election to the Presidency capped more than thirty years of public life. Monroe served through the Revolutionary War as an officer while still in his teens, was elected to the Virginia Assembly and to the Continental Congress, was a Virginia governor and senator, a minister to England, France, and Spain, Secretary of State, and Secretary of War.

There was little in his long career, however, to capture the imagination. "He was no meteor," writes his present biographer, "to dartle brightly for a moment and then fall into obscurity; no tragic hero to furnish blood to agitate the mind and events to compel the tears; not even a great leader with a grasp of means to attain ends beyond the common mind." To sustain his 480-page biography, then, Styron has written a long disquisition on the times, and has focused attention on Monroe only at intervals. The material which he presents specifically on Monroe's career could probably be included in a hundred pages: for long periods Monroe is lost in the background. The volume is particularly slow in getting under way, with a detailed discussion of the Birth of an Era, the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries.

Styron, who seems to be something of a Southern agrarian on the defensive, obtrudes himself throughout the volume in these long asides. The narrative is further interrupted by hundreds of footnotes rarely containing anything which, given the author's discursive method, could not be better included in the text. Much of the volume is needlessly complex and drearily written, but it is dotted with brilliant vignettes of lucid prose. Styron's six-page estimate of Hamilton is an example, and his portrait of John Randolph is another. "The Last of the Cocked Hats" would be far the better for a comprehensive and astringent job of editing.

COLEMAN ROSENBERGER

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents

MAURICE EVANS

In His New Production of Shakespeare's

HAMLET

Columbus Circle Thea. 8'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
Eves. 8:30. Mts. Thu. & Sat. 2:30

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by Music by
DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE 8'way at 53rd St. Mat. & Sat. 2:30 & 8:30

Kermit Bloomgarden & George Meller present
DEEP ARE THE ROOTS

A New Play by ARNAUD d'USSEAU and JAMES GOW

Staged by ELIA KAZAN

FULTON THEATRE Forty-sixth Street West of
Broadway. Circle 6-6380.
Evenings: 8:40, $4.20, $3.60, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Matinees
Wednesday and Saturday, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80, $1.20. Tax inclusive.

"A PHENOMENAL SUCCESS!"—Morehouse, Sun
KERN AND HAMMERSTEIN'S

SHOW BOAT

Music by JEROME KERN • Book and Lyrics by OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd

Based on the novel by EDNA FERBER • Staged by HASSARD SHORT

ZIEGFELD THEA. 64th Street and Sixth Avenue. CI 5-5200
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mat. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

"A DELIGHTFUL PLAY!"—Coleman, Mirror

Rodgers and Hammerstein present

MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA

In JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"

with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 49th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4636.
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mat. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp.

MOTION PICTURE

Manhattan

ALHAMBRA

COLISEUM

4th ST.

86th ST.

NEW LEX.

HAMILTON

125th ST.

RECENT

RIVERSIDE

21th ST.

Bronx

CASTLE HILL

CHESTER

FORDHAM

FRANKLIN

MARBLE

HILL

PELHAM

ROYAL

Westchester

MT. VERNON

NEW ROCH.

WH. PLAINS

YONKERS

RIKO NOW

"A TIMELY DRAMA"—N. Y. Sun
JOAN ROBERT

LESLIE HUTTON
'TOO YOUNG
TO KNOW'

Adapted from HARLAN WARE'S story

— And —

'THE DALTONS RIDE AGAIN'

Brooklyn

BUSHWICK

DYKER

GREENPOINT

KENMORE

MADISON

ORPHEUM

PROSPECT

REPUBLIC

TILYU

Coney Island

Queens

Kath's

FLUSHING

Kath's

RICH. HILL

STRAND

Far Rockaway

Manhattan

COLONIAL

"Engrossing Melodrama" • "Highly Recommended"
—N. Y. Times —N. Y. Herald Tribune

CHARLES

LAUREN

BOYER - BACALL

— Is —

'CONFIDENTIAL AGENT'

— With —

KATINA PAXINOU • PETER LORRE

Adapted from GRAHAM GREENE'S novel

— And —

'LOVE, HONOR and GOODBYE'

VIRGINIA BRUCE • EDWARD ASHLEY

PARAMOUNT presents
VERONICA LAKE SONNY TUFTS

JOAN

CAULFIELD

"MISS SUSIE SLAGLE'S"

— with —
BILLY DEWOLFE • RENNY McEVY

— and —
LILLIAN GISH

A Paramount Picture

— In Person —
DANNY KAYE

MISS

Georgia Gibbs

Tip, Tap & Toe

Bob Chester

AND HIS ORCHESTRA

— Featuring —

Larry Butler

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

"Even when she's in his arms . . . there's part of him that'll be mine forever!"

ALICE DANA LINDA
FAYE ANDREWS DARNELL
FALLEN ANGEL

Produced and directed by OTTO PREMINGER

A 20th CENTURY-FOX PICTURE

Now
Playing

ROXY

7th Ave.
at 50th St.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

SHAKESPEARE'S "The Winter's Tale" and Shaw's "Pygmalion" are not, to put it mildly, in all respects very much alike. The second makes, for instance, a great show of logic, while the first throws logic to the winds. Yet one may, for all that, propose a very pretty question by asking whether "Pygmalion" is, after all, any more true to life in the most literal sense of that term. Shakespeare knows, and by the very cavalierness of his presentation admits, that Hermiones do not really disappear for sixteen years and then reappear as statues turning to life; Shaw pretends to convince himself and us that philologists can make flower girls into duchesses in a mere six months. Thus the one author flies aloft on the wings of poetry; the other mounts dizzily a teetering stack of dubious premises and questionable deductions that only an acrobat could maintain in its unstable equilibrium. But both abandon probability as well as common sense far below, and it would be hard to demonstrate that Hermione is a more fabulous creature than Eliza Doolittle or that Leontes is any more a fantasy on the theme of jealousy than Professor Higgins is a fantasy on the theme of scientific detachment. And, parenthetically I might add, it would be equally hard to demonstrate that fabulous creatures of one sort or another do not make the most effective dramatis personae. What changes from age to age and society to society is merely the kind of monster we most readily find the meaning of. Something about human nature may be learned from both Leontes and Professor Higgins, but it is not because either is believable as a person.

In recent years revivals of twentieth-century plays have not often proved very successful, but the new production of "Pygmalion" at the Ethel Barrymore

Theater is an S. R. O. hit, and that augurs well for the future of its sponsors, Theater Incorporated, a non-profit organization which has, we are told, "extensive plans for limited runs of old and new plays." One reason for the small success usually enjoyed by revivals from the recent past may be simply that most such plays are in that uncomfortable state from which the plays of Shaw are just emerging—the state, that is to say, in which they seem old-fashioned without having yet become classics. Another fact which accounts for the triumph of the present "Pygmalion" undoubtedly is that instead of the all too visible economy and makeshift usually associated with such enterprises we have here an absolutely top-notch production performed by players of first-rate reputation and genuine popularity, who contribute that "glamour" which, unfortunately or not, New York audiences do not easily forgive the absence of. Gertrude Lawrence, who can make the shift from guttersnipe to brittle lady of fashion as few other actresses could, is probably the best possible person for the role of Eliza, and the support is excellent, though Raymond Massey, the co-star, is, for all his usual attractiveness, perhaps just a shade too amiable a Professor Higgins to go with his lines or his actions. Most spectators fortunate enough to see the production will probably realize that what the theater needs most of all at the present moment is a few playwrights with brains and talent. A little perspective makes it abundantly clear that whatever the virtues or the faults of Shaw may be he is simply outside the class of any American or English playwright who has produced anything during the last few years.

Returning for a moment to the comparison between his works and those of Shakespeare, I hope that the Old Gentleman—who is now almost twice the age at which Shakespeare died—will not be too offended if I point out at least one additional way in which his work resembles that of the Bard even when the latter was, if we believe Shaw, scornfully according the stupid public what it wanted. Despite fantastic plots, both "Pygmalion" and "The Winter's Tale" manage to bring in incidentally a good deal of wit, and, what is much more remarkable, the satiric elements in the two tend to converge. Take, for instance, the moment when one of the ballad-monger's patrons remarks how gratifying it is to get things in print so that one will know they are true. That remark, without the change of a word, might be put into the mouth of any one of half a dozen Shavian embodiments of conventional fatuity and might be put there, not so that it wouldn't be noticed, but so that it would be singled out by unwary readers and marked in the margin, "How characteristic!" Or consider, for that matter, the whole character of Autolycus, who is a blood brother of Mr. Doolittle. Both are impossibly articulate and persuasive members of the Undeserving Poor. Both win our hearts and both are monsters, because though we love each as a fantasy we would not tolerate for a minute the only people in real life whom they remotely resemble.

Readers of "Pygmalion" may remember that the author adds a postscript in which he traces the subsequent careers of his characters. Clara Bynsford-Hill, the proper young lady who decides that "bloody" is part of the new smart vocabulary, later, we are told, was converted to socialism by H. G. Wells; and Eliza married, not Professor Higgins, but the young clotheshorse, Freddy. I should advise spectators not to pay any attention to all this. In the first place, none of the characters of the play has any life of that kind after the curtain descends. They are all alive only within the framework of the play's fanciful logic. In the second place, if Eliza didn't marry Professor Higgins, then the name of the piece is meaningless. Pygmalion was a man who married his own artistic creation, and it was not Freddy who made a lady out of a flower girl.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE sculpture in plaster, concrete, and other materials of David Hare, whose second one-man show is now being held at Art of This Century (through February 9), is another instance—a rich, full-blown, open instance—of the contemporary baroque. Hare stands second to no sculptor of his generation, unless it be David Smith, in potential talent. But like Smith in his latest phase and like all those who practice the baroque seriously at this moment, he is overwhelmed by the challenge of what is thought to be the contemporary mood.

Hare's is the most intensely surrealistic art I have ever seen—in the sense that it goes all the way in the direction of surrealism and then beyond, developing surrealism's premises with a con-

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.

MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ♦ ♦ 29 LANGUAGES

Send for Free book. Call for Free demonstration

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE

91 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

agency and boldness the surrealist discovers themselves have hardly changed. The influence of Giacometti, related directly as well as through Matta's painting, operates here.

Now Giacometti himself in his best phase had near him the late presence of cubism to give some shape and form a direction to his literary adventures; in spite of himself, he absorbed a sense of style from his surroundings and his period which served to concentrate his energy. Surrealism of itself could not do this, because it never has a style of its own—that is, not in formal or plastic sense—and without the infusion of cubism could offer no more than period-revival academicism. Thus it is not surprising that when cubism began to lose its prestige in the plastic art world of the late thirties, Giacometti, never a very serious or resolute artist, relapsed into the most abysmal academicism.

Hare preserves Giacometti's demerit: his ambition to create in each work of art a non-aesthetic personality, a new element of "absolute" experience, but he has failed to possess himself as yet of a sense of style comparable to Giacometti's at his best. And he is not concerned enough with the necessity of being sure that the work of art be at least art before becoming a personality. The art are, of course, extenuating circumstances in Hare's case. While Giacometti could raise his monsters by hand in a hothouse, Hare has to meet the rush of a horde of late, hot, field-grown monsters coming from every direction of present-day history. They are not as easy to control as Giacometti's horrors.

Hare's art as a whole suffers from its diversity, its lack of a unifying formal principle, of a consistent plastic bias. Its twenty-three "personalities" on exhibition belong to at least seven different periods of geology. Their variety is upsetting instead of stimulating, because it is the result of the absence of style and the presence of elaborations and complications too often motivated by nothing more than exuberance or mechanical facility. Nor does the individual excellence of so many of the pieces—some are superb—remedy their failure to relate to one another.

As I have said, Hare has a prodigious amount of talent. The linear inventiveness of his sculpture cannot be denied; it's almost possible, in fact, to argue that he is a great draftsman—which is, perhaps, why he is not a successful sculptor in any final way. He still derives too closely from painting and fails to distinguish between the different orders of feeling proper to it and to sculpture. And in this respect, particularly, gothic surrealism, with its deliberate obliteration of such distinctions, is a handicap. (Perhaps it is necessary to remind the reader that the surrealism of Picasso, Miro, and Masson is not gothic.) Only when Hare comes to include his surrealism in something larger and outwardly more impassive and controlled, something that scorns to compete with nature in procreation, will he realize the fulness of his unquestionable talent.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

AT LAST we are getting recordings of Toscanini's performances in frequent succession; and they are continuing to provide the outstanding releases of Victor's lists. On the February list are his performances with the N. B. C. Symphony of two great pieces of dramatic music: Verdi's Overture to "La Forza del Destino" (11-9010; $1), and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3 (Set SP-2; $2.25). They are superbly effective statements of the works; but the performance of the "Prometheus" Overture on the fourth side of the Beethoven set turns out to be an example of what happens when internal and external conditions of the moment cause the Toscanini powers to operate at incandescence: the result is an intensification of the characteristic qualities and quantities of his style, a heightening of its effect, to the point where it is hair-raising.

Moreover those tremendous opening chords come off the record with a depth and solidity and roundness of sound cleanly defined in quiet that one is not prepared for by the thinner, harder, and reverberantly coarser fortissimos of the "Forza" and "Leonore" performances or the recent Haydn No. 98; and the sound of the softer passages of "Prometheus" is also astonishingly beautiful. The difference is partly in the increased amount of bass that produces the depth and solidity, but also in the particular adjustment of recording equipment to acoustic conditions that produces the clean definition in quiet. And I must wonder that Victor's engineers, whose competence is evident in the beauty of some of their recordings of the St. Louis and Boston orchestras,

CHARLES A. BEARD

calls it:—

"An informing document for all civilized persons now interested, of necessity, in what is called the Jewish problem."

Here are 576 pages of thoughtful, scintillating writing by the elite of the World of Letters.

THE JEWISH FRONTIER ANTHOLOGY

The selected gems of a great journal of thought. Articles by:—

Norman Angell
Dorothy Thompson
Leon Blum Carl J. Friedrich
David Ben Gurion
Justice Robert H. Jackson
Sholom Asch Hayim Greenberg
Jacob J. Weinstein
and many others

"The very highest standard in modern journalism...must appeal to Gentile no less than Jew."

Lewis Mumford
"A bright mirror reflecting the life of a decade." Marvin Lowenthal

On sale only by the publisher

Cloth bound, 576 pages
Price—$2.50, postage prepaid

Send check or money order to
Jewish Frontier, Dept. 1 N
45 E. 17 St., New York 3, N. Y.

JEWISH FRONTIER

Dept. 1-N
45 East 17th Street
New York 3, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

Kindly send me, POSTAGE PREPAID, _____ copies of THE JEWISH FRONTIER ANTHOLOGY. Enclosed is my check for $_____ (at $2.50 a copy).

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

Postal Zone _____ State _____

INSTRUCTORS!

Take Advantage of
The Nation's
Special Class Room Rate - -

25¢
Monthly per Student

for orders of ten or more copies to be sent to one address—Desk copy is supplied free.

Address your order to

THE NATION
20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

62c a line (six words)

Minimum 3 lines

$6.16 per inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
BARclay 7-1066

have not achieved a standardization of practice for each orchestra and auditorium that would prevent the differences in sound between the Boston performances of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" and Brahms's Third, the St. Louis performances of Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony and the Couperin-Milhaud "La Sultane," the N. B. C. Symphony performances of the Overture to "La Forza del Destino" and "Prometheus," and worse still—as in the case of Haydn's No. 98—the difference between one side and the rest of a single performance. I must also wonder at the lack of care in processing and manufacture that gives us these examples of Toscanini's perfection in performance marred by noisy blemishes in the records.

Victor's new set (1028; $5.75) of "Swan Lake," like Columbia's older one, offers not the music you may have heard at performances of "Swan Lake" in this country, but a collection of excerpts from Tchaikovsky's music for the several acts of the original ballet—a collection which includes some but not all of the music used in the one-act "Swan Lake" performed in this country, some but not all of the music used in the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe "Magic Swan" a few years ago, and possibly some music not used in either of these two. You can take it simply as enjoyable music, well-performed by Golschmann with the St. Louis Symphony (his tempo for the music on side 8 is much faster than what you have heard, but may be the correct one), and well-recorded. And that is what you had better do, ignoring the correlation of music and story which the notes in the album provide for each record-side; for it is filled with gush, confusion, and inaccuracy.

On a single (10-1200; $.75) is Questa o quella from "Rigoletto," sung by Björling with the splendor and ease that his voice has on other records of several years ago, and the style that his singing still has. On the reverse side is Nessun dorma from "Turandot." Good orchestral accompaniments are provided by Grevillius; and the performances are well-recorded.

By now I am no longer surprised by a letter which begins by telling me that the writer is a constant reader of my column, and ends by asking a question about something I discussed a couple of weeks earlier. Invariably this has happened after one of my periodic discussions of needles: I have repeated my advice against sapphires, against any other long-playing needle other than chromium, against cactus or thorn needles; and shortly afterward I have been asked my views on needles, and in particular on sapphires or cactus. And after writing a few weeks ago that I still had no information about new phonographs, but that as soon as I had any I would publish it, I am receiving letters from constant and appreciative readers asking me for information about new phonographs.

Since I have referred to cactus needles I might amplify what I have said about them. The first playing and repointing removes the outer surface that has been hardened by the chemical; and this, as I have said, means that the point now wears down very quickly and in so doing develops "shoulders" like those of a worn steel needle and as harmful to records. In addition the softness of the repointed cactus makes it possible for particles of the abrasive shellac-mix of the record to become embedded in the needle and then to begin to exercise their abrasive effect on the record. A friend to whom I mentioned this told me of some records which he had played several years ago only with cactus needles and then stopped playing, and which he discovered recently sounded much more badly worn than his other records that he had not played with cactus needles. And the new plastic records of vinylite should be damaged even more than are shellac records.

CONTRIBUTORS

ISRAEL EPSTEIN lived for many years in China. He covered various phases of the Sino-Japanese war for the United Press, the New York Times, Time, and the Allied Labor News.

CHARLES B. FARRELL, who contributes his first signed review to this issue, has figured several times as the anonymous correspondent in Mr. Haggin's column.

RALPH BATES, the distinguished novelist, fought with the International Brigade during the Spanish Civil War.

COLEMAN ROSENBERGER is the author of the article "Freedom Road" True? which appeared in The Nation last July.

Letters to the Editors

The Big Three

Dear Sirs: As a faithful "Nation Associate," permit me to protest against Freda Kirchwey's statement in her editorial of January 5: "The fact is, every nation might as well accept Big Three dominance as the basis of post-war relations." I object to such "realism" on three counts: (a) Power politics is war. It means: "You may be right, but I can knock you down. Want to argue?" (b) To talk of "a democratic structure" while accepting the heavenly right of sheer force is hypocrisy, and hypocrisy is always dangerous. You cannot reconcile the principles proclaimed at San Francisco with the deals secretly agreed to at Yalta or Potsdam. (c) There can be no durable understanding among the major nations on the basis of power politics. The Big Fellows invariably come to blows, because they live in constant fear that one of them may become a Bigger Fellow. Just because I want and have always advocated peace and amity with Russia, I want them not on a precarious Bismarck-Hitler basis but on the sure foundation of permanent common interests, frankly and openly discussed, without fear or favor.

There is an objectionable term for "permanent general interests" and that is "principles." Of course, The Nation will never stand for such starry-eyed liberal nonsense. Let us be tough and realistic, and prepare for the next round.

ALBERT GUÉRARD, SR.

Stanford University, Cal., January 18

Two Corrections

Dear Sirs: In connection with the really excellent article by Mr. D. M. Lebourdais on The Far North: International Frontier, which appeared in the January 12 issue of The Nation, two corrections should be made with reference to Alaska.

First, the statement is made that gold is not so important to the Alaska economy as fish or timber. The fact is that gold mining, in peace time, is second only to fishing and produces much more than the forest lands, which contain enormous stands of timber but have not yet been developed.

Second, the sentence reading, "A tract of 30,000 square miles has been set aside in Alaska for the exclusive use of the United States navy, but so far nothing has been done to develop it," should have read, "nothing was done to develop it until the spring of 1944." Then a detachment of Seabees was sent to Point Barrow, and extensive work has been carried on ever since, including a preliminary pipe-line survey. This spring the work will be turned over to civilian contractors. Qualified oil geologists believe the Barrow reserve, or Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 4, may prove to be one of the great oil fields of the world.

E. L. BARTLETT,

Delegate from Alaska

Washington, January 15

More About Straus

Dear Sirs: Mr. Straus (The Nation, January 5) expresses the point of view of a metropolitan observer. The effect of the opposition of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, the National Home Builders' Association, the United States Savings and Loan League, etc., in small manufacturing towns such as these in Beaver County is more pronounced, probably, than in metropolitan areas. More people, even those who would be benefited by liberal policies, are led to subscribe to the propaganda of those organizations.

This county contains over 2,000 public-housing dwelling units, of which over 400 were built as "subsidized" or "low-rent" projects. There was an enormous influx of war workers which created a serious housing shortage. It was hoped the immigrants would depart after V-J Day, but only 83 families have moved out of the public-housing units since then. In the meantime, thousands of service people have returned, and the Housing Authority now has an application list of 1,200, of whom 700 are veterans.

Several days ago I recited these facts to a county poor supervisor and proposed more public housing as a means of partial relief. "Public housing," he said, "has been one of the biggest failures and mistakes of this county." How could he, who sees so much distress, say that? Like so many others, he expresses the preaching of reactionary politicians, builders, realtors, and their kind.

I am in agreement with giving wider priorities to housing—not only priorities however. There must be an allocation of materials and men also, if anything is to be accomplished. Private housing should not be discouraged. Not all veterans—in some localities no veterans—need subsidized rent.

It seems to me that the greatest contribution to housing the veteran will be made when this country combines its resources of labor and capital in an effort of production. We did it for war; we should be able to do it for peaceful pursuits.

ARTHUR L. MARTSOLF,

People's Housing Council

New Brighton, Pa., January 11

Segregation, Navy Style

Dear Sirs: In reference to your item of several issues ago about discrimination on the troopship "Old Crow," this is not a universal navy practice. We returned on the navy ship General Anderson, which carried both white and colored troops, and there were no lines of demarcation. We slept in the same holds, ate together, washed together, gambled together, and there was no

The Babylonian TALMUD

Edited
and Translated from the original Hebrew
by

LEO AUERBACH

$3.00

Betrothals • Leavings for the Poor
Levirate Marriage • Criminal Law
Festivals • Penalties
Wisdom of the Sages

"This TALMUD . . . is certainly worthwhile to anyone who desires to taste of the sea of Talmudic knowledge, without having recourse to the original sources." —Rabbi Samuel K. Mirsky, Prof. Yeshiva College, N. Y.

NOW for the first time there is available in English a large representative cross-section of The Original TALMUD.

LIMITED EDITION.

ORDER NOW!

Philosophical Library, Inc., Dept. N,
15 E. 40th St., N. Y. 16, N. Y.

Please send me copies of THE BABYLONIAN TALMUD, at $3.00 each.

Enclosed are $.....

Name

Address

Crossword Puzzle No. 147

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Might make a lad crib
- 5 Trivial perhaps, but amusing
- 9 It's an ill wind
- 10 "But when he once ----- the upmost round, He then unto the ladder turns his back"
- 11 Jumped out of the plate
- 12 "Concentrated energy in a small space which, given certain conditions, will release itself"
- 14 Two of Henry VIII's consorts were so named
- 15 Where E. Carter lives
- 18 How you prefer your wines, maybe
- 20 Word already mentioned once in these clues
- 21 "But that --- -----ed engine at the door Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more" (hyphen, 3-4)
- 23 Dog food
- 26 Bill in Dee (anag.) won't come out!
- 28 40? Do better than that
- 29 Deceives
- 30 Provides a little nonsense at the end of the pier
- 31 Cautious
- 32 Not in a mood to be made much of

DOWN

- 1 Dickens' character who decided that "the Law is a hass"
- 2 If you give the foreign seaman tea, you'll be able to get the last car
- 3 Of which Rudolph the Fifth was crowned king
- 4 The entire university in America; only part of it in England

- 5 Descendants of mine are found here
- 6 "We do the difficult immediately; the impossible takes a little longer" —isn't a bad one
- 7 He retires from court to a small and simple apartment
- 8 Diminished—owing, presumably, to there being less need
- 13 "It had to be ---," as the bowman sang of his bow
- 16 Lo, to serve (anag.)
- 17 "A nightcap decked his brows instead of bay; A --- by night, a stocking all the day"
- 18 Time to be downing tools, says the clock
- 19 The only one of Lear's daughters who really loved him
- 22 Degraded
- 23 Mount slowly (two words, 5 & 2)
- 24 Corot, I? No, a tax
- 25 Side of bacon
- 27 Plimsoll saw to it that ships should not be to excess

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 146

ACROSS:—1 TICKLERS; 5 SCOTCH; 10 RAPALLO; 11 CROAKER; 12 FELLAH; 13 UNCTUOUS; 16 RINNELS; 17 STUDS; 18 STYE; 20 STIRRUP; 22 OUCH; 24 DEUCE; 26 DESPAIR; 29 CAROONLE; 30 AVERSE; 32 TOLLBAR; 33 PARSNIP; 34 OBOIST; 35 ETHELRED.

DOWN:—1 THRIFT; 2 CAPULET; 3 LOL-LARDS; 4 RIOT; 6 CROATS; 7 TAKE OUT; 8 HARASSES; 9 SCONE; 13 HUSTLED; 14 UNDRAGE; 15 CLAUDIA; 19 CONCERTO; 21 PERVERSE; 23 CABALLO; 25 CORNER; 26 DOUBTS; 27 SLUES; 28 HEAPED; 31 SPOT.

sign of friction, in spite of the very crowded conditions.

On this ship, at any rate, the navy showed its own type of discrimination. The enlisted men were confined to two sections of deck, one forward and the other aft. In good weather you had to elbow your way through the packed masses to find even standing room. The decks reserved for commissioned personnel always had plenty of room, but M. P.'s were assigned to keep enlisted men out of these sections. This situation prevailed the entire trip, in spite of the protests of both men and officers. We were told that deck-space assignment was a navy function, and that the navy regulations could not be changed.

We entered Boston Harbor at dawn, and at 6 a. m. a new space assignment was announced, by which the space allotted to enlisted men was almost tripled. So as we sailed triumphantly into dock, with flags flying and whistles tooting, the general public was treated to a view of the ship almost completely covered with plain ordinary soldiers. I guess it wouldn't do to show people how the ship looked in mid-ocean, crammed with soldiers forward and aft, and almost empty amidships.

ROBERT B. KONIKOW

Washington, D. C., January 12

RESORTS

MAMANASCO

Lake Lodge

A Resort Estate of unmatched beauty. Ideal for winter rest and recreation. Write or phone Ridgefield, Conn. 820.

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 500-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails, Ski Tow, 700-foot Ski Slope. Delicious food. Easy transportation.

Attractive Winter Rates

For reservations or further information write or call HATHAWAY LODGE, Kaines Falls, N. Y. Telephone, Tannersville 299

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7963

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR Newburgh 4477
 Delightful...skating on private lake. Open fireplaces.
 Different...the colonial atmosphere.
 Delicious...our unexcelled cuisine.
 Dazzling...recording for listening & dancing.
 All this only 53 miles from New York City
 A Resort for Adults Only

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 16, 1946

NUMBER 7

The Shape of Things

AMERICA TODAY IS AN OASIS OF PLENTY in a hungry world, and yet there are some Americans—we hope a tiny minority—who are unwilling to do anything to alleviate foreign distress that involves the slightest inconvenience or sacrifice on their part. No sooner had the President announced his bread-for-Europe plans than Representative Edwin Arthur Hall, New York Republican, introduced a resolution in Congress calling for a ban on grain and flour exports until the Secretary of Agriculture found that shortages of animal feed in certain areas had been made good, and that enough flour was available to "assure the American people the present amount of white bread." On another page Keith Hutchison reviews the world food front, showing how war and widespread crop failures have created a truly desperate situation throughout Europe and Asia. Although it is now too late to prevent terrible distress in many countries, by fulfilling our export pledges we may help to keep millions alive who will otherwise die before the next harvest. But Mr. Hall wants his white bread and doesn't care if it's seasoned with human blood. The vast majority of Americans, however, will surely repudiate this monstrous selfishness and will insist, once they understand what is at stake, that our commitments be fulfilled to the letter even if it means a decline in our present super-sufficient diet averaging 3,300 calories daily.

★

WHILE MR. HALL'S REACTION TO THE FOOD crisis is by all odds the meanest, that of Alf M. Landon deserves mention as the stupidest. Criticizing the President's program, the forgotten Republican candidate of 1936 declared: "We are reaping the results of the iniquitous Morgenthau plan for defeated Germany." How on earth a policy of de-industrializing Germany, which in fact has not been adopted, could be responsible for harvest failures throughout the world Mr. Landon does not vouchsafe to explain. It could not even affect the situation in Germany itself, since the last season's crop there was in the ground before the Allies crossed the Rhine. Of course it might be argued by Mr. Landon that we ought to have postponed our offensive until the Germans had gathered in their harvest. But if haste to end the war was a mistake, surely it is General Eisenhower rather than Mr. Morgenthau who was at fault. If Mr. Landon wants to criticize the Administration for its share in the present situation, there are more rational grounds on which he can do so. President Truman and his advisers cannot escape blame for shortsightedness. As early as V-J Day there was clear evidence of a dangerous food shortage in Europe this winter. Nevertheless, rationing of everything except sugar was ended in this country with indecent haste, and no steps were taken to insure that wheat needed for food would not be diverted to less essential uses. That was a culpable error, but if Mr. Landon lifted his voice in protest at the time, the squeak escaped us.

★

OMELETTES MADE OF DRIED EGGS ARE NOT very appetizing, as we can testify from personal experience. But Britons, rationed to two or three "shell eggs" a month and lucky if they got those, have found American powdered eggs a great standby. Now they are told there will be no more for the present, not because we have no eggs to spare—a glut is expected shortly—but because the British government feels that, with the exchange position so uncertain, it cannot draw on its supply of dollars for the purpose. Its anxiety on this score has no doubt been increased by Congressional delays in considering the British loan and by indications that it may not be approved for many months, if at all. Harassed British housewives, however, are asking whether other American imports should not be sacrificed first—for instance, films. They feel that while a rich cultural diet of Grable, Gable, and Garland is all very well, a little more protein would be still better.

★

BY ONE OF THOSE STRANGE LEGISLATIVE quirks which constantly crop up when Senate and House disagree, the House has passed by a decisive vote a compromise full-employment bill retaining all the essential principles which only two months ago it flatly rejected. Although the term "full employment" is nowhere used, the measure commits the federal government to "use all practicable means . . . to promote maximum em-

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	181
Harry Hopkins	183
Labor in Wonderland	184
Stalin Reports	185

ARTICLES

Some News to Cheer by I. F. Stone	186
Washington's Atomic War by Tris Coffin	187
Perón: South American Hitler by Stanley Ross	189
General De Gaulle Steps Down by Ida Treat	194
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	196
The People's Front by Del Vayo	197

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes on Canadian Literature by Robert Leigh Weaver	198
The Work of Chief Justice Stone by William Seagle	200
Briefer Comment	201
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	203
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	205
Films by James Agee	205
Music by B. H. Haggin	206

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 207

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 148 by Jack Barrett 208

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart
Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey
Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside, Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting, Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $5; Two years $9; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

ployment, production, and purchasing power." In itself the bill is no guaranty of full employment, but it does set up machinery which can be used to assure jobs for all. As in the original Senate bill the President is directed to report annually to Congress on the expected levels of employment and production, as compared with the levels needed to maintain maximum employment. A fourteen-man joint Congressional committee will then study the President's recommendations and propose specific measures. To a great extent the legislation's effectiveness will depend on the men President Truman appoints as the three economic advisers for whom the bill provides. If first-class men are chosen, the President's annual report on employment prospects can be so authoritative and so dramatic that Congress will have no choice but to accept his recommendations. *

A GAG HAS BEEN IMPOSED ON POPULAR voices in the Philippines at a time when the freest discussion is needed to clarify questions of independence and reform. Manuel Roxas, presidential candidate and collaborationist spokesman of the large landowners, is the chief benefactor and apparently the prime mover in this situation. The strongly anti-Roxas Philippine Press went out of business after being denied paper supplies and printing facilities by pro-Roxas forces. Because of their attacks on Franco and Salazar and because they advocated breaking up the large estates held by the Dominican Order, the Star Reporter and the Courier were denied press facilities by the Dominican Fathers who control the University of Santo Tomas Press. Liberal groups attempting to buy the printing press formerly used by Yank were outbid by Roxas's well-heeled Daily News, leaving the importation of machinery from America as their only hope. The American authorities, who control exports to the islands, should facilitate this shipment so that the future of the Philippines will not be determined by the loud and unopposed voices of the feudal-fascist newspapers. *

AFTER YEARS OF DELAY THE HOUSE WAYS and Means Committee is preparing revisions to the Social Security Act to meet present-day conditions. Proposals for liberalizing and expanding the act were contained in each of President Roosevelt's annual messages for several years. The most important change recommended is the extension of unemployment and old-age protection to farm workers, domestics, the self-employed, and employees of scientific, religious, and educational institutions. On the basis of ten years' experience in administering the act, the Social Security Board also urges that unemployment-insurance benefits be increased and standardized to eliminate the present wide variations among the states; that disabled persons receive the same protection as those unable to work because of age; and that provision be made for dependents in unemployment as well as in old-age insurance, President Truman, on the board's recommendation, asked recently that health insurance be incorporated in the social-security system. In addition to these and other specific changes aimed at giving the American people financial protection against the hazards of modern life, a basic overhauling of the Social Security Act is required to eliminate inconsistencies and provide an integrated and comprehensive system of protection. It is impossible to predict how far the Ways and Means Committee will go: much will depend on the mail from back home. *

STANLEY ROSS'S STORY OF PERON'S CAREER in this issue is full of facts that have dodged the other correspondents. It brings out in sharp detail the ties that bind the Argentine dictator to his Axis forbears and to the Nazis still operating in Spain and Latin America. The Argentine election next week is as important to the peace of this hemisphere as the German elections of 1932 were to the peace of Europe; Mr. Ross shows clearly how the fascist forces have prepared for victory and what they intend to do with it. The UNO Assembly will apparently adjourn without considering the issue of Argentina, but its resolution on Spain makes the continued collaboration of Franco's Latin American partner more incongruous than ever.

*

SEVERAL POINTS SHOULD BE NOTED ABOUT Panama's resolution on Spain adopted by the UNO Assembly. First, while officially endorsing the San Francisco resolution and the Potsdam declaration barring admission to the Franco government, it goes a step beyond both by recommending "that the United Nations members take into account their spirit and their letter in conducting their future relations with Spain." The meaning implicit in these cautious words is that the assembled nations are advised to break with Franco. Second, this meaning was made explicit in several of the supporting speeches. The Czech delegate, Ivo Duchacek, not only told the members to sever relations with the Franco dictatorship but went so far as to urge that the Spanish Republicans be granted affiliation with the UNO. Third, among the many speakers who favored the resolution no American was included. Fourth, while the decision of the Assembly provides good ammunition for opponents of Franco and may even throw a scare into Argentina, which apparently was "absent" when the vote was taken, it need have no effect whatsoever on governments that want to do business with Franco. Fifth, nothing in the resolution would make it difficult for its supporters to recognize a monarchist regime in Spain if one should be set up or for the UNO to admit such a regime to membership. In sum, we welcome the gesture of the Assembly as a hopeful augury and plan to keep our fingers crossed.

THE RESIGNATION OF ISADOR LUBIN AS Commissioner of Labor Statistics will further weaken the Truman Administration. Few men have served the government of this country so long and ably as Dr. Lubin. He was with the Food Administration and the War Industries Board in the last war. He was economic adviser to the Senate Committee on Education and Labor in the 1928-29 investigation of unemployment, to the Senate Committee on Manufactures in the 1931 investigation of economic planning; and to the TNEC monopoly inquiry. From 1933 on, as Commissioner of Labor Statistics, Dr. Lubin was one of the most hard-working, faithful, and understanding aides that Mr. Roosevelt had. Along with his regular job Dr. Lubin took on one crucial assignment after another for the President, beginning with his work in the PWA, down to his service in the OPM. Throughout the war he was one of the selfless and all but anonymous few who labored in the White House as close collaborators of Mr. Roosevelt. One of his final assignments was as associate United States representative on the Allied Reparations Commission. Dr. Lubin deserves his country's thanks for the hard work he has done. He is still a young man with a long and useful career ahead of him. We sincerely hope that he will some day return to the high governmental influence he deserves.

Harry Hopkins

DEMOCRATIC peoples are traditionally ungrateful, and the post mortem tributes to Harry Hopkins hardly compensate for the terrific beating he took in his lifetime. Mr. Hopkins was associated with Mr. Roosevelt longer than any other New Dealer except Henry Morgenthau. He was a well-known New York City social worker when in 1931, with nearly a million unemployed in New York State, Mr. Roosevelt made him director of the Temporary Emergency Relief Administration. From 1933 to 1938 Mr. Hopkins did for the nation's unemployed what he had done for New York's. Through the WPA, the CWA, and the FERA he provided made work for the jobless. He built and repaired schools, constructed roads, post offices, dams, and bridges, warred on illiteracy, supported special projects for the arts. One can hardly compute the sum total of human misery that this frail man helped to alleviate; his reward was a continuous snarling uproar from the press and Congress about boondoggling, leaf raking, and red plots. No man, not even Mr. Roosevelt, was ever subjected to a more narrow, cantankerous, unjust, and intemperate succession of attacks, and these without any doubt seriously affected his health.

Mr. Hopkins was far from being the radical he was painted. He was humane and progressive but no left winger. The first test of how far he would go came early in the Roosevelt administration when he put his foot down on the plan to have the unemployed take over mattress factories in Ohio and manufacture for themselves. The socialistic potentialities of the scheme were obvious; the idea of putting idle men at idle machines for self-help was attractive to many New Dealers. Mr. Hopkins was criticized for opposing it. No one will ever know how much that opposition sprang from his own views, how much from a healthy and realistic sense of how far the country—and Mr. Roosevelt—would let work relief go. There was a period, from 1938 to the outbreak of the war, when Hopkins was Secretary of Commerce, in which a wide rift opened between him and the brain-trust crowd. The big business men Hopkins wooed into the New Deal through his Business Advisory Council were regarded as an influence against further social reform; they were the reservoir from which were drawn many of those who served the government—not a few of them very ably and well—in production and diplomatic posts during the war.

It was the war that brought out some of Hopkins's best qualities, as negotiator, as shrewd strategist, and as the loyal and self-sacrificing right hand of the President. One can only vaguely grasp the burden those years must have put on an already sick and doomed man; the aid and consolation he must have given Mr. Roosevelt in his heavy trials. Much that history will credit to Roosevelt was really the work of Hopkins; he would be the last to grudge the glory to his great friend.

Labor in Wonderland

AMERICAN taxpayers came off rather poorly in their week's investment on Capitol Hill. They paid out well over $100,000 in Congressional salaries, not to mention operating expenses, and drew an absolute blank in services rendered. The Senate completed its fourth week of filibustering, which is the same as a work stoppage in private industry except that in the case of the Senate the strikers go right on collecting their pay. On the House side some four hundred Representatives occupied themselves with passing an extraordinarily obnoxious anti-labor bill that nobody pretended to have studied and everyone conceded had no chance of becoming the law of the land.

Scorning the Truman formula for easing management-labor relations, this measure, introduced by Representative Case from the great industrial state of South Dakota, would make the President's "cooling-off" proposal merely the initial provision in a sweeping move to restore labor to the bargaining position it enjoyed in the 1880's. While not openly repealing the Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction law, the Case bill would make a mockery of the statute by giving any judge the right to enjoin even "threatened violations" of the bill's provisions against the use of violence. No vivid imagination is required to conjure up the picture of a politically obligated judge seeing "threats" in a picket's frown and incitements to violence in a union rally. Most boycotts, jurisdictional strikes, and sympathy strikes would be banned, with loss of rights under the National Labor Relations Act as the penalty. Civil suits against labor and management would be permitted for "contract violations," providing a free-for-all for company lawyers and a constant threat to unions of having their funds tied up in endless litigation. Finally, supervisory workers would be denied the status of "employees" under the Labor Relations Act.

The provisions of this legislative throwback are less important than the politics that went into its passage. In the first place, the bill must have had the secret blessing of the Republican high command, since Representative Halleck of Indiana, a member of the powerful Rules Committee, was a prime mover in that body's extraordinary decision to rush the measure to the floor of the House without benefit of committee hearings. Halleck happens also to be chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee. But this is an election year, and G. O. P. Congressmen with sizable labor constituencies were clearly embarrassed. They were not going to vote and die just because someone had blundered.

A curious situation developed, with some of the most virulent Republican labor-baiters in the House making painful efforts to mount the fence in a hurry. Hoffman, of Michigan, attacked the bill from the start, though his suffering was plain. It was he who opposed use of the injunction, and he did get across an amendment substituting for it the forfeiture of rights under the Wagner act. It was also Hoffman who held up the vote on the bill for twenty-four hours, and in the end he voted against it. Most of his party colleagues from industrial states shared his alarm, and modifying amendments came from such unlikely sources as Landis (Ind.), Vorys (Ohio), and Sumner (Ill.).

But even as the Republicans weakened, the Southern Democratic bloc rushed to the rescue. Smith, of Virginia, waded in with all the courage of a man whose poll-taxed vote was assured. In the best Claghorn tradition he assailed the worried Republicans for trying to "sabotage, sterilize, and caponize" the bill. And for two days he engaged in a meaningless clash with Hoffman, who at any other time would surely have supported the measure with all his lung power.

Moderate Democrats, like Sparkman, of Alabama, worked hard in their own right to modify the bill, but the strongly pro-labor group had another strategy. They were not merely willing but delighted to see their foes stew in a dish of their own making. The worse the bill the better they liked it, and few of them bothered to offer amendments. "We wanted to beat down all anti-labor substitutes, including the Truman proposal," said Marcantonio in an extreme statement of this position. Tongue in cheek, the American Labor Party representative even came to the aid of tory Representative Church, of Illinois, when the chair ruled that his amendment to outlaw political activity by trade unions was not germane. "This amendment is germane," the New Yorker protested, "It helps crucify labor, and that's what the bill is for."

In this fantasy of reactionary Republicans sabotaging their own reactionary bill, of Southern Democrats embracing it as their own, and of liberal Democrats egging their opponents on to newer and greater follies, it remained for Representative Patterson, of California, to add the Alice in Wonderland touch of innocence. "You know it is a political gesture," said Alice, in some bewilderment. "You know the Senate won't pass it, and the President won't sign it." As though, in an election year, such a thought had ever entered anyone's head!

Emerging from the even more acrid climate at the other end of the Capitol, where the FEPC was being laid to rest by its filibustering pallbearers, Senator Morse declared himself "sick of the farce." He plans to tour the nation to tell the public it "must decide whether we are going to have representative government in the U. S. A." We will as long as the public understands that the only remedy for a bad Congress is better Congressmen.

Reduced prices of food. Stalin Reports

IN HIS eve-of-election address to the Russian people Joseph Stalin rendered an account of the Communist Party's stewardship couched in such terms as to suggest a reply to domestic even more than to foreign critics of his regime. Justifying the relentless pursuit of industrial and military preparedness in the past, he indicated that in the immediate future more attention would be paid to living standards. The final aim of making the Soviet Union an industrial power equal to any remains unchanged, but, it would seem, there is to be a slackening in tempo, a pause for consolidation, during which the masses may hope to reap some material rewards for their patient and heroic sacrifices.

Asking, in effect, that the Communist Party be judged on its record, Premier Stalin pointed to a number of conclusions that could be drawn from Russia's victory over its enemies. That victory, he said, had demonstrated the "complete vitality" of the Soviet system and refuted the assertions of foreigners by proving it to be a better form of social organization than any non-Soviet system. It had proved also the strength and vitality of a "multi-national state," contradicting those who had maintained that under stress it would collapse as did the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Finally, he added, victory had brought universal recognition of the Red Army's might and efficiency.

But, Stalin continued, bravery and skill alone could not win victories. In addition, an adequate industrial structure was necessary, and it was this that the three Five-Year Plans had provided. Under the leadership of the Communist Party the country had been transformed from an agrarian into an industrial state and production of basic raw materials had doubled and redoubled. This achievement would have been impossible had they not "reversed the usual path of industrialization," beginning with heavy instead of light industries, and, despite resistance, used collectivist methods to create a "large-scale agricultural economy." Thanks to these preparations, the Soviet armament factories had been able to meet the challenge of Hitler's war machine and produce colossal amounts of material, assuring the army against any shortage.

From this explanation and justification of past policies, Stalin turned to the future program of the Communist Party. The emphasis of the next Five-Year Plan, he said, would be on reconstruction, but in the very near future rationing would be abolished and special attention would be "focused on expanding the production of goods for mass consumption." He also promised, significantly, concentration on scientific research of all kinds, enabling Soviet science to overtake that of other lands. Was this passage a reflection of popular concern lest Russia lag behind the West, a concern which may have been enhanced by the accounts of Red Army men returning from Central Europe?

Stalin's speech ended with an appeal for a vote of confidence in the general election. That vote was, of course, a foregone conclusion. Communist and "non-party" candidates were united in a single block and but one candidate was nominated in any district. The only way voters could express lack of confidence, therefore, was by abstention or turning in a blank ballot. We write before the counting of the votes but can safely predict an overwhelming triumph for the Communists. Nevertheless, it seems clear that the party is not entirely happy about its preordained success and hopes to distill from the returns some evidence about its real standing with the Soviet masses.

63% for best white flour
10" " " "

Some News to Cheer

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 10

ALTHOUGH Mr. Truman is taking a deserved beating on his ignominious appointments, the outlook in the capital at the moment is brighter than it has been since he took office. The new housing program is all that could have been asked for, and the President deserves the highest praise for sponsoring it. Labor peace really seems to be just around the corner. The steel-price settlement may prove unpalatable to the progressive and the hard-headed, but there was every reason to believe this week-end that a new and firm price line might be established and OPA Director Chester A. Bowles, the bright hope of the Administration, given ample power to hold that line. Last-minute changes are always possible, but at present it looks as if the President's well-meaning but fumbling friend, John W. Snyder, director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion, were in eclipse.

In a way it is a pity that Mr. Truman did not go on the radio with the new housing program instead of releasing it in so humdrum a fashion for the Saturday morning papers. A little showmanship would have given the whole country a badly needed lift. For while all of us grant the President's good intentions, we miss the sense of inspiration and leadership that Mr. Roosevelt provided. Yet this housing program is as bold, as comprehensive, as imaginative in its field as anything the Roosevelt Administration did. Mr. Truman even had a good phrase. He said that in calling Wilson Wyatt to Washington five weeks before to work out a housing program he gave Wyatt only one instruction—"to make no little plans." Presentation of the Wyatt report in a fireside chat would have made people feel that the man in the White House could tackle a big emergency in a big way.

The Wyatt program, in which some of the remaining New Dealers of the town had a hand, completely abandons the notion that emergency shortages can be cured by jacking up prices. In effect, it proposes to apply to the housing problem all the various devices used during the war to facilitate war production. First of all, the program sets a sizable and satisfactory goal—2,700,000 moderate- and low-cost homes to be started by the end of next year. The magnitude of the project may be measured by the fact that in 1925, the peak year for home construction in this country, only some 900,000 dwellings were built. Happily Mr. Wyatt was not indulging in mere rhetoric when he reported to the President that it would take "a dynamic program to achieve this goal," that "neither business as usual, labor as usual, building as usual, nor government as usual" would suffice.

Mr. Wyatt proposes nothing less than a permanent expansion of building capacity in this country. Thus he strikes at once at the "overproduction" bugaboo that has held back both capital and labor in the field. Mr. Wyatt has won the approval of the American Federation of Labor for the recruitment and training of 1,500,000 additional building workers; that he has done so reflects great credit on the A. F. of L. At the same time, by premium payments, subsidies, accelerated amortization for new facilities, conversion of certain war plants, and direct government aid to prefabricated housing, Mr. Wyatt intends similarly to expand productive capacity for housing. His justification is that new housing generally has run far behind demand; in 1934, for example, there were half a million more new families than homes; in 1941 there was a deficit of 300,000 homes. He points out in addition that 10,500,000 existing homes are sub-standard "and must and can be replaced in a healthy full-production economy." On this basis, the housing industry can easily absorb twice as much capital and twice as much labor as it has in the past.

To meet the immediate emergency Mr. Wyatt outlines a flexible program under which the general price line for construction will be held, while realistic adjustments of wages and prices will be made where needed. The government will take the lead in breaking bottlenecks, not by mere price rises, but by subsidizing and planning expanded production of the scarce items. And instead of the present $10,000 ceiling on new homes, Mr. Wyatt intends to aim at dwellings to cost not more than $6,000 each and to rent for not more than $50 a month. This is the kind of housing veterans and war workers need. The acuteness of the emergency is indicated by the general approval given this vigorous program. The only dissenting voice comes from the producers of lumber and other materials, who want price increases only. But even Judge John C. Collet, our hopelessly inadequate Economic Stabilization Administrator, told a Senate committee recently that price increases had proved futile as a spur to lumber production, that output had fallen steadily since 1941 despite four price rises.

It is important to recall that the housing situation is as bad as it is because of the poor advice given the President last fall by Mr. Snyder. Mr. Snyder is also to blame for the President's current difficulties with steel. The Reconversion Director has not only made it difficult for the White House to give the steel industry much less than $5 a ton, but it looks as if Snyder and Truman have been duped into a steel-price increase of that amount "across the board." The sensible method to raise steel prices would have been by a graduated increase, allowing less on basic steel and more on fabricated steel. The big integrated companies like Bethlehem and United States Steel, which produce both ingot and fabricated products, need less than the fabricating firms which have to buy steel in basic or semi-processed form. To allow $5 a ton "across the board" will make it necessary to give additional price relief to the fabricators. This means that the big companies will get price relief at both ends, and a $5 increase of this kind will probably amount to about $7.50 a ton for them. It seems that through bad advice and the poorest kind of bargaining tactics, the President is now so firmly committed that the steel companies will get a price rise generously tailored to suit the big fellows.

Perhaps it is the growing White House recognition of just what Snyder has done that lies behind the current willingness (1) to let Bowles write his own ticket on a new price line, (2) to make him Economic Stabilization Director, independent of Snyder, and (3) to authorize him to grant price relief only where it is proved necessary instead of as a general rise. This, according to reliable sources, is the program to which the White House has agreed at the moment. Let's hope it sticks. With Bowles as head of the OES and Paul Porter as his second in command in the OPA post, there is a fighting chance to keep inflation under control.

The only factor that keeps my fingers crossed is the President's intense desire to save face for his friend Snyder. The whole plan for the Bowles shift was one of Washington's best-kept secrets until the story suddenly leaked to the press Friday night. There is some reason to believe that the leak came from no less a personage than Bob Hannegan, a Missouri politician, but a politician with his ear to the ground, who has been disturbed by the reverberations of Mr. Snyder's incapacity. It is no secret here that Hannegan and Democratic leadership "on the hill" have been anxious to supersede Mr. Snyder; some of his appearances before Congressional committees have been appallingly inept. Until now the President has refused to listen to complaints about Mr. Snyder. Let's hope he is listening now.

Washington's Atomic War

BY TRIS COFFIN

Commentator for the Columbia Broadcasting Company

Washington, February 4

A HARD, rough-and-tumble fight over atomic energy is breaking through the surface in Washington. The issue is simple: who shall control the development and use of atomic energy—civilians or the military? Secretary of Commerce Henry Wallace regards this as the great moral battle of our age. He told the Senate Atomic Energy Committee, "At no time in the history of the United States has it been more important to follow the constitutional pattern of subordinating the armed services to civilian representatives of the people." And so far the military are way out in front. They control atomic energy, and by shrewd manipulation they have arranged to keep a firm hold even if formal control is shifted to civilians.

The GHQ of the military is the sprawling Pentagon Building across the Potomac River. There Major General Leslie Groves, pudgy boss of the Manhattan Project, marshals his forces and lays out strategy. This gentleman has what amounts to the most influential position in the world. By his grip on atomic energy General Groves can deeply affect our foreign policy and the future of the United Nations Organization. He can also dominate the industrial future of this country.

The General's rise to power was largely accidental. He was selected to procure materials needed for the Manhattan Project and, incidentally, to see that military security was maintained. Groves was never expected to influence policy. That was the prerogative of President Roosevelt, who was very jealous of sharing power in this important field. He certainly never intended that General Groves, who was an army lieutenant for more than ten years, should tell him what to do. With the death of Roosevelt, President Truman, new at the job, and bewildered, asked the advice of the man nominally in charge of the Manhattan Project. General Groves became the White House adviser on atomic energy.

Although Groves is not a popular man, even at the War Department, he has potent allies, men who may not like him but are in the same boat. Among them are the Joint Chiefs of Staff, several of the so-called scientific administrators—such as Dr. Vannevar Bush, lanky head of the Office of Scientific Research and Development, and Dr. James B. Conant, president of Harvard University—and many big industrialists associated with the Manhattan District. The opposition is less cohesive and less strategically organized. The loosely knit group includes Dr. Harold Urey, eminent atomic scientist and passionate proponent of civilian control; two Cabinet members, Secretaries Wallace and Ickes; young Senator Brien McMahon of Connecticut, chairman of the Senate Atomic Energy Committee; the earnest, hard-working young men of the Federation of Atomic Scientists; and certain factions within the State Department.

The tactic of the military has been shrewd and practical. It is to keep a tight hold on the Manhattan Project and, while Congress and the White House stew over the final disposition of atomic control, to lay plans for dominating whatever civilian-control scheme may be developed. The Groves men pulled a fast play in January, so fast that almost nobody noticed or commented on it. On January 7 the State Department issued an innocuous little press release. It said, "Anticipating favorable action by the United Nations Organization on the proposal for the establishment of a commission to consider the problems arising as to the control of atomic energy and other weapons of possible mass destruction, the Secretary of State has appointed a committee of five members to study the subject of controls and safeguards necessary to protect this government so that the persons hereafter selected to represent the United States on the commission can have the benefit of the study." The members of the committee named in the release are Under Secretary of State Dean Acheson, chairman; John T. McCloy, former Assistant Secretary of War; Dr. Vannevar Bush; Dr. James B. Conant; and General Groves.

General Groves

Mr. Acheson's friends say that he was puzzled when he read of this committee in the press. Apparently he had not been consulted beforehand. Mr. McCloy is an able, rather liberal man of good intentions, but he has been associated with the military and its point of view throughout the war. His job as Assistant Secretary was to ease the frictions constantly arising between the War Department and civilian agencies. Dr. Bush has never made any secret of his attitude. He has stood consistently with General Groves and the War Department against the rank and file of atomic scientists. They refer to him contemptuously as "in General Groves's pocket." Dr. Conant is likewise associated with the military. He and Dr. Bush were two of the five witnesses who appeared before the McMahon committee in support of that creature of the War Department, the May-Johnson bill.

Three weeks after the original release, another mimeographed handout was laid on the big table in the State Department press room. This announced the appointment of a committee which would advise the Acheson committee on technical aspects of atomic power. The members of the new group are David E. Lilienthal, head of the TVA, chairman; J. Robert Oppenheimer, the brilliant atomic scientist; Chester R. Barnard, president of the New Jersey Bell Telephone Company; Charles A. Thomas, vice-president of the Monsanto Chemical Company; and Harold A. Winne, vice-president of General Electric.

Mr. Lilienthal is well known as an able and liberal administrator. Dr. Oppenheimer is an individualist, a charming and entertaining one. No one has ever been quite sure where he stood on military versus civilian control, although he did indicate support of the May-Johnson bill. Mr. Barnard is an engineer who rose to the executive ranks and has dabbled briefly in public life as a member of the New Jersey Unemployment Relief Commission. Both Mr. Thomas and Mr. Winne are alleged to be "Groves men." The General suggested Mr. Thomas as a witness before the Senate Atomic Energy Committee, and it is reported that Monsanto, which Mr. Thomas represents, has offered General Groves a job. Mr. Winne is supposed to have been briefed by Groves before testifying at the Atomic Energy Committee hearing.

I asked Mr. Byrnes at a recent press conference, "Were you or the State Department consulted on the decision to continue the manufacture of atomic bombs?" He seemed surprised, even startled. He paused, reflected a few seconds, then replied thoughtfully, "No, we were not." Perhaps it did not occur to him that there were political implications in playing with the most dangerous kind of fire.

The opposition was slow to get started, but it is learning fast under the guidance of Senator McMahon, who has pulled the group together and is directing political strategy. Mr. Wallace brought the issue before the people in his testimony before the committee on January 31. He argued earnestly for civilian control of atomic energy at "the earliest possible moment." He supported the McMahon bill and said of it, "The provisions are consistent with our traditions of democracy and would place control of development of this new tremendous force in the hands of agents directly responsible to the people. Such democratic control is essential to prevent undesirable forms of authoritarianism or military dictatorship on the home front." Mr. Ickes, at an earlier hearing, grumbled loudly against military control. He said, "A democracy cannot afford to keep secrets from itself. I object to making a scientist get permission from an army officer to analyze an atom. I hope our victory will not lead to the military control of science and industry."

With these two Cabinet members on record, Senator McMahon called an executive meeting of the committee and found that the members, generally, favored civilian control. Then he hustled down to the White House for a conference with President Truman. He laid the facts on the table and tactfully suggested that now was the time for the President to make a clear-cut statement on his position.

It came like a bolt out of the blue to the army crowd. In a letter to Senator McMahon Mr. Truman said: (1) The atomic-control commission should be composed "exclusively of civilians." (2) "The government must be the exclusive owner and producer of fissionable materials." (3) "It is essential that devices utilizing atomic energy be made fully available for private development through compulsory, non-exclusive licensing of private patents, and regulation of royalty fees to insure their reasonableness." (4) "Legislation must assure genuine freedom to conduct independent research and guarantee that controls over the dissemination of information will not stifle scientific research." (5) "The [proposed] commission should be in a position to carry out at once any international agreements relating to inspection, control of production, dissemination of information, and similar areas of international action."

The Truman letter and the smooth maneuvering of Senator McMahon have put the Groves men on the spot. They cannot lobby openly against the McMahon bill. Their propaganda campaign to revive the May-Johnson bill, which even Mr. Johnson refers to sheepishly as "the so-called May-Johnson bill," has been nipped in the bud. What is left for them is undercover sniping. And there is always, as a last resort, the possibility of putting pressure on President Truman to name "right guys" to the atomic commission.

The President left the door wide open in his letter. While he said the commission should be composed of civilians, he inserted one dangerous sentence, "This should not be interpreted to disqualify former military personnel from membership." Leslie Groves, civilian, is not likely to think differently from Major General Groves. The battle has not been won.

Perón: South American Hitler

BY STANLEY ROSS

Correspondent for the Associated Press in Buenos Aires from 1943 to 1945. Mr. Ross has also written on Argentina for Collier's, the American, and other magazines.

UNLESS something unforeseen happens to prevent it, Colonel Juan D. Perón will be "elected" President of Argentina on February 24. And he will remain ruler of that rich nation until ejected by death or revolution.

Against Perón are the four main democratic parties—Radicals, Socialists, Progressive Democrats, and Communists, the Radicals alone controlling a majority of the nation's votes under a fair ballot. Against him, too, are the greater part of the middle class, the students, probably three-fifths of organized labor, and those vested interests of Argentina which are not controlled by German or British big business. But it will take more than even this formidable combination of interests to oust Perón, for the Colonel is a fearless and resourceful man, determined to win the "election" by ballots or bullets.

Juan Perón must not be mistaken for just another Latin, American dictator with a nickle-plated personality and an ironclad conscience. He is providing safe haven for a band of international bankers, munitions makers, cartel directors, and war-mongers who have transferred their headquarters from the former Axis capitals to Buenos Aires, together with their fortunes, formulas, and blueprints. At home Perón is supported by an armored police force as powerful as the army, by the Catholic church, and by the political caudillos who for sixteen years have counted votes their own way, or never bothered to count them.

Perón first appeared on the international scene when he was Argentine military attaché in Chile. One night in 1936 police broke into his apartment in Santiago and caught him turning over British and Chilean military secrets to a German agent. He was expelled from Chile, and to his chagrin learned later that the "secrets," for which he had reputedly paid 70,000 pesos, were spurious anyway. The incident, however, did not ruin his career; in 1939 his government attached him to the German army, and for two years he stamped over Europe, goose-stepping into Paris with the conquering Nazis. Then he returned home to plan the seizure of his own government and lay the basis for a group of Nazi-dominated governments in Latin America.

This plan is still in effect, sponsored by the same influences which nurtured Hitler and Mussolini—the Krupps, Fritz Thyssen, Fritz Mandl, I. G. Farben, Siemens, Sofina, vast enterprises with semi-autonomous branches all over the world. These interests, with a cache of seven billion dollars of war loot hidden or invested in Argentina, cannot afford to have Perón overthrown at the polls or anywhere else.

Perón has kept Argentina on the verge of civil war since he returned from Germany in 1941 and founded a secret lodge of some fifty colonels and majors known as the G. O. U. (Group of United Officers). Its program was to "replace the moribund sinecurist generals and corrupt, fraudulent politicians." Its secret statement of aims, written by Perón one month before the lodge seized the government, outlines a plan for conquest and coalition that would make Argentina the ruling nation of the continent. "The struggle of Hitler in peace and war shall be our guide," runs one of the slogans.

For nine months after the G. O. U. became the government Perón allowed President Pedro P. Ramirez, a colorless general, to get the grit out of the political machinery. But his innate craving for recognition finally caused him to step out from behind the Presidential chair to a position in front of it. On one occasion he modestly said, "I take orders from President Ramirez. I am merely a soldier." A week later, scenting a Ramirez plot to seize actual power, he pounded his chest and told reporters: "This is the government of the G. O. U. and I am the G. O. U.! In my desk I have the signed undated resignations of 3,300 of the army's 3,600 officers, and the others do not matter."

This incident followed Argentina's diplomatic rupture with the Axis, on January 26, 1944. Perón had vigorously opposed the break until the United States South Atlantic fleet moved ominously into the La Plata estuary; he then reluctantly consented. But when he learned that Ramirez's Foreign Minister, General Alberto Gilbert, was planning economic measures against the Germans in Argentina, he stalked furiously into the Foreign Ministry, drew his sword, and ran Gilbert out of the building and the Cabinet.

Deprived of Gilbert's support, President Ramirez made a desperate attempt to oust the G. O. U. On the afternoon of February 25 he ordered the resignation of War Minister General Edelmiro J. Farrell and of Farrell's "assistant," Perón. Farrell obeyed. Perón did not. Instead, he fixed the President's messenger coldly with his eye and said, "Inform the unhappy ones who sent you that they will never get me out of here alive!"

That night six of Perón's generals burst into Ramirez's study, guns in hand, and forced him to sign over his powers to Perón's gawky puppet, General Farrell.

Since then Perón has been boss. Deftly he maintains his power and plays off his enemies against one another. He has flirted with capital and labor, with the moderates, the conservatives, and the leftists, and all along has been in close contact with the Nazis. He has brewed elaborate plots causing Cabinet convulsions by which sixty ministers were cast out in two years. When he realized that he could not gain full control of the army, he began to sap its strength, building up the Buenos Aires and federal police forces, famous for their brutality. The mechanized police, reinforced by countless discharged soldiers, numbers 40,000 and is a compact organization; the army has been cut to 60,000 and is spread over the country. Furthermore the army is controlled by the Condor Legion, a Nazi-trained Gestapo through which Perón learns of and aborts incipient revolts. Among its advisers is Major General Hans Steudemann, who fled from Berlin as the Allied armies approached—Steudemann is one of a group of German officers now working for Perón under Argentine names with citizenship papers to match. This powerful police force stood Perón in good stead last October, when his own ranks were so weakened by his treatment of the army that a group of youthful officers forced him out of his four Cabinet posts and jailed him for two days. With the aid of the police Perón escaped and announced his candidacy for the Presidency.

Today, with mutiny still festering in the army, and the country threatened with civil war, Perón is determined to remain ruler of Argentina. He has risked his life many times in the past forty years to get within striking distance of his goal, and I do not think he will be removed alive.

PRIVATE LIFE

Perón was born fifty years ago on the estancia of his father, a geologist and pioneer settler in bleak and icy Patagonia. As a boy he fought the local Indian youths, broke wild broncos, lassoed ostriches and wild animals with the gaucho's bolas. He forded icy streams in sub-zero weather, then raced against the wind until his bombachas froze stiff. At sixteen he was sent to military college, where he was an indifferent student but a crack soldier. His classmates called him "the man who invented work."

As a sublieutenant Perón's trigger temper and criticism of army red tape brought him before a court martial, where he had to prove he was not a Communist. Only the knowledge that he was fencing champion of the army, a title he held for sixteen years, restrained his fellow-officers from challenging him to frequent duels. A first lieutenant at twenty, for a decade he was shunted about among the less desirable posts of the interior until he was admitted to the Superior War College. By 1929, as a captain attached to the General Staff, Perón had become a serious student of tactics, attracting the fancy of General Wilhelm Faupel of the German army.

General Faupel had been sent to Argentina in 1911 by the German General Staff, which even then was planning eventual conquest of Latin America. Faupel became in turn secretary to the Argentine Inspector General and a general in the Brazilian, Chilean, and Peruvian armies. It was Faupel who later persuaded Franco to start the Spanish civil war, promising German aid, and it was Faupel who in 1930 piloted his disciple, Inspector General José Felix Uriburu, into the Argentine Presidency in a revolution that set the pattern for army dictatorships throughout Latin America during the thirties.

Faupel at the time helped Perón become Assistant

Minister of War in the Uriburu Cabinet—the same job Perón took when his G. O. U. came to power thirteen years later in an almost exact repetition of the Uriburu revolt. Under Faupel's guidance Perón became instructor in military history and strategy at the Superior War College. He wrote two textbooks so smacking of the Prussian strategist Clausewitz, whose "On War" was the military bible of the Junkers, that he has been accused of plagiarism. In one book Perón concludes that "war is an inevitable social phenomenon"; in the other he defends Germany in the First World War, blaming the United States for the Kaiser's defeat and urging Argentina to insure United States neutrality when Argentina eventually goes to war. During peace time, he said, "the country must have the army of its politics or the politics of its army. The political aspirations of a nation are as strong as the army's power to achieve them." He advised preparation not for war in general but for "a particular war."

What particular war Perón is preparing for is hard to say, although he has for the first time in Argentine history fortified the Chilean border and has stationed troops along the Brazilian frontier. When the G. O. U. came to power in 1943, Argentina had an army of 50,000 men, a large but outdated navy, and an air force with fifty first-class planes. The military budget that year had been only 260,000,000 pesos. In 1945 Perón spent 2,000,000,000 pesos on the army, swelling the national budget from 1,525,000,000 to 3,550,000,000 pesos to do it. In the early months of 1945 the army contained nearly 100,000 men, and 120 factories are today producing weapons from German blueprints.

Even the 40,000,000 pesos collected by public subscription for the victims of the earthquake which destroyed the mountain city of San Juan in January, 1944, were diverted to Perón's arms program. The Colonel's campaign for aid for San Juan residents had been so intense that people referred to the city as "San Juan de Perón." Later the stories changed tone. One relates that when the actress Eva Duarte came home one day she found a mink coat on her bed. "Now what saint in heaven could have brought this?" she exclaimed. Perón, behind the curtains, stuck out his head and replied, "San Juan."

The Colonel has just ended a two-year affaire and ten years of widowhood by marrying the twenty-six-year-old Eva and moving her into a mansion near Buenos Aires, where a pair of society spinsters are teaching her the manners of a first lady of the land. Until the marriage Perón and Evita occupied separate apartments in the same building in a middle-class section of Buenos Aires. Perón still keeps his home there—a modest, airy, five-room apartment which he shares with his daughter, Maria Inez, and an ancient halfbreed housekeeper named Koming, who raised Perón as a child in Patagonia. Perón is very fond of his nineteen-year-old daughter, who, like his bride, is an auburn-haired beauty. He usually lunches with Maria Inez at the apartment, with Maria herself waiting on the table, singing aloud and chatting gaily.

The Colonel leads a brisk life. He jumps out of bed at six, exercises for half an hour, and reads the mail and newspapers, finishing them while being driven to his election-campaign offices in Buenos Aires. There he sheds his tie and jacket and works feverishly until 1:30, interviewing, dictating, scanning documents, preparing speeches. After lunch and a short siesta at the apartment he works until 9 or 10 p. m. and if he has no speech to make or meeting to attend, takes papers home and goes on working until long after midnight. Busy as he is, he always manages to look impeccably groomed, his dark hair combed back, his nails manicured. Women admire his physique—six feet tall, a stocky 210 pounds—his winning smile, and his flashing black eyes; his face is round with a sharp nose and high forehead. Men admire him for his horsemanship, boxing, skiing, and fencing, and most people are influenced by his concentrated speech, firm voice, and well-chosen words, which he underlines with voice and hands. Foreigners like him because he enjoys a joke on himself, which is refreshing in a country where people take themselves seriously.

Perón has gone to extreme lengths to increase his popularity. He enters dirty neighborhood cafes and shares cheap red wine and bad jokes with workmen; he even attended funeral rites for a laborer killed in an anti-Perón demonstration—a brave act though he was surrounded by scores of plain-clothes men.

COURTSHIP OF LABOR

The Colonel's courtship of labor has alternated with mass arrests, torture and imprisonment of labor leaders, abolition of unions which refused to cooperate. Now the old labor organizations have disappeared into the underground, leaving only Perón's Labor Party. The Colonel's skill in undermining opposition, together with the emergence of the industrial workers as a major political factor, will give him an important block of votes on February 24. The 400,000 industrial workers in Argentina in 1930 have become 1,000,000, of whom perhaps 40 per cent are devoted followers of Perón while the others hate him blindly.

Perón's labor campaign is coached by Fritz Mandl, ex-Austrian munitions magnate with a record of applied fascism which culminated in the massacre of the Vienna Social Democrats in February, 1934. Mandl's subtle hand can be seen in the case of Jose Tesorieri, secretary of the union of government employees, who was jailed in October, 1943, because he signed a petition asking the government to break diplomatic relations with Germany. After five months of softening-up treatment in the Villa Devoto political prison, while his family lived on charity, Tesorieri was released and restored to his job on condition that he speak for Perón at public meetings. He told a friend that he had intended to flee the country as soon as released but that his family was hostage. From constantly repeating praises of Perón he has apparently begun to believe what he says and has tried hard to get his friends in the Railroad Brotherhood to jump on the band-wagon.

The railroadmen have been Perón's toughest labor opponents. They applauded his promises of higher pay and bonuses but thumpingly defeated his candidates in the brotherhood elections in favor of a slate of unknown laborers whom he had thought harmless enough to allow to enter the race. The Colonel set aside the elections, charging the winners were Communists and should be jailed. When new elections were held, with only Perón's men as candidates, the voters shunned the polls so generally that Perón's men did not get enough votes to legalize their appearance on the ballots, and a slate of write-ins—this time real Communists—carried the election.

Perón

Perón's thick-skinned Secretariat of Labor then circulated a huge embossed book with blank pages for the 200,000 railroadmen's signatures to a statement thanking the Colonel for his beneficence to organized labor. The book came back without a single signature, word having been passed that if Perón's few admirers in the brotherhood signed it, they would wish they hadn't.

Despite his tactics Perón has given labor advantages its union leaders never gained in decades of campaigning. He has decreed minimum wages and decent living conditions for agricultural workers who for centuries have lived in feudal peonage; white-collar workers, newspapermen, shop girls, and factory hands have obtained raises, vacations, and healthful working conditions. The most recent decree, ordering all concerns to raise wages approximately 30 per cent, was received with wild acclaim by even those workers who hate the Colonel. It has become a prime campaign weapon of the Labor Party, created to sponsor Perón's candidacy.

The Labor Party launched its campaign on December 14, 1945, before 100,000 persons gathered around the obelisk in the center of Buenos Aires. The meeting was a masterpiece of organization. Factories were closed at the suggestion of the police, and fleets of trucks and buses transported workers to the appointed place. Some 40,000 government employees, including 10,000 plainclothes police, were obliged to attend; the crowd was ringed by two cordons of uniformed police. Especially large was the representation from the manufacturing city of Avellaneda, adjoining Buenos Aires, whose political boss, Alberto Barcelo, head of the city's labor and graft rackets, has thrown in his lot with Perón. (In one Avellaneda district Barcelo's men do not even open the ballot boxes. They prepare substitute sets of stuffed boxes and merely burn the genuine ones when the polls close.) After wild demonstrations for their favorite, the crowd paraded through the capital shouting the phrases the nationalists had drummed into their ears for the past two years: "Argentines yes; Yankees no!" "Death to the Jews!" "Perón yes; Braden no!" "Mate yes; whiskey no!"

But well coordinated as are Perón's meetings, his principal weapon is the organized disorder, so reminiscent of the Nazis, that rears its head every time democratic elements gather in the public squares. Small disturbances start in the suburbs and spread toward the center of the city, increasing in violence until they reach the meeting place. There armed youths of the Nationalist Youth Alliance fire from roof tops or public buildings into the crowd and cause such confusion that the police find it expedient to finish the job by speeding trucks through the square, spraying the people with tear gas, and having mounted men ride them down with sabers swinging. It took only 200 armed Peronistas to break up the Democratic Union rally of 200,000 on December 8, when four persons were killed and forty injured.

OPPONENTS AND SUPPORTERS

The opposition to Perón is disrupted by such tactics and further handicapped because its only cohesive force is its dislike of the Colonel. Peronista agents, plentifully supplied with money for bribes, have even wormed their way into the nation-wide democratic underground, Patria Libre. The military branch of Patria Libre, the Movimiento de Liberación Nacional, has been all but destroyed by the Condor Legion.

In the election Perón will be opposed by a rather colorless ex-senator named José P. Tamborini, whose backing by the four major parties has deeply impressed the army. Many officers are angered by Perón's alliances with the political bosses whose corrupt practices he had assailed in rallying officers for the revolution. His bids for labor support have alienated many others, for most officers come from the landowning families. They are now concerned over his plan to confiscate and divide among the peons the 80,000-acre estancia of Robustiano Patron Costas, standard bearer of the National Democratic (conservative) Party. Patron Costas was to have been the Presidential candidate of the landed oligarchy just before the G. O. U. took over. And although the conservatives are not included in the Democratic Union, they are strongly opposed to Perón. Last month the party charged that the military government was spending public funds and using police power in an open political campaign for the Colonel. It proved that the government printing presses were turning out propaganda written by Perón's four hundred publicity men, all on the public pay roll.

But it is doubtful whether these conservative officers can counterbalance the strength and determination of Perón's backers—though one young captain among them told an officers' meeting he would personally kill Perón if the elections were not honest. Perón is supported by President Farrell, long on the pay roll of the German Club; Vice-President Juan Pistarini, whom Hitler decorated with the Order of the German Eagle; Chief of Staff Carlos von der Becke, brother of the chief Nazi agent in South America; and Police Chief Colonel Filomeno Velasco. Every one of these four men has spent at least two years with the German army.

Velasco, most rabidly Nazi of them all, has a reputation for cruelty and falseness; it is said of him that "he uses lies as women use perfume." At the very moment that police were breaking into the home of the last university rector still at liberty, he was blandly telling newspapermen that no rectors were being arrested. On the same night in October the editors of La Prensa and La Nación were also dragged off to jail, as were two former Foreign Ministers, one of them Carlos Saavedra Lamas, winner of the 1936 Nobel peace prize.

The truth is that Velasco and Perón are beginning to fear the public temper. Revolutions are born of hunger and misery, and there is little hunger in overfed Buenos Aires, but beneath layers of materialistic fat the Argentines are a brave and liberty-loving people. Since last September, when half a million people marched past the War Ministry chanting "Death to Perón," the Colonel has watched popular feeling rise, and he is racing against time to get the elections over.

WHAT KIND OF RULER WILL HE MAKE?

If Perón's plans are successful, what can be expected of him as a ruler? One cannot tell from what he says. He calls himself a liberal but in the same breath asserts, "My government is one of might, not right." He fought like a madman against a diplomatic break with the Axis during the war, yet a week later said to a friend, "The Allies are going to win this war, so we might as well make friends with them."

In trying to obtain Radical Party support he promised to restore civilian government, but on the same day he sent to G. O. U. members "Secret Memorandum No. 10" assuring them the army would keep its hush political jobs. Patria Libre published this memorandum in an underground newspaper, and Perón, purple with rage, announced to the G. O. U., "If I find the officer who released that memorandum I'll have him shot!"

Flirting with Argentine big business, Perón has assured the Stock Exchange and the Agricultural Society that he stands for the defense of their interests against communism. A year ago he invited leading capitalists to a banquet to bid for their aid. But when their spokesmen flatly said he was a greater menace than the Argentine brand of communism, the Colonel broke up the dinner by shouting, "It doesn't matter if you or the people are against me! I have created security for the workers, and I have double security for myself—an army of 100,000 men. Who can get me out of the government? Who dares start a revolution? You say you have 95 per cent of the people? Well, I have 95 per cent of the army. If you think you can overthrow my 95 per cent with yours, I dare you to try it!"

The following week 862 of Argentina's 937 business, banking, industrial, and agricultural associations published large advertisements excoriating his regime. The Colonel retaliated with a clamp-like press censorship and openly boasted that the army and "that other great army of laborers" could crush any insurrection.

Probably Perón's most sincere statements were those he made on the eve of the G. O. U. revolution. The army under him, he said, would become the instrument of Argentina's destiny, conquering by force of arms what José de San Martín, father of Argentine independence, failed to win by persuasion. Alliances would be the next step. "We already have Paraguay; we have Bolivia and Chile. With Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, and Paraguay, it will be easy to exert pressure on Uruguay. These five nations will easily attract Brazil, because of its form of government and the large nucleus of Germans. Brazil fallen, the South American continent will be ours!" "The people," he said, "must be inculcated with the necessary spirit through books, radio, press, and schools, with the collaboration of the church."

Starting with the schools, the army regime has plastered the blackboards with nationalistic slogans, and more than a year ago Perón ordered all children over twelve to have military drill and instruction in nationalism. School children are required daily to recite such slogans as "The Fatherland is always right" and "Argentina for Argentines only." Perón paints a picture of world conquest so enticing that already many patriotic boys worship him as fanatically as the German youth did Hitler. They sing his anthem, "The Fourth of June," and wear his emblem, a black condor with wings outstretched, almost a counterpart of the German eagle.

The Catholic church has been successfully wooed with a decree that Catholic religious instruction shall be given in the schools by priests, a practice eliminated from the public-school system fifty years ago when Argentine education was reorganized along lines drawn by Horace Mann. As War Minister, Perón has commissioned the Virgin Mary and a dozen other Saintly Virgins as full generals in the Argentine army. Their images are decorated with the insignia of their rank, and every soldier who passes a church containing one of the brass-bedecked statues must halt and salute. The ecclesiastical authorities have publicly announced their support of Perón and instructed the people to vote against candidates of the Democratic Union because it includes the Communists.

Perón's speeches read well. They could be set to martial music easily, and daily more people beat time to them. "Before the nation enjoys luxuries and palaces," he shouted over the networks, "we must make sure that not one single Argentine is rejected for army service for malnutrition. We are famous for improving the breed of cattle, sheep, and horses. We should have improved the breed of men . . ., because if we must oppose foreign ambitions, men, not cattle, will do the fighting. Argentina must show those who have ambitions of conquest that to enter this land they will first have to kill fourteen million Argentines!"

Perón tries hard to make Argentines fear Brazil and the United States as a means of rallying the people behind him—the device used so effectively by dictators in Europe. When I spoke with him before leaving Buenos Aires, I found it difficult to combat this attitude in the face of our war-time policy of sending lend-lease weapons to the rest of Latin America. Perón said the United States had helped Argentina's neighbors build a ring of steel around his country, while refusing to sell arms for cash to Argentina because it maintained its traditional policy of neutrality. "You gave Brazil the weapons for a powerful army, upsetting the balance of power in the continent." Uncle Sam, he added, had even given six gunboats to Paraguay, a tiny but warlike country without a seaport.

Perón said that Brazil, Chile, and other neighboring states are "have-not" nations. They lack the wheat, cattle, and fertility that make Argentina so prosperous. If they are armed while Argentina is defenseless, he argued, the temptation might be too great. "If the United States guaranteed our frontiers," he slyly said, "we would not have to arm. But you wouldn't do that, so Argentina must be prepared for defense."

All this may be true, except that Perón is not preparing for defense. He is preparing, in his own words, "for a particular war"—an aggressive war. And he has pawned Argentina's future income for a decade to store up enough weapons to keep an army of 200,000 men in the field for two years. His factories have the blueprints for those terrible weapons that Germany was about to produce when the war in Europe ended. One of the plants which the Argentine army bought from Hermann Göring last year is reported to have the German plans for the atomic bomb. Whether or not this is true, Perón's army is strong enough to cause considerable damage in the southern continent, where, the Colonel says, those who believe in lasting peace are utopian dreamers.

If the Argentine strong man becomes Argentine President next week, the situation in South America will continue to be dynamite—or uranium.

General de Gaulle Steps Down

BY IDA TREAT

An American writer who has lived in France for many years; author of "The Anchored Heart"

Paris, January 30

MY COBBLER in the rue du Bac said this morning that he knew why General de Gaulle had left the government. "It's because of the maquis du Maréchal—the people who were yesterday for Pétain. They think he's their last chance. As an honest man, he couldn't stand for that!"

That comment, among all the comments on the General's departure, was a new one, but I understood what the cobbler meant. I too knew recent converts to "Gaulism," advocates of the strong hand in politics and deadly opponents of the parliamentary regime. But I also knew others of the same ilk who hoped privately that his going might help to discredit the Assembly—the left Assembly—and give a new swing to the political pendulum at the May elections.

That any part of the reaction should have rallied to General de Gaulle is less significant than the attitude of some of his former companions who today are saying, however regretfully, "Perhaps it is for the best. Perhaps he has finished his job, and it is time for others to take over." Few would have gone that far last November.

Of all this the General himself is perfectly aware. For all his celebrated aloofness, he has a pretty keen grasp on what is taking place around him. And certainly he is far more sensitive to the defection of his friends than to the questionable, doubly questionable, change of heart on the part of a fraction of his former adversaries. I remember once in London—I think it was during one of the strained situations that arose out of the North African muddle—someone said to him, "Even if the Americans and the British let you down, you have France behind you." And General de Gaulle replied drily, and proudly, "C'est le contraire qui m'aurait désolé."

At the time all France that counted was solidly behind him, and he knew it. Secure in that certainty, he could confront criticism with equanimity. He stood for France.

Times have changed. In 1946 he was no longer commander-in-chief of a resistance army; he was Chief of State. Behind him the solid fighting phalanx had cracked, split into independent fragments, three main fragments. His prestige was slipping. His dream of the union of all Frenchmen, in peace as in war, for the sake of France—the first and supreme discipline—had encountered other "disciplines" that questioned his authority and escaped his control. In the Assembly the Chief Above All Parties could count at best on only a shifting and fragile majority, and even that seemed threatened.

I am convinced that General de Gaulle has an instinctive aversion for political parties, that the "party" in his mind implies the "politician" concerned primarily with elections and the intrigues and maneuvers of the political game, and that his vision of democracy probably includes an Assembly of individuals—men of pure motives chosen by le peuple souverain and free to plan and act according to their individual judgment of what seems best—not an Assembly of "party creatures" with imperative mandates.

All these factors may well have been fundamental in the "intolerable situation" that led to his departure. But given the personality of General de Gaulle, the conflict—and the impasse—was perhaps inevitable.

Much has been said about the personality of Charles de Gaulle—le grand Charles as the Free French, the Fighting French, called him affectionately. In their minds the term applied not only to his stature. He was the hero, the preux chevalier, "sans peur et sans reproche." Even his enemies could not question his deep personal integrity. Criticism concentrated on the outer man, his manner and his way of doing things. He was "difficult," rigid, intransigent.

Certainly few leaders of men had less of the demagogue in their make-up. From the very first, General de Gaulle made no attempt to draw men to him through personal charm or warmth of manner. On the contrary: men rallied to an idea rather than a chief. Even his close associates admitted that le grand Charles was reserved and cold. He was a name, a symbol, a point of focus, the figurehead for an attitude. As such he will go down in history; from his personal record one might judge that he had willed it so.

In London during the war years we knew him as a man of faith and conscience. A sincere and devout Catholic, he has something of the old Protestant austerity, a Protestant insistence on the individual conscience as a deciding factor in determining one's duty. The man and his conscience—and God his judge. Had that not been his faith, the chances are that General de Gaulle would never have made his appeal from London in June, 1940. The chances are that like many an officer of the French army and navy he would have stifled that conscience of his in the name of obedience to a traditional and collective discipline. To De Gaulle neither discipline nor the tradition of obedience, so deeply ingrained in every army man, held weight. His duty, over the heads of his superiors, was to France. This was "honneur et patrie." For this he became, technically, a "rebel."

Obviously, given his military education, he bore, and bears, the stamp of army life, of its long habits and traditions—the habit of command, the impatient authority of the chief; he could be as intolerant and irascible as any officier supérieur. And as supreme commander he had a constant obsession of responsibility.

By birth and training he is an aristocrat. Perhaps, as he himself is said to have related, his discovery of the "people" came with exile and the contact with those who joined him overseas—little folk of France for the most part, a sprinkling of great names, and woefully few of the comfortable middle class. No doubt like many another aristocrat General de Gaulle has an inherited disdain for the bourgeoisie, a dislike that the experience of the past few years has intensified. He believes in the "people." He has discovered their qualities; he also knows their faults. They must be lifted out of their ignorance. They must be led. Somewhat in the manner of raw recruits? One has the feeling that his conception of the republic is one in which the little man will be assured of the Four Freedoms while the reins of command are held firmly by a gifted and qualified few.

Perhaps because war is an anachronism in what we call a civilized age the war hero in peace time seems to belong to another era—so the soldier virtues of De Gaulle and his conception of national grandeur and empire. A pure figure, but alone. No chief in a democracy can stand alone.

There was no "maneuver" in General de Gaulle's departure. To those who know his disdain for intrigue, such an attitude appears unthinkable. Once more, as in 1940, he has listened to that inner voice and followed his conscience—abruptly as is his wont, and undeterred by the thought of immediate consequences or the comments of the world.

Will he return one day to political life—and how? Will he attempt to rally the "people" over the heads of parties and assemblies? As chief of a "non-political" party, as leader of a new crusade? There are already rumors, and many of his strong supporters are torn, like Maurice Schumann, "between the will and desire to see him again, and the fear that if he returns he will no longer be himself." Or like Jean Tixier, who "refuses to think that one day certain half-pay pensioners of a 'Gaullism' of which we would no longer be a part, might bring him out of his retreat."

What General de Gaulle will do no one can foresee. An isolated figure, at a time when individual liberty everywhere is having to adjust itself to the needs of collective liberties, he shares no confidences. If and when that terrific inner voice—genius or daemon—calls him to action, he will act. May destiny guide him, so that no shadow may darken his record or his memory!

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Feast and Famine

A VISITING Englishman recently remarked that New York wasted enough food in one night to feed England for a week. No doubt this was a somewhat exaggerated statement, but the contrast between the abundance displayed in food stores and restaurants here and the meager and monotonous diet available to Britons is glaring. This week, moreover, Britons have been told to pull their belts a notch tighter. They are to get less fat immediately and are warned that eggs, bacon, and poultry will become increasingly scarce owing to the feed shortage. Rice imports are to be cut out altogether because of the rice famine in Asia, and wheat imports are being reduced by 250,000 tons in the first six months of this year. In order to make up for this loss British wheat stocks are to be drawn down below what has hitherto been regarded as a safe minimum, and the flour-extraction rate is to be raised from 80 to 85 per cent, which means the return of the dark war-time loaf.

In spite of these changes Britain will still have a moderately well-balanced diet of nearly 3,000 calories per head per day, and compared to most countries in Europe will be well off. Indeed, a friend of mine who recently returned to London from France, where he had spent the war, writes that the contrast between the two countries is unbelievable, and he is rapidly regaining weight. France, in turn, is somewhat better off than many other parts of Europe. The report of the Emergency Economic Committee for Europe just issued estimates the diet of the French urban population during the next few months at 1,500 to 2,000 calories per day, while less than 1,500 appears likely to be available to the non-farm population in most parts of eastern Europe, Germany, and Italy. Since 2,650 calories daily are needed to maintain health and efficiency, it is certain that this winter will take a heavy toll of European lives.

Yet horrible as the state of Europe is, an even more appalling prospect is opening in eastern Asia. Northern Indo-China is now in its second year of famine. It is estimated that 600,000 or more persons died from starvation in 1945, and similar numbers are expected to perish this year. India needs a minimum of two million tons of food to avert famine, and less than half of this amount is in sight. Already conditions are becoming critical in the southern part of the Peninsula, including the populous provinces of Madras and Bombay, and a cut in the daily rice ration—the main staple of existence—from a pound to twelve ounces per day is under discussion. The worst threat, however, comes from a drought in the northern wheat-producing provinces of Punjab and Sind. Unless rain falls within the next two weeks, it is said, the greater part of the crop from these normally surplus regions will be ruined. "In that event," cables a New York Times correspondent, "India, without outside aid, faces a famine of catastrophic dimensions in the opinion of every person to whom I have talked."

Everywhere except in North America war or weather or both ravaged the harvests last year. France, which normally is nearly self-sufficient, produced only about half its pre-war average crop of wheat, partly because of war-born shortages of labor, tools, and fertilizer, partly because it was a very wet season. Meanwhile the Mediterranean region was afflicted with drought. North Africa, which normally exports 450,000 tons or so of wheat to France, was forced to import on a large scale and even then suffered from hunger riots. Outside Europe two of the largest exporting countries, Argentina and Australia, both experienced a lack of sufficient rain. In Australia conditions were so bad that it was necessary to buy Canadian wheat for home consumption. Fortunately this year's crop, now being garnered, is much better, but it will all be needed to meet Asiatic deficiencies.

In the world wheat picture last summer the only bright spots were the United States and Canada, both of which had bumper harvests. On July 1, 1945, total United States supplies (new crop added to carry-over) amounted to 1,404,000,000 bushels. Six months later 715,000,000 bushels had "disappeared," leaving only 564,000,000 available for the next six months if stocks were not to be reduced below the safety level. The chief reason for this rapid rate of consumption, which threw government plans badly out of gear, was the consumption as animal feed of 205,000,000 bushels—more than the Department of Agriculture had expected would be used for this purpose in the full year. Thus while much of the world is near starvation, a swollen livestock population in this country dines luxuriously on wheat.

If the animals continue to feed so well, it will be impossible for the United States to export the 225,000,000 bushels which it is committed to ship before June 30. Some of the measures announced by Mr. Truman on February 6 are designed to remedy this situation, but it is not going to prove easy to pry loose wheat from the farms, especially as other feeds are in very short supply. At present price ceilings it is profitable to turn wheat into meat, eggs, and poultry. Moreover, farmers with surplus stocks are holding for a rise in prices knowing that a drive is being made to end all price controls by June 30. "Should this happen," says M. W. Thatcher, president of the National Federation of Grain Cooperatives, "there will be a sharp but temporary spurt in prices, and under such conditions, commodities held on the farm are a better hedge than money in the bank." One way of bringing more wheat into the market, therefore, is an assurance that the OPA is not going to be sunk. Only Congress can provide this assurance.

Mr. Truman, using such powers as he possesses to stretch wheat supplies, has ordered coarser milling, restricted the use of grain for beverages, provided for lower inventories, and so on. But unless some way can be found to induce the thinning of cattle and poultry herds, too much wheat will continue to disappear in the feeding troughs. The difficulty is that, with the Administration committed to holding up farm prices, it pays to maintain a livestock population exceeding national needs. Just how this problem can be solved I do not know. But I do know that the moral position of America is going to be undermined if it continues to feast while famine spreads across the earth.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

THE curtain rises. Enter the Pretender. He has not inherited from his father the sharp wit and the Madrid manner that made Alfonso popular, especially with foreigners. He is certainly a Bourbon, but he resembles more his mother, the soft, plump Victoria Eugenia of Battenberg. He is not talkative. When he does make a statement, it has first been painstakingly edited by his able adviser, Lopez Oliván, former ambassador at the Court of St. James's. Above all, Don Juan must be kept from making compromising declarations. When the Axis seemed to be winning, he tended to be carried away by his fascist sympathies; in his new role he delivers carefully memorized speeches on constitutional liberal monarchy.

But unfortunately for the Pretender, his earlier political views have been chronicled—not in some Jacobin pamphlet, but in an authorized biography, "Prince Don Juan of Spain," written by his secretary, Bonmatti de Codecido, and published in Valladolid in 1938. Monarchist agents have been trying to buy up the whole edition, but a few copies reached Mexico and I have one before me as I write.

We find former King Alfonso, Don Juan, a Phalangist writer Gonzalez Ruano, and the biographer talking in the lobby of the Hotel Excelsior-Galia in Milan. Ruano is showing the King his membership card in the Falange; "Number 5," he says proudly. Alfonso remarks contemptuously, "I'm 500 ahead of you. The first Phalangists in Spain were General Primo de Rivera and I." "The first," agrees Don Juan.

"In Italy," the biography recounts, "Don Juan met his three great loves: Catholicism, fascism, and monarchy." The Pretender cannot conceal his enthusiasm for Mussolini's regime: walking past the Palazzo di Venezia one day, he exclaimed, "I can't pass here without remembering Spain. What wouldn't I give for my country to achieve this reality of empire full of youthful, conquering élan!"

In the days just before the Franco uprising, the book describes Don Juan as consumed by anxiety lest the rebellion be put off. For hours on end he never left the radio; finally, one day, he burst out, "Could it be possible that the certainty of a military uprising exists only in my imagination?" At last the news came. "On that seventeenth day of July, now famous in the history of his country, he began to hear the first faint heartbeats of his true Spain." He counted the days till he could go to fight at Franco's side. July 20, 21, 22, 23. . . . Don Juan neither sleeps nor lives nor rests for a single moment." He was impatiently awaiting Franco's reply to his request that he be allowed to join the army. Finally, on July 31, he crossed the border into the rebel zone, "dressed in overalls, with the red beret and the emblem of the Falange, the arrows." But Franco wanted no Pretender around who might supplant him; he escorted Don Juan back to the frontier.

From the Hotel Eden in Rome Don Juan sent another plea to General Franco on December 7, 1936, this time asking to be accepted as an officer or a simple sailor on the rebel ship Baleares. "I do not know, my General, whether in writing in this manner, I am violating protocol. . . . But all my hopes are with you and all my prayers are that God aid you in your noble undertaking to save Spain." He sees Spain in close alliance with Fascist Italy taking the lead in a Catholic bloc that will draw in the "brother Spanish countries" and form an irresistible barrier against the "barbarian invasion from the East." Throughout the Spanish war the Pretender was, emotionally and ideologically, on the fascist side, just as in World War II he sided with Hitler and Mussolini until the Axis began to crumble.

A few days ago the Pretender arrived in Lisbon to confer with Franco's representatives about restoration of the monarchy. News of his coming provoked little reaction in Madrid—a demonstration of some two hundred people in which twenty boys, sons of well-known royalist leaders, were arrested. It was strictly a family affair.

Lacking support inside Spain, Don Juan's advisers count on two allies—the Vatican and Britain. The Vatican, because it sees in Spain the best Continental stronghold from which to extend its influence in America. Britain, because a monarchist Spain could be used to good advantage in the diplomatic struggle against Russia. Surely no greater insult could be offered the British Labor government than the monarchists' confidence that England will help restore the House of Bourbon. Complicity in this maneuver would disgrace the Labor government forever. Attlee and Bevin should remember León Blum; during his years in a German prison there was not a day, the French leader says, when he did not regret his weakness on Spain. I cannot imagine Stafford Cripps or Ellen Wilkinson accepting a new betrayal. But there is the danger that some well-meaning people in England, even Labor people, accepting monarchy as a normal, democratic way of governing, may favor replacement of the hated dictator by a king. But it is idiotic to speak of a liberal monarchy in Spain. A Spanish monarchy would be either Phalangist and clerical, provoking revolt through a policy of terror, or weak and corrupt, inviting a coup from right or left.

It is even more absurd to imagine that the people of Spain—who fought for three years against Axis intervention and Allied non-intervention, who have come out of the concentration camps of Europe tattered and starving but unbroken, who enlisted in thousands in the French resistance, who still fall every day before the firing squads of Franco, crying "Long live the Republic"—that these people will allow the battle for freedom to end in a shameful masquerade. Spain will fight the monarchy as it fought Franco; the clerical press of the United States may as well begin now to prepare its editorials denouncing us as "reds" and "murderers." The Western democracies were responsible for much of the blood shed in Spain ten years ago; if they support Don Juan now they will have to share responsibility for the new civil war that will surely follow. DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES ON CANADIAN LITERATURE

BY ROBERT LEIGH WEAVER

THERE is talk in Canada of a literary coming-of-age. And after a past of false hopes and generally second-rate writing, few interested Canadians feel inclined to comment too harshly on the real, if definitely limited, achievements of the moment. Moreover, much recently published work does show a new and promising vitality and ambition, though it also has the air of uncertainty usually associated with a literature still struggling to establish itself.

This recent progress will seem insignificant to most Americans unless they have some understanding of the special difficulties of Canadian writers. Unfortunately lack of space forces me to make many generalizations, and several "literary" problems must be arbitrarily divorced from larger issues of which they are an organic part.

In the past many Canadian authors have been strongly influenced—and still are—by British writing. But while the work of Auden, Spender, Virginia Woolf, Aldous Huxley, and other experimentalists is beginning to mean something to young Canadians, too many established writers have favored more conventional models. Thus the Canadian Poetry Magazine, which probably would have interested the Victorians, is now worth reading only because it occasionally and hesitatingly prints the work of the younger poets. Writers' groups and a number of other magazines mirror nineteenth-century influences, and public libraries are a haven for even the poorest British books. Literature courses in colleges and universities are based almost entirely on the work of classical English novelists and poets. Contemporary literature is studied inadequately, and the influence of important European writers is scarcely noticeable. For the rest, Canada has, unfortunately, accepted the mass-production culture of the United States—the best-sellers, the pulps and slicks, the comics—with its distortion of life and its too ready simplification of complex problems.

The tendency of Canadians to import much of their literature has been fostered by internal sectionalism. Serious differences between Quebec and the other provinces have left the country without any deep, distinct cultural pattern or heritage. The population is small, the land is vast, and Canada is drawn south to another country instead of east and west within itself. Some of the younger writers show an awareness of this sectionalism, and the division between English- and French-speaking Canadians is being examined.

The effects of puritanism are not always obvious, but the pressures of a passionate intellectual sobriety have left their mark on Canadian literature. There is direct censorship: "Ulysses" and "Sanctuary" are banned. Sometimes the careful official mind moves more subtly: "Strange Fruit" was not banned in Toronto after the Boston episode; it was simply not purchased by public libraries. Canadian writers are not allowed to forget that there is a vocal minority, which sometimes seems to be a majority, eager to denounce any sign of "obscurity." (In Canada obscenity is a harsh synonym for naturalism and realism, especially when indulged in by native writers.)

Few Canadians are able to earn sufficient money from the sale of books and articles to devote themselves entirely to writing. In an attempt to solve this difficulty some writers have left the country, some have turned to other fields, writing only in their spare time, and others, without emigrating, have sought markets outside Canada. These solutions are far from perfect, either for the individual or for Canadian literature. I shall not attempt a detailed discussion of publishing in Canada, but one fact should be noted. Books published in Great Britain and particularly in the United States are advertised in this country through imported newspapers, magazines, and radio talks, and it is almost impossible for a Canadian work to obtain publicity equal either in quantity or in impressiveness.

These difficulties have produced their logical results. The average Canadian knows little about the writings of his compatriots, and a literature truly contemporary and recognizably Canadian has been slow to develop. Between the two world wars the American literature of disillusionment and later of social consciousness did not have its counterpart in Canada. And perhaps the critics who in the past few years have attacked the American realists of that period so bitterly, might not have done so if they had been in a position to know that for lack of realism Canada in the same years produced a literature without vitality, power, or perception. We were treated instead to the gently subjective musings of poetesses and their male counterparts, and to quiet dallyings in historical backwaters.

There were exceptions of course. Some writers combined outside influences with a Canadian background. Morley Callaghan, one of the few novelists to write consistently about immediate problems, unfortunately was content to develop characters apparently devoid of will or intellect. His novels form a long Canadian tragedy, in which the tragedy lies as much in the never thoroughly developed abilities of the author as in the lives of the characters he creates. Frederick Philip Grove, whose stories of the Canadian Middle West correspond in some ways to those of Sherwood Anderson, is surprisingly little known in Canada. And his novels, achieving something almost tremendous in their total effect, are individually shot through with clumsy techniques and curiously contrasting emotional and intellectual attitudes, some being puritanical and some nearly Freudian.

Two other writers of this period are generally overrated. The Jalna series of Mazo de la Roche is apparently more widely known in the United States than most contemporary Canadian fiction; but the Whiteoaks of Jalna are typical representatives of those British immigrants who never really became Canadians. It is both foolish and dangerous always to insist on the use of a "real" Canadian theme, for the reality may be debatable, and, in any case, a purely regional literature is not enough. But Canadians do have a right to feel that so substantial a novelist as Miss de la Roche might have chosen as the background for her major work a more integral section of Canadian life. E. J. Pratt, the poet of titanicism, is the dean of living Canadian poets. His tendency to mighty rhythms has created a poetry which is frequently striking but which, read at length, is generally dull. And when we consider the national and international crises which occurred during the period of his writing, Pratt cannot be said to have added much to the intellectual content of Canadian poetry.

By the beginning of the war a number of younger Canadian poets had begun to deal with social and political questions. The war years saw the publication of several new "little" magazines. Faced with both British and American competition, Canadian magazines have been a dreary lot, and serious literature in this field has been kept alive only by one or two university quarterlies and the leftist Canadian Forum. Now literary magazines have been established by groups of young writers in different sections of the country, and they continue to be published in spite of economic difficulties. These magazines stress poetry and criticism; generally speaking their fiction is poor. And among their writers there seems to be a tendency to isolation which, if carried to extremes, may result in a divorce from the feeling for life so basic to good writing. These journals have not added much to Canadian literature in spite of the brilliance of several First Statement poets, and their future is still uncertain. But as a reflection of new interest in literature they have a definite importance.

As in most countries the number of novels published in Canada decreased during the war. But the crises of this period stimulated a new social consciousness among novelists, partly by forcing a relaxation of taboos but chiefly by creating a new sense of urgency among all citizens. And although actual achievements have not been as striking as many notoriously lax Canadian reviewers suggest, I believe that they provide the prelude to as well as the necessary release for important work to follow.

The most startling popular success was achieved by Gwethalyn Graham's "Earth and High Heaven," which seems to me one of a new class of novels—the socially conscious slick. Until the climax the book seems to have a certain value; but then it becomes fraudulently Hollywood, and the problems it has posed are robbed of all dignity. Two other popular novels give reason for more hope, although neither is as expertly written as "Earth and High Heaven" and although both are in a certain sense failures. "Two Solitudes" deals with the French-English problem, and it too develops an issue which is not solved; but Hugh MacLennan does not attempt to impose a popular and incorrectly simplified conclusion in place of a solution he does

Whittlesey House

BOOKS TO OWN

Washington Tapestry

By OLIVE EWING CLAPPER

"A delightfully told story of the political scene of the last two decades, that provides not only a wealth of information but many a chuckle."
—Chicago Sun. $2.75

THE Four Cornerstones of Peace

By
VERA MICHELES DEAN
Research Director,
Foreign Policy Association

"An analysis of the conferences at Dumbarton Oaks, Yalta, Mexico City and San Francisco... There are few specialists so well qualified to help the American people on global politics."
—N. Y. Herald Tribune Book Review. With official texts. $2.50

World Politics Faces Economics

By HAROLD D. LASSWELL. A brief but comprehensive analysis of the effect of our economic policies on world security, with special attention to relations between Russia and the United States. $1.25

The Management of Your Government

By HAROLD D. SMITH, Director of the U. S. Budget. "What a budget should be... the strengths and weaknesses of a bureaucracy... the role of planning in modern government... Hits a gratifying level of simplicity, insight and intelligence."—Chicago Sun. $2.50

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

Whittlesey House

A DIVISION OF
McGraw-Hill Book Co.
NEW YORK 18

not clearly see. And about "Two Solitudes" there is a tremendous compulsion that sustains a novel which is frequently too wordy and, in the final sections, sketchy and weak. In "Master of the Mill" Frederick Philip Grove examines the influence of a flour mill upon its successive owners. One of them attempts to introduce a system of fascist control, and the novel provides a strikingly imaginative exposé of the development of a vast monopoly. But this potentially important and exciting story is poorly constructed. It is told by means of a series of clumsily devised flashbacks which are often the wanderings of a senile old man, and the result is frequently almost utter confusion.

A good deal of interesting work has resulted from the preoccupation with social problems of the younger poets. Two of these poets, A. M. Klein and Irving Layton, are Jewish, and both are from Montreal. While Klein's poetry is suffused with his Jewish background, Layton has developed along the lines of modern proletarian poets, although he frequently draws both content and imagery from Jewish life. Klein, whose early work was extremely fine, has written somewhat weaker poetry lately; he has been understandably tortured by the monstrous persecutions of recent years, but these atrocities appear to be too great to be consistently brought within the limits of poetic expression. In his first book, "Here and Now," Layton's poems about the slums ("... and the wind's occasional/sigh lifts from the garbage pails their stinks") and about army life ("... no one will hear the furtive/scraping of the veteran's stump...") are filled with effectively contrasted poetic expression and blunt social statement. His few love poems are less interesting and more conventional.

Like Layton, Patrick Anderson is associated with the Montreal group that published First Statement—which has now been combined with another "little" magazine to make the Northern Review. First Statement published Layton's book and Anderson's "A Tent for April." Anderson's poetry expresses the protest of the radical parliamentarian; Layton's that of the talented soapbox orator. But Anderson shows a deep feeling for people, and he has achieved a cosmopolitanism which still leaves him free to create distinctly Canadian poetry. His most ambitious poem, "Canadian Scene," demonstrates this blending:

cities not found and greater in the mind woods without words and winter on the boughs like crystal birds!

And in the same poem (writing of Montreal):

We used to say the loneliness and the mystery were somewhere on the rims, a distant suburb:
we were wrong. They are here. Here in the center.

Among the many other poets now writing two deserve special mention. F. R. Scott and Dorothy Livesay early began writing about Canadian urban life and the effects of the depression. Protest gives their poetry an angry vitality, and both are able to write simply and effectively about nature.

French Canadian writing, which has developed from a cultural background different from that of the other provinces, has found a path of its own. I have not attempted a lengthy survey of this literature here, because I have not made a sufficiently careful study of it to speak with authority. But two factors are dominant in the literature of French Canada—Roman Catholicism and a passionate desire for continuance as a living cultural entity. Its critical writing has dealt mainly with French writers and artists, but a few studies of their English and American contemporaries have appeared. Prose and poetry show similar tendencies—a frequent sense of all-pervading sin, an interest in the simple virtues and in nature, nationalism, and sometimes naivete. The best continuing survey of French Canadian writing is to be found in the University of Toronto Quarterly. The issue of April, 1945, cited "Au Pied de la pente douce," "a picture of life in a working-class district... in Quebec," which is the first important social novel by a French Canadian.

This is a period of release and beginning for Canadian literature. Many of our writers now realize that freedom and vitality in literature can best be obtained by dealing honestly with contemporary life. This is at least a bright omen.

For Nation Readers!

THE ART OF PLAIN TALK

by RUDOLF FLESCH

Do you write or read reports? issue public-relations releases? or otherwise offer ideas for public acceptance? Here is aid to helping you put simple power and crystal clarity into your messages. Here is a plea for plain talk, a description of what plain talk means and a guide to simplifying one's style of writing that will appeal to all. "With wit and good humor Dr. Flesch follows his own writing rules... thoroughly readable and interesting."
—Tide, $2.50

PRODUCTIVE THINKING

by MAX WERTHEIMER

Late Professor of Psychology, The New School for Social Research

What occurs when thinking really works productively? What is really going on in such a process? A brilliant psychologist here presents the results of his teaching and research as to the nature and process of productive thinking and how this process can be forwarded. "Wertheimer has contributed more than any other writer to the psychology of human thought processes. His posthumous volume will become one of the classics in the field."—GORDON L. ALLPORT, Dept. of Psychology, Harvard University. $3.00

HARPER & BROTHERS, 41 E. 33rd St., New York 16, N. Y.

The Work of Chief Justice Stone

CHIEF JUSTICE STONE AND THE SUPREME COURT.

By Samuel J. Konefsky. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THIS is not a life of Chief Justice Stone. The book itself is virtually devoid of biographical detail, and not much more than a bare outline of the Chief Justice's career is given in a prefatory note by Charles Beard. The purpose of the book is rather to analyze Chief Justice Stone's contribution to constitutional theory and his influence upon the work of the Supreme Court. Mr. Konefsky has accomplished his chosen task well despite its difficulties. Jurists are not fungible personalities. But to assess the originality and leadership of a judge who is only one of a bench of nine requires great discernment. The trend of his own thought usually seems to be the trend of the court.

The most radical member of the present Supreme Court has been Justice Black. Chief Justice Stone has occupied the more strategic position left of center, and has helped to make the minority views of Holmes and Brandeis the accepted doctrine of the court. Inspired by one of Justice Holmes's epigrams, he has done much to curtail the intergovernmental tax-immunity doctrine, so that the income from government securities and the salaries of government employees have both been brought within the reach of the tax gatherer. However sound from the point of view of constitutional theory, the latter accomplishment has been of questionable practical utility. The state and federal governments have collected taxes on the pay of each other's employees, but they have had to return most of it to them in the form of pay increases. The lag in this process has been an unfortunate aspect of the period of war-time inflation.

Although Chief Justice Stone's insistence upon greater realism in the approach to constitutional questions is also part of the Holmes-Brandeis tradition, he has nevertheless struck many new notes. Thus he has been particularly effective in scotching those forms of question-begging of which lawyers are so fond. He has demonstrated neatly that the tests of the "direct-indirect" effect of legislation and the concept of the business "affected with a public interest" merely disguise preconceived conclusions. In dealing with legislation tending to infringe civil liberties, he has developed a doctrine against political restraints as a persuasive justification for holding such legislation unconstitutional while refusing at the same time to interfere with social legislation. It is not only that the constitutional guaranties of civil liberty are more specific but also that the maintenance of civil and political rights is essential if the electorate is to be in a position to express itself on the wisdom of social legislation. At least one of Chief Justice Stone's motus will live in our constitutional history. In the darkest days of the New Deal he had occasion to warn the Old Guard of the court that "while unconstitutional exercise of power by the executive and legislative branches of the government is subject to judicial restraint, the only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint."

WILLIAM SEAGLE

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Black Common Man

IN "MARCHING BLACKS" (Dial, $2.50) Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., presents what he calls "an interpretative history of the rise of the black common man." The rise of the "black common man" is traced through three periods: Africa to Chicago, covering the period 1526-1920; the period of "the boom and the crash," 1920-40; and the period from Pearl Harbor to the present. The discussion of the changes in the status of the Negro during these three periods is characterized by many shrewd insights, novel and

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN SOVIET POLITICS AT HOME AND ABROAD

The full story of Soviet Communism as a political movement and a way of life from its genesis prior to World War I to the contemporary problems following World War II, with special emphasis on the changing course of Soviet domestic and foreign policies.

"A fresh beginning in Soviet Western understanding. A brilliant recapitulation. . . . Certainly no other book on the Soviet Union . . . excels his . . . in readability and sustained interest." —New Republic

"The best survey in the field. But it is more than a survey. It is an interpretation with insight and power." —MAX LERNER

"Notable for the breadth of its perspective, the vigor of its style and the abundance of its factual contents . . . highly interesting and even exciting reading."

— New York Times Book Review

710 pages, $4.00

For sale at all bookshops, published in New York by

ALFRED · A · KNOPF

unwarranted interpretations of historical facts, and much justifiable indignation. For example, such phenomena as the emergence of a class of free Negroes before the Civil War and the advantageous position of the house slaves and the mulattoes are treated as if they were due to some consciously planned conspiracy against the black masses. In championing the cause of the black masses against the talented tenth of lighter complexion, the Reverend Mr. Powell indulges in much rabble rousing, claiming that he is a descendant of the black field Negroes. His section, on what happened to the Negro from 1920 to 1940 offers a fair analysis of the changes in the Negro's status as long as it sticks to facts. The third part contains an indictment of the nation for its treatment of the Negro during World War II, which, Powell holds, began as a race war and was converted into Civil War II to complete the emancipation of the Negro. We are still engaged in Civil War II, which can only be won by the migration of the millions of Negroes from the South. This book was written, undoubtedly, to spur the Negro to continue his fight for freedom, and as such it is an effective piece of writing. But, unfortunately, it is marred by a number of glaring errors. There are errors concerning dates of well-known happenings, and in one case a white man is described as the "first Negro to emerge in this century as an educated, subsidized Uncle Tom."

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

Power and Peace

A BOOK IS NOT A MAGAZINE. It should offer some unity of thought and style. Collective books are invariably disappointing, even such notable achievements as "The City of Man" or "Beyond Victory." "Peace, Security, and the United Nations," edited by Hans J. Morgenthau (Chicago, $1.50), is no exception. Any one of the five distinguished contributors could have written a better book. Then, too, these lectures were delivered on July 9-13, 1945, and President Truman revealed the atomic bomb to the world on August 6 (my pious calendar states: Transfiguration Day).

The title should be reworded: "No Peace or Security Under the UNO." Percy E. Corbett notes that the smaller nations insisted on writing justice into the charter. But the word is taken in a purely Pickwickian sense, and he concludes that power remains the sole reality. Arthur Robert Burns tries to figure out how the victors can squeeze the Germans without having a rotting corpse on their hands. Malbone W. Graham gives a capital sketch of the great-power idea. Vienna, Versailles, triumph of the Big Three, Munich, greatest achievement of the Big Four—an ominous record; yet we are relapsing into the good old method which has "averted" all the wars in the past. He believes that intermediate powers, "security" powers, that is, indispensable to security, will play an increasing role. His style is arresting, but I wonder about an "invertebrate skeleton." (True, Milton spoke of "blind mouths.") Eugene Staley offers an excellent, and honestly inconclusive, survey of World Organization on the Economic Fronts.

Frederick L. Schuman, who contributes a lecture on Regionalism, is the life of the party. His wisecracks at times reach the dignity of epigrams. He believes in a radical difference between Great and Small—"whales and sardines." William Fox, a landlubber, said "elephants and squirrels." (Half a century ago the Anglo-Russian rivalry was referred to as "the duel of the elephant and the whale.") Weird surrealistic nightmare: our actual world is not in the least like that. Force is anarchy, and—quoting Hobbes—under anarchy life is "poor, solitary, nasty, brutish, and short." Whereupon Schuman plumps for power, that is, anarchy. He pronounces federalism dead, "despite the fact that federation is a basic principle in the organization of power in the United States, the U. S. S. R., and the British Commonwealth." Is it realistic to reject such an obvious fact? And is it not a fact also that we have found peace at home under the law, by refusing to recognize sheer force, that is, gangsters' rule? Above all, Schuman wants to prevent a break with Russia. But appeasement is not peace; it is a sure step toward war. Peace with Russia can be obtained through universal peace, not vice versa. To conclude, he quotes admirable but starry-eyed words of Roosevelt, radically at variance with the bulk of the lecture. I diagnose a case of four-way schizophrenia. It is curable, in the hands of a good psychoanalyst.

ALBERT GUERARD

Report from the Balkans

IT IS NOT EASY to get rid of traditional slogans, such as that the Balkans are the powder keg of Europe. This explains the unjustifiable title of Leon Denen's book, "Trouble Zone: Brewing Point of World War III?" (Ziff-Davis, $1.50), which makes Russian trouble-shooting in the Balkans and the eastern Mediterranean solely responsible for the menace of a new conflagration. Even aside from Iran, China, and similar "trouble zones," just now there is hardly any spot on the globe which is not a potential "brewing point" of a new war. More objectionable than the title is the conclusion the author reached on his return from the "trouble zone" to America—namely, that in the United States "to cast the slightest doubt on Russian policy is to leave yourself open to denunciation as . . . even a war criminal." Neither the Hearst nor the McCormick-Patterson press, which day by day certainly cast more than slight doubts, has yet been arraigned as a war criminal.

on the
PALESTINE QUESTION and the Rehabilitation of Jews in Europe

THE COMPLETE TESTIMONY OF
HON. JOSEPH M. PROSKAUER
PRESIDENT, THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

before the
Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry

JUST PUBLISHED IN PAMPHLET FORM

"IN PEACE AND DIGNITY"

by the
AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

DEPT. N
386 FOURTH AVENUE, N. Y. C.

• Copies available upon request •

Without questioning the accuracy of Mr. Dennen's observations during the nine months he spent in the region, certain contradictions cannot be overlooked. We are told that, unlike Russia, Turkey has freed itself from totalitarianism, but that Atatürk was, and even İnönü is, "virtually a dictator." The Bulgar has been aptly described as "the bad boy of the Balkans" because Bulgaria fought twice on the side of the Germans, but the author forgets to mention that it was a pro-German Coburg ruler who pushed the pro-Russian Bulgar people into the war. Although Mr. Dennen is wary of those people "who seek to drive a wedge between the American and British people," he nevertheless believes that Brigadier MacLean and Major Randolph Churchill "intentionally misdirected" American planes so that they bombed anti-Nazi Chetnik forces. Some of Mr. Dennen's statements may be premature, as, for example, that "the civil war in Greece is over" or that "Palestine is already a Jewish state." No one can disagree with his conclusion that the disappearance of reactionary political systems is a prerequisite for the establishment of a democratic federation. Such a federation must not be regarded, however, as an anti-Russian Holy Alliance.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

FICTION IN REVIEW

I HAVE been meaning to comment briefly on several recent books which have won not only a big popular audience but also a great deal of praise from the reviewers. Among them is "The White Tower" by James Ramsey Ullman (Lippincott, $3)—the only one, as a matter of fact, that seems to me to deserve its reputation. Although I do not think Mr. Ullman's novel about mountain climbing is the literary milestone it has been called, it is a thoroughly gripping adventure story, done with the skill to hold one to it in the old I-couldn't-put-it-down fashion; and this is not the drug on the market one might guess from fiction advertising. "The White Tower" tells the story of six people who attempt to climb a hitherto unscaled Alpine peak. It would appear to be designed with a double purpose—as a straight-away narrative of dangerous action and as a philosophical parable. As the first, it is entirely successful. As the second, I found it not so much successful as remarkably inoffensive: Mr. Ullman keeps his comments on life fairly modest, and he is not given to the inflated prose rhythms that usually pass for a philosophical attitude. Even the inclusion, in his mountain party, of a Nazi who promptly begins to play out his anti-democratic principles doesn't too seriously deflect our responses to "The White Tower" from the viscera, where they belong, to the head, where they are of only minor consequence.

In "Focus" by Arthur Miller (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2.50) a personnel manager of a large corporation that operates on a policy of religious discrimination is forced, because of bad vision, to use eyeglasses; wearing glasses, he is himself at once mistaken for a Jew—this is the rather over-contrived central situation around which Mr. Miller plots a short intense study of American fascism as it manifests itself in our native brands of anti-Semitism. From its first chapters I was led to expect a better book than "Focus" turns out to be: there is more than ordinary talent, both for observation and writing, in Mr. Miller's introduction of his small hero; the early home scenes, office scenes, city and subway scenes have a clean, hard, bright quality which, were it sustained, would compensate for the obvious didactic inspiration of Mr. Miller's novel. After its nice opening, however, "Focus" begins to thin out into just a familiar unpleasantness.

The reception of Jessamyn West's "The Friendly Persuasion" (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50) makes me wonder, as I wonder at each fresh instance of our national appetite for family reminiscence, if Henry James's boyhood desire for orphanhood might not be generalized into a dominant American trait. Surely there must be more than meets the eye in our insatiable pleasure in these restorations of our family life, and in our willingness to accept at their face value such patently unnatural pictures of domestic humor and domestic harmony. Each time a new volume comes along, it has only to be sweet to be hailed as the pure spirit of American literary art and only to be sufficiently extravagant to be hailed as the fine robust spirit of the American home. Miss West's collection of sketches about her Quaker forbears in Indiana being of a peculiar gentleness, it is making its expected literary way.

Erich Maria Remarque's "Arch of Triumph" (Appleton-Century, $3) is about a refugee from Nazism living in Paris in the period preceding the outbreak of war. It a book of serious and decent intention, and not uninteresting as story, but I must dissent from majority opinion, which finds it one of the literary monuments of our difficult times. For I think

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt

will make her first report to the American people

on the

United Nations Organization

HUNTER COLLEGE AUDITORIUM

Park Avenue and 69th Street

Wednesday, Feb. 27, 1946

At Eight Forty-five P.M.

Admission $1.00 Per Person

Admission 83¢—Fed. Tax 17¢

Auspices: UNION FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION

For Reservations Phone: PLaza 8-0702

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
88th ST.
near LEX.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
54th ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROOM
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

Queens
ALDEN
Jamaica
Kith's
FLUSHING
Kith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
Manhattan
COLONIAL

RIKONOW

"A MEANINGFUL DRAMA"—PM

DICK POWELL
'CORNERED'

— with —

WALTER SLEZAK • LUTHER ADLER

Story and Adaptation by JOHN WEXLEY

— and —

"MAN ALIVE" PAT O'BRIEN ELLEN DREW

"A TIMELY DRAMA"—N. Y. Sun

JOAN

ROBERT

LESLIE HUTTON
'TOO YOUNG
TO KNOW'

Adapted from HARLAN WARE'S story

— And —

'THE DALTONS RIDE AGAIN'PARAMOUNT presents
VERONICA LAKE • SONNY TUFTS

JOAN CAULFIELD

"MISS SUSIE SLAGLE'S"

— with —

BILLY DeWOLFE • RENNY McEVOY

— and —
LILLIAN GISH

A Paramount Picture

NOW PARAMOUNT

— in Person —

DANNY KAYE

• MISS

Georgia Gibbs

Tip, Tap & Toe

• Bob Chester
AND HIS ORCHESTRA— Featuring — Larry ButlerTIMES
SQUARE

A Limited Number of Supplements on
"THE SUSPENSION OF ARGENTINA" are available. Price 10 cents per copy.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

it takes more than a doctor forced to perform abortions to symbolize the indignity that modern man has suffered under the Nazi terror, more than a Humphrey Bogartesque cynicism in love to suggest what a man feels who has seen his wife murdered by the Gestapo, more than an addiction to apple brandy to describe the emotional conflicts of an innocent human being victimized by circumstances, and more than Mr. Remarque's soft prose to create the moral and intellectual tone of a period of tragedy. Indeed, I find it hard to explain the already staggering sales figures for "Arch of Triumph." I should have thought the market had been so glutted with anti-Nazi fiction that any new novel on the anti-Nazi theme would have to be a really distinguished performance to win so huge a public. But I suppose the sales of Mr. Remarque's book indicate quite accurately the depth at which our emotions about the tragic world in which we live are fixed—just about the depth of a Grade A movie notation of a cosmic sorrow.

DIANA TREMLING

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents

MAURICE EVANS

In His New Production of Shakespeare's

HAMLETColumbus Circle Thea. 8'way of 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
Eves. 8:30. Mts. Thu. & Sat. 2:30UP IN CENTRAL PARKBook by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDSLyrics by DOROTHY FIELDSMusic by
SIGMUND ROMBERGBROADWAY THEATRE 8'way at 63rd St. Mats.: Sat. & Sun. Eves. incl. Sun. 2:30 & 8:30

"A DELIGHTFUL PLAY"—Coleman, Mirror

Rodgers and Hammerstein present

MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA

in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMAfrom Kathryn Forbes "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 46th Street, West of Broadway, Phone Circle 6-4036
Eves. 8:30 Sharp Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

"ENCHANTING! BRILLIANT!"—Watts, Herald Tribune

KERN AND HAMMERSTEIN'S

SHOW BOATMusic by JEROME KERN • Book and Lyrics by OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd
Based on the novel by EDNA FERBER • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
ZIEGFELD THEA. 54th Street and Sixth Avenue, CI 8-8200
Eves. 8:30 Sharp Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 SharpYou may again buy BOOKS through The Nation

Nation readers can again avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, postfree if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C.O.D.

Please address your orders to

The Readers' Service DivisionTHE NATION

20 Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

BORN YESTERDAY (Lyceum Theater) is an unexpected pleasure. In any preliminary description it sounded pretty routine and pretty dull. It will, I am afraid, not sound so very different in any account I can give of it, but there is not likely to be much disagreement among spectators. Nearly everybody, I think, is going to find it quite the funniest and quite the freshest farce comedy the season has seen.

Garson Kanin, the author, is by no means the first contemporary writer to have the idea that a rapid-fire satiric piece about Washington would be a good idea and not even the first to suppose that it might be given a liberal slant. The project suggests a whole line of recent farces ranging from the obvious vulgarity of "The Doughgirls" through the laboriously synthetic writing of "State of the Union." I at least had come to the conclusion that the thing couldn't be done with any real success, and then Mr. Kanin comes along to do it brilliantly. What makes the result all the more puzzling is the fact that the general scheme of "Born Yesterday" doesn't depart very radically from that which has been employed a good many times before. The self-made millionaire, half gangster and half commercial genius, who has bought himself a first-rate lawyer and has now arrived in Washington to buy himself a second-rate Senator, is a stock figure; so too is his sweetie, an apparently dumb blonde formerly of the chorus, who in this instance becomes the central character of the action and at moments pretty nearly the whole show. I am not unaware of the fact that when this last-mentioned personage puts on glasses and goes in for solid reading she is merely trying out a variation on a situation so familiar that even the movies hesitate these days to use the plain Jane who takes off her bifocals and stands revealed as a glamour girl. But this is one of those cases—not without parallel in the history of the drama—where a stage figure gets its most effective use, not when it is first invented, but after it has become more or less stock, and without exactly comparing Mr. Kanin to either Shakespeare or Congreve, it might nevertheless be pointed out that neither Hamlet nor Mirabelle was a figure totally new to the stage.

Undoubtedly "Born Yesterday" is superlatively slick as writing. And undoubtedly it is given superlatively slick direction by its author, as well as getting performances to match. The temptation is to assume that the unusual effectiveness of the whole depends upon this fact and to predict that Mr. Kanin may soon find himself possessed of the sort of reputation for ingenious competence held in days past by George Abbott and George Kaufman. But I am not sure that this is all there is to "Born Yesterday" and am not sure that one has said everything even after one has added that Judy Holliday is very nearly ineffable as the sweetie and manages somehow, even in the first act, before her regeneration has begun, to suggest that she is a darling whose heart continues to beat honestly beneath either of the two mink coats which symbolize for her the fact that she has twice as much as all any girl could want. Surely there must be in the writing itself something more than mere theatrical dexterity. One notes, among other things, the fact that the humor is really humor of character rather than the humor of the wisecrack. One notes also that Mr. Kanin is one of those rare writers of farce who establish at the beginning the exact degree of extravagance and caricature, the exact level of credibility, to which they are going to stick consistently throughout the evening. And above all one notes a genuine freshness, a genuine shrewdness, and a genuine gaiety quite different from the mechanical liveliness one has come to expect in plays of this kind.

Whatever the reasons may be, "Born Yesterday" contains more sheer amusement than anything seen here since "Harvey"—which, I hesitate to point out, it does not in the slightest degree resemble.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

SINCE last fall a change of job has made it impossible for me to see more than a few of the movies which, as a reviewer, I have wanted and felt I ought to see and review. I should have spoken of this months ago, but until lately I was unable to resign myself to the impossibility. Until further notice, then—and of that I see no prospect—anything like adequate coverage is out of the question, and I may be late, as herewith, even with those films which most obviously require reviewing. Just as I was slow to realize that there was nothing I could do about my new situation except describe it, I shall probably be slow to realize whether or not, under these circumstances, I can write a column useful enough to justify my going on with it. That my editor and my readers will have as much to do with that as I will goes without saying.

Of current films the two best I have seen were already weeks at large before I got to them, and for both reasons deserve priority now.

"It Happened at the Inn" ("Goupi Mains Rouges") should have gone high on my selection of last year's best films. I kept putting off seeing it because, stupidly, I was as usual set on edge by the kind of finishing-school, French-table, cultural chitchat to which so many American enthusiasts are aroused by anything from France. This film should teach me better sense, if anything since Clair's best films can. Whether or not I like my company, I have a standing love affair with a good deal that is French—particularly the French mass as understood by the least affected of the French intelligentsia—and this film reawakened me to the fact.

"Goupi" is a comic melodrama—or perhaps a lightly tragic farce—about a family of wrangling, innocently cruel, frustrated, strongly individualistic peasants. Some of the characters are as salient as those of comic strips; none lose truthfulness or depth through this; all are with tender, sober adroitness graded, controlled, and modulated between different levels of caricature and of limpid, always poetic realism. Like most French films, this one is basically nearer literature than movie; but, like many, it is always supple, quick, and expressive visually and in its use of dialogue and sound; and, again like many, it makes even the best American work look childish so far as reverence for and skill with character and background and atmosphere are concerned. At times the picture goes so wild that it suggests Gogol or Erskine Caldwell—or, simply, that rural life is at once the most localized and the most universal, and that its pine-knot paroxysms of grotesqueness are among the most endearing, even noblest, of its characteristics. But as a whole, and more intensely, gently, and richly, it embodies France. There is no evidence, good or bad, that Pierre Very, who wrote the picture, or Jacques Becker, who directed it, were trying to do anything "great." Perhaps for that reason, among many others, I thought it wiser, more beautiful, and much more fun than nine out of ten masterpieces, written or filmed.

"Murder, My Sweet" should have been mentioned in last year's listing, too. So should Edward Dmytryk's next picture, "Cornered." "Murder, My Sweet" gave a Raymond Chandler story the combination of skinned knuckles and big-city sentence proper to it; "Cornered," without losing much if any force as melodrama, is much more elaborate, self-assured, and ambitious. I have never been in Buenos Aires, and I have known few fascists or even people who pretended to be or thought they were—though I know any number who think they aren't—but in casting, business, setting, and, with few exceptions, writing and costuming the picture consistently convinced and excited me. One beautiful little bit, of an old waiter's silent reaction when he is questioned too closely for his own safety, suggests that the only serious problem about intelligence, even subtlety, on the screen, is inventing it; for it got a yell of understanding and joy from an audience at the Palace. Dick Powell, with a Bogart haircut, sometimes works a little too conspicuously at being The New Dick Powell ("rougher, tougher, and more terrific," as the billboards not very helpfully insist). But on the whole, perhaps because he still looks less official, less highly paid to look small-bracket, and less superhuman and bound-to-win-out, I think he is even better, just now, for this sort of role, than the Founder himself.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE BACH READER" (Norton, $6) is a collection of source material documenting the life, career, and achievements of Bach that are summarized in an excellent opening section by the editors, Hans T. David and Arthur Mendel. The material includes Bach's own letters, reports, petitions, and so on, extracts from official records, writings of contemporaries, Forkel's monograph, and statements of later men as Bach's music began to be known and to achieve its present status. Some of it makes dull reading; but much of it is extremely interesting and enlightening.

For one thing it establishes the fact that Bach's powers were fully appreciated by all his contemporaries who had contact with his music: in his own place and time he was famous and honored. It also enables us to understand the limitations of that place and time. The place was the fairly large portion of Germany in which he went about and made his music known; where he did not go his music was not known, since the period was one in which publication of music—to say nothing of more recent means of communication—had not yet replaced the composer himself as the disseminator of his music; and where it was not known Bach's music could not be appreciated.

Moreover, when he died there were not widespread published copies of his works to keep them alive; but one reason why so little of Bach's output was printed was the prevailing idea of a composer as a mere musical craftsman working solely for the immediate moment. "The composer of Bach's time was hardly more concerned with posthumous fame than the medieval artist had been. The cantatas and Passions Bach performed year in and year out in the Thomas-Kirche or the Nicolai-Kirche were mostly of his own composition. Bach had good reason to assume that his successors would not perform the works he wrote any more frequently than he performed compositions written by his predecessors; and indeed his works were as promptly laid aside when he died as theirs had been." And yet so strong was the impression he made on his contemporaries that "the memory of his work lingered on . . . occasionally his name was mentioned, occasionally a fugue subject was quoted, or a canon or even an entire fugue reprinted";

Next Week in The Nation Midwinter Book Review

FRENCH EXISTENTIALISM

By Hannah Arendt

"THE COMPLETE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE"

An Essay by Perry Miller

NOTES BY THE WAY

By Margaret Marshall

NEW POEMS

By Robert Lowell

STUART CHASE REVIEWS

"Rival Partners" by Keith Hutchison

REINHOLD NIEBUHR REVIEWS

"Soviet Politics at Home and Abroad"

by Frederick L. Schuman

Other Reviews by Randall Jarrell, Lionel Trilling, Keith Hutchison. . . . Briefer Comments by Albert Guérard, Rolfe Humphries, George F. Willizer, and others.

DRAMA, MUSIC, ART

By Joseph Wood Krutch, B. H. Haggin, Clement Greenberg

when Mozart visited Leipzig forty years after Bach's death the Cantor of the Thomas-Schule had the choir sing Bach's motet "Singet dem Herrn ein neues Lied" for him; and "before those who personally knew Bach had all passed away, a reversal set in."

There was also the fact that Bach continued to work in the polyphonic style and forms of his predecessors even after composers and public had turned away from counterpoint toward a simple melodic style; and although he absorbed elements of the new style into his own, his art remained an essentially contrapuntal one, of which "the very basis for understanding . . . was swept away." The reversal I have mentioned set in only when composers like Haydn and Mozart began again to "create structures of balanced complexity, and the audience learned to appreciate them."

"The Diaries of Tchaikovsky," translated from the Russian, with notes, by Wladimir Lakond (Norton, $4), cover the years 1873 to 1891. They are, with two important exceptions, mere jottings that are impossible to read continuously; and the person who wishes to use them for reference purposes will find himself handicapped by the absence of an index. The two exceptions are Diaries 8 and 11: the first a brief supplementary record of more extended—and sharply perceptive—thoughts at intervals during the years 1886, 1887, and 1888; the second a no less perceptive record of his experiences during his visit to this country in 1891 for the opening of Carnegie Hall in New York.

"Mendelssohn's Letters," edited by G. Selden-Goth (Pantheon; $4.50), are full of personal and literary grace and references to the legendary personages of his time that should have held me fascinated from the first page to the last. But I found myself unable to keep my mind on them in continuous reading; and when I tried looking up particular references to what interested me, the statements about Berlioz stopped me from going any further.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Protest in Manila

Dear Sirs: Last night I witnessed a glowing testament to what Americans can do and what America can be. In the shadow of the ruins of the Philippine Legislative Building 20,000 soldiers gathered to raise their protest against the miserable output of double talk that had assailed their ears ever since the surrender of Japan and Germany.

They had been told by people in high places not to demonstrate, not to make their feelings known so publicly. Why? Because "it would set a bad example to the Philippine people, who have problems of their own." And the soldiers hurled their answer back: "What better example could be shown these people than this magnificent display of the democratic process in action? What better living example of how democratic people act and feel?"

It would be an exaggeration to say that all these men had aims and ideals beyond their immediate desire to "go home," but it is to the everlasting credit of the speakers that the problem was set forth in larger and more meaningful terms. Almost everyone of them asked the right questions, clearly, surely, intelligently. These men wanted to know why Americans should be involved in the internal affairs of countries with which we were not at war. Again and again it was stressed that we did not propose to turn our backs on the world in a stupid and dangerous isolationism, but that it seemed strangely incompatible with many of the things we had been told we were fighting for to see an American division training to quell political unrest in a country to which we had so recently promised independence. They asked: Why are American troops in China, and why are American troops in Java? Is it because we soldiers were caught in a net of political finagling, inspired in the main by reactionary economic and political interests?

Again and again the speakers called attention to the promises, contradictions, double talk, and "circumstances have altered conditions" that have plagued us ever since the initial War Department policy was enunciated. The now famous "I don't know" of Secretary Patterson came in for resounding hoots and catcalls.

We were citizen soldiers, soldier citizens, flexing our muscles and minds in preparation for the democracy that we are going to be an integral part of.

I fear that this is a completely inadequate attempt to capture the spirit of last night's meeting. But I was dismayed at the coverage given it by U. P. and A. P. They completely neglected the political implications present in the meeting, which I felt were of primary importance. They seemed to treat it as merely a big get-together of angry G. I.'s out for a crack at the army. It was that, surely, but it was much more—and that should be stressed.

T/5 MENDY WEISGAL

Manila, January 8

Report from Holland

Dear Sirs: I have been a physician over forty years here in Tiel, our small town on the large River Waal.

In September, 1944, when the battle of Arnhem began, we hoped soon to be free from the German yoke. Things went otherwise. A difficult time began. All the inhabitants of Tiel had to sleep in their cellars, for fear of the shells. Then the evacuation began; we had to leave our town with only the most necessary luggage.

I shall never forget how just on this day, a year ago, when walking from my evacuation village to a small neighboring village, to go to church there, we met a train of open farmers' carts, all loaded with people from Tiel, mothers with their children in their arms, sitting on their trunks, the men and boys walking beside them, all driving to an unknown future on the frosty morning of Christmas, 1944.

On May 5 war was over, and the hunger period was ended by the sending of food through our Allied friends and through the Red Crosses of many countries. Soon we could return to Tiel. Many people found their houses burned up, or ruined and shattered. And they who found their houses still habitable had first to clean them from all the filth the Germans left there, and saw that much of their furniture was broken

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.

Yearly subscription $8.50 including postage
BPOIMRN copy on request

NOW — THROUGH FEBRUARY 24
6th Exhibition

The Art of Portrait
B. F. DOBLIN Drawings
FRED STEIN
Photographs
International Book and Art Center

THE TRIBUNE

100 WEST 41ST ST. COR. 6TH AVE.
6th Ave. Subway Arcade, downstairs in the building of Schullis cigar store

Crossword Puzzle No. 148

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Do lions eat? (anag.)
- 6 Entertainment essential to many games
- 10 Give Dad some cereal. It's cracker-jack!
- 11 The last generation loved to have a game with this old top
- 12 Comic character you know
- 13 Like the head on near-beer there's nothing in it
- 15 One Charlotte, and a tasty dish!
- 17 Go in alone (anag.)
- 19 The most adorable of the fair sex
- 21 Longfellow relates her story in The Golden Legend
- 23 The soldier gets furlough, but the sailor gets this
- 24 A rendering that meets with no approval
- 27 Sue live here? She's hard to find
- 28 Tradesman more likely to be popular if there's plenty of meat on his bones
- 29 "The melancholy days are come, the saddest of the ----"
- 30 Hinged weapons? (two words, 6 & 4)

DOWN

- 1 Underworld argot for pickpockets
- 2 Only London building that is really in character, according to architects (two words, 2 & 5)
- 3 "All hell broke ----," as Milton succinctly puts it

- 4 Set ten men to build apartment houses
- 5 Ancient, and sounds like an ancient
- 7 A.I. rooms for lovers abroad
- 8 Celebrity seeker who is likely to be greeted with a roar (two words, 4 & 6)
- 9 Adolescent affection (hyphen, 4-4)
- 14 Where the public flock to see the hangings (two words, 3 & 7)
- 16 The science of interpretation revealed by six geese
- 18 Where the natives live (two words, 6 & 3)
- 20 Bram Stoker's famous (infamous?) Count
- 22 Seems to make me short—of breath, of course
- 24 Look out for the drink swindle in this Illinois town
- 25 Fed up
- 26 There are degrees of ability in these

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 147

ACROSS:—1 BALDRIC; 5 COMICAL; 9 MIS-TRIAL; 10 ATTAINS; 11 LEAPT; 12 EXPLO-SIVE; 14 ANNE; 15 TERRACE; 18 SEC; 20 LAD; 21 TWO-HAND; 23 CHOW; 26 IN-DELIBLE; 28 EXCEL; 29 ILLUDES; 30 PIERROT; 31 GUARDED; 32 PETTISH.
DOWN:—1 BUMBLE; 2 LASCAR; 3 RURI-TANIA; 4 COLLEGE; 5 COALPIT; 6 MOTTO; 7 CRIMINAL; 8 LESSENER; 13 YEW; 16 ROOSEVELT; 17 CAP; 18 STRIK-ING; 19 CORDELIA; 22 DEBASED; 23 CREEP UP; 24 OCTROI; 25 FLITCH; 27 LADED.

or stolen. Most of the clothes were worn out to rags and on others is endless mending. Some things begin to come again, but still many things are lacking. Fuel is very scarce this winter, and warm clothes are often failing.

May I mention to you some articles which are failing in many families?

Needles, pins, black and white bobbins of thread, wool, silk, and cotton to mend socks and stockings, socks and stockings, bootlaces (brown or black), drawing pins, razor blades (the little knives to use in Gillette), scissors, pocket knives, hammers and pincers, matches, suspenders, sock upholders, loose soles, and shoes to put under boots; elastic, tooth brushes, sponges, and combs.

Everybody at Tiel got a new pair of American shoes happily; the greater part of Holland walks on leaking shoes. Tea is very seldom distributed and much appreciated, as well as pipes for smoking.

Packages can also be sent to Mr. N. F. Cambier van Nooten, town-mayor of Tiel, Holland. We shall take care that packages are given to families where they are most wanted.

J. G. TER BRAAK

Tiel, Holland, December 25

RESORTS

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK

MAMANASCO Lake Lodge

A Resort Estate of un-matched beauty. Ideal for winter rest and recreation. Write or phone Ridgefield, Conn. 820.

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7865

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 500-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the City." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Wind-ing Mountain Trails, Ski Tow, 700-foot Ski Slope. Delicious food. Easy transportation.

Attractive Winter Rates

For reservations or further information write or call HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y. Telephone, Tannersville 289

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR Newburgh 4477

Delightful...skating on private lake. Open fireplaces.

Different...the colonial atmosphere.

Delicious...our unexcelled cuisine.

Diversing...recordings for listening & dancing.

All this only 53 miles from New York City

A Resort for Adults Only

'THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 23, 1946

NUMBER 8

The Shape of Things

NEWS FROM INDIA IS VERY DISTURBING. The specter of famine looming more and more menacingly over the country, added to an already tense political situation, may serve to produce a nation-wide explosion. Last month's riots in Bombay, which grew out of a celebration of the birthday of S. C. Bose, dead leader of the Japanese-created "Indian Nationalist Army," have been followed by an even more serious outbreak in Calcutta occasioned by a prison sentence imposed on an ex-officer of that army. Actually Bose's followers have been treated with great leniency; this particular man, who had been found guilty of brutality to Allied prisoners, is the only one of those tried whose sentence has not been fully commuted. But Indian Nationalists have reacted against the prosecution of any of the Bose group; they regard them as true, if misguided, patriots and lose no opportunity to exploit them as martyrs to British imperialism. The fact is that politically conscious Indians, whether Hindu or Moslem, are in a belligerent and uncompromising mood. Jinnah, leader of the Moslem League, is adamant in his demands for Pakhistan—a separate Moslem state composed of six provinces of northern India. If the British attempt to institute an All-India constitution, he told a New York Times correspondent recently, the Moslems will revolt. But it is even more certain that British indorsement of Pakhistan would be bitterly opposed by the Indian National Congress which stands for a united India. This issue has blocked all previous efforts of the Viceroy, Lord Wavell, to organize a representative government and seems likely to stymie his new proposal for a national administration, including both Congress and Moslem League leaders, to cope with the food crisis. Out of its golden Indian flask British imperialism has raised genii which it can neither subdue nor appease. It is difficult to see how a bloody showdown can long be postponed.

★

UNDER JOHN RANKIN'S SHRILL LEADERSHIP the House Committee on Un-American Activities has become more authoritarian in its methods than its notorious predecessor—the Dies Committee. Dr. Edward K. Barsky, chairman of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, has been threatened with contempt charges for refusing to turn over the organization's books and records, thus terminating its relief work. The Refugee Committee has taken the seemingly reasonable position that as a relief agency under the supervision of the President's War Relief Control Board, it does not fall within the Rankin Committee's legitimate scope of investigation. Several other organizations whose activities are politically objectionable to Representative Rankin, such as the National Federation of Constitutional Liberties and the National Committee to Combat anti-Semitism, have similarly been called on the carpet, while Gerald L. K. Smith received a cordial welcome and was permitted to use the committee as a sounding-board. But even this outrageous abuse of a congressional committee's powers pales beside the presumptuousness of its chief counsel, Ernie Adamson, in sending letters to numerous organizations and individuals, including Columnist Drew Pearson, protesting against their use of the term "democracy" and implying that anyone using this word is seeking to undermine the American "republican" form of government. This proved too much for even some members of the committee and Mr. Adamson's days as counsel are said to be numbered. But the only way to save the country from the indignity of these repeated witch-hunts is to abolish the committee.

★

THE BERMUDA AIR CONFERENCE ENDED IN an agreement so favorable to this country that not even the most dunderheaded congressman can complain that once more John Bull has outsmarted Uncle Sam. In fact, if there is any difficulty in ratification of the agreement, it is likely to be at Westminster rather than Washington. The terms provide the United States with every opportunity to maintain its long lead in international air travel. It is not possible here even to summarize a long and complex document. We note, however, as particularly important the grant by Britain of "fifth freedom" rights which were the biggest stumbling block at Chicago. This means that American transatlantic planes will be able to pick up passengers in Britain for destinations in other countries and will thus be able to operate profitably over long routes crossing several frontiers.

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	209
UNO—Act I	211
Beyond the Blue Book	212
The Harding Aura by Freda Kirchwey	213

ARTICLES

Mr. Truman Wavers by I. F. Stone	214
Spruille Braden by Robert Bendiner	215
In the Wind	219
Cross-Fire in Korea by Andrew Roth	220
Wages, Prices and Production by Ben Fischer	223
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	225

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

French Existentialism by Hannah Arendt	226
Three Poems by Robert Lowell	228
Thomas Paine, Rationalist by Perry Miller	228
The Russian Adventure by Reinhold Niebuhr	232
The Irrepressible Myth by Lionel Trilling	236
Verse Chronicle by Randall Jarrell	237
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	240
Art by Clement Greenberg	241
Music by B. H. Haggin	242

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 149

by Jack Barrett	243
------------------------	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart
Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey
Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside, Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting, Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1940, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Librarians: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

British planes reaching this country will enjoy a similar privilege but geography makes fifth-freedom rights in North America of less value than in Europe. Another concession made by the British was abandonment of their demand for control of frequencies—that is of the number of flights daily or weekly over any particular route. Fares, it was agreed—and this was our chief concession—were to be approved by the International Air Transport Association, subject to review by each government. By this means it is hoped to avoid rate-cutting wars and competitive subsidization, while providing machinery to insure that lower costs will be passed on to the customers. It seems probable that the Bermuda document will serve as a model for agreements with other European countries. The diplomatic fog, which has been keeping international aviation grounded, is beginning to lift.

★

BY THE DEATH OF WILLIAM ALLAN NIELSON the cause of freedom and enlightenment is poorer today. Never was there an American who gave himself more generously or with less thought of his own convenience or prestige. Never was there a "reformer" freer from solemnity or pretension. Dr. Nielson's unflinching humor and serenity were reflected in his smile and in his gentle, sagacious manner. But they were nourished by the profound scholarship which gave richness to all his thinking. He was witty; he was provocative; he was irreverent. During his long years as president of Smith College he was all but worshiped by the students, whom he insisted on treating like rational adults rather than capricious school children. He was very clean in his beliefs and stood up for them with an unshakable simplicity more impressive than the loud protests of others.

★

THE CATHOLIC CARDINALS' MARCH ON ROME became for a few days number one on the best-seller list for the American press, radio, and newsreel. The United Nations Assembly, New York's tugboat strike, and Harold Ickes managed to stay on the front page, but the report of imminent famine on an unprecedented scale barely made page six. For the cardinals meant color, medieval pageantry, theater, in a land which is surfeited with tales of human misery. Pleasant human-interest stories filtered back from Rome—the unfortunate tailor faced with the necessity of throwing together a simple little cardinal's ensemble valued at $6,000, "and, mon vieux, you know how scarce silk is these days!" Forty rooms reserved at the Grand Hotel for the New York cardinal-designate and family—"Don Juan, the Spanish pretender lived here and was married here . . . frequented by monarchs, diplomats, financial rulers . . ." The Gripsholm sailing out of New York harbor laden with episcopal victuals so that "the Italian people now suffering great privation would not be deprived of their meager food supplies." The airliner Star of Rome at La Guardia, the Star of Rome at Gander, the Star of Rome at Shannon, the Star of Rome at Paris, the Star of Rome at Rome. How far we have advanced since the days of that primitive journey to the other Holy City—by donkey.

✱

TO EARL BROWDER HAS COME THE PAINFUL realization that a man's communism may slip imperceptibly into an ism new to him and to the world. With his expulsion from the party last week, comrades everywhere were summoned to the "struggle against Browderism." We telephoned the office where Mr. Browder publishes an organ called Distributors' Guide, hoping to learn something about the philosophic basis of the new ism, but no information was forthcoming. In view of the suddenness with which it was forced upon him, it may well be that Mr. Browder has not yet worked out its principles. If so, he has our sympathy; we can imagine few situations more awkward than that of a man with an ism on his hands and no ideology to talk about. Browder's fate should be a warning to his former comrades to store away at the back of their heads a reserve ideology against the day when they find themselves the founder of a new ism. No one can say when a public speech by a Communist leader in Paris or Johannesburg may change William Z. Foster's communism into Fosterism; when a magic word uttered in Moscow may give the world Molotovism or Vishinskyism. Life is simpler for bourgeois politicians; a Cabinet member is thrown to the wolves but no one is warned to beware of Ickesism.

✱

THE CLEARANCE OF ANDREW ROTH BRINGS tardily to a close the "Case of the Six," one of the few lapses in the unhysterical war record of the Justice Department. And even this lapse should be scored against State rather than Justice—the old State Department with the Far East branch bossed by Grew and Dooman, for whom liberal criticism was tantamount to treason.

✱

WHEN DOUBTING DEMOCRATS BEGAN TO question the intention of the Argentine government to hold an honest election next Sunday, the Foreign Minister, Juan Isaac Cooke, issued a challenge to foreign correspondents to come and see for themselves. In a dispatch from Buenos Aires on January 29, Señor Cooke said: "I extend . . . a formal and concrete invitation to the press of all countries who may want to send their representatives to follow at first hand not only the election itself but the pre-electoral campaigns." The Nation has taken up Mr. Cooke's offer. Freda Kirchwey left this week for Buenos Aires to report the election and its results. Her first dispatch will appear in our next issue.

J. Alvarez del Vayo's page, The People's Front, has been omitted from this issue because he is now en route to France. His first cable from Paris appears next week.

UNO—Act I

THE first session of the UNO proved more dramatic than had been expected before the curtain rose. From the moment Iran sent its appeal to the Security Council the plot thickened rapidly, and the action became fast and furious. Believing that Britain was egging Teheran on, the Russian delegation retaliated with a series of countercharges, and thereafter Bevin and Vishinsky held the center of the stage, exchanging verbal blows with more gusto than discretion. Yet this sub-plot seems to have been based on the hackneyed theme of mistaken identity, for it turned out that actually it was Britain that had been holding Iran back while the United States encouraged it to go ahead. Even when this became clear, however, the Soviet delegates did not revise their lines. Playing for the colonial gallery, they stuck to Britain as the obvious and vulnerable object of attack.

In the world audience there was disagreement about which protagonist was the villain. The Communist claque in all countries naturally cheered Vishinsky and hissed Bevin; Britons of almost all political views cheered Bevin and hissed Vishinsky. Our view, which we believe a good many American liberals will share, is that there was more than a touch of ham about both actors. Both contrived to give a melodramatic twist to a play that was far too serious for overacting to be tolerated.

If we are to understand what has been happening in London we must get away from black-and-white interpretations of the Anglo-Russian duel. There are those who see the Soviets picking on a temporarily weak Britain, intent on disintegrating its empire as a first step toward world hegemony; there are those who insist that Britain is spearheading a world-wide conspiracy to encircle and crush Russia. We believe that both these schools of thought are wrong, and that neither country is bent on aggression. Their tactics at the UNO meeting, offensive in form as they were, appear to us to have been basically defensive.

There are good reasons why both Britain and Russia should be haunted by a sense of insecurity at this time. Britain, economically debilitated by the war, is more than usually sensitive to any threat to its empire and trading routes, for it depends on these for recovery, especially if American assistance is not forthcoming. Russian moves in Iran, pressures on Turkey, demands for positions in the Mediterranean and Red Sea, all touch exposed nerves. But the Soviets also feel threatened. They see themselves as isolated in an unfriendly world, subjected constantly to ferocious attacks in capitalist countries. They see Britain and America flirting with reactionary forces in many parts of the world, and note fearfully the support given to such men as General Anders, who commands a sizable army dedicated to revenging Poland's loss of territory. Moreover, despite its vast area, the U. S. S. R. remains landlocked. Without full access to the oceans it fears its world position will be inferior to that of America or Britain.

During the UNO sessions the bulletin of the Soviet embassy in London published an article declaring: "Britain and the Soviet Union have an equal interest in keeping the Mediterranean open. What is wanted is clear recognition of the strategic needs of the U. S. S. R. . . . The trouble between Britain and the Soviet Union today is directly traceable to the fact that, contrary to all expectations, the present British government has embraced in full the British policy of the nineteenth century vis-à-vis czarist Russia." Of course Britain might well retort that the trouble is due to the fact that a supposedly anti-imperialist Russia has resurrected all the imperialist ambitions of its predecessors. But such recriminations do not provide any solution to the problem.

Is a solution to be found by admitting Russia's claims, which undeniably have validity, and affording it the opportunity to acquire Mediterranean bases which will balance those possessed by Britain? It is difficult to believe that this would lead to anything but an armament race, accompanied by intrigues by both powers among the smaller nations bordering the Mediterranean. The suspicions which Britain and Russia now entertain about each other would be tremendously enhanced, and eventually war would follow.

The Mediterranean should not be treated as the private lake of any power or combination of powers. Its security is of vital interest to all the countries bordering it, and it provides a world route used by every maritime nation. The Mediterranean, therefore, should be open to all peaceful states and dominated by none. Its proper guardian is the UNO.

The suggestion has been made that Tripoli, which commands the narrow waist of the Mediterranean, should become a trusteeship of the Big Four powers. This would be a step in the right direction, but it would leave Britain in command of most of the other strategic bases in the area. To make the sea a truly international highway, it would be necessary for Britain to offer to place Gibraltar, Malta, and Suez under a similar trusteeship, provided that Russia surrendered all claims to an exclusive position in relation to the Dardanelles.

The United States is in an excellent position to take the initiative in pressuring a solution of this kind. We should point out to Britain that if it adopts a purely stand-pat position in the Mediterranean it is likely to get the worst of it. It has not the strength to offset Russian pressure indefinitely, and while we are vitally concerned in British survival and prosperity, we are not able to underwrite the British Empire. Realism, therefore, demands admission of Russia to a share in Mediterranean control under conditions effectively neutralizing that sea.

If this can be accomplished, the drama of UNO's Act I will have served a great purpose by exposing clearly a dangerous conflict. But if remedies are sought in power politics, succeeding acts are likely to see Britain and Russia locked in a struggle of growing intensity—a struggle which can only end in tragedy.

Beyond the Blue Book

ARGENTINA'S government, wholly under the thumb of Presidential candidate Juan Perón, has made the retort obvious to the State Department's accusation that it collaborated with Hitler while "at war" with Germany. Publication of the American Blue Book, says Foreign Minister Cooke, is an interventionist move intended to beat Perón in the forthcoming election.

We have no doubt that the State Department would like nothing better than Perón's defeat, and the timing of its exposé is hardly calculated to swing votes his way. If that be intervention, let the political purists make the most of it. But all the evidence indicates that the election was a secondary consideration. The truth is that Assistant Secretary of State Braden, like everyone else who has closely followed affairs in the Argentine, believes that Perón cannot lose at the polls. The purged army is his, and the police force is his—and it is the army and the police that will "protect" the sanctity of the Argentine ballot. If they are inadequate for the job, there is always Perón's private army of thugs to back them up. Mr. Braden, we believe, was looking beyond the "election" of the Colonel when he let loose his damning indictment. He had his eye on the Inter-American Conference to be held at Rio de Janeiro next month, at which a mutual-assistance pact is to be proposed calling for a permanent military agency for hemispheric defense.

Mr. Braden has said more than once that this country will not sit down at such a conference with an Argentine regime of the Peronist persuasion. We will not be party to a pact calling for defense of the Americas alongside a clique that did its best to open the hemisphere to the enemy. The primary purpose of the Blue Book, we believe, is to demonstrate that Perón and his gang are guilty of precisely that crime. Both Braden and Secretary Byrnes know the danger of unilateral action, and their broadside is addressed not so much to the Argentine people as to the governments of the other Latin American republics, because only with their consent and approval can the Argentines be barred at Rio. Their wariness of a revived "interventionism" in Washington is deep-seated and natural, as Robert Bendiner points out in his article on Braden elsewhere in this issue.

The carefully documented Blue Book, based on papers discovered in Germany, should overcome their doubts. Giving names, places, and dates, it shows beyond argument that from the beginning of the war to the end the Argentine government and army hoped and worked for a German victory. It exposes the negotiations with Nazi agents, all identified, whereby Argentina was to send food, quinine, iodine, oils, mica, platinum, and other critically needed items to Spain for reshipment to the German war machine; in return for which the Franco government was to sell Argentina arms and other war materials obtained from Germany. It uncovers the secret organization of Nazi agents and native collaborators, headed by Perón, whose object was to use these German arms to form a fascist bloc composed of Argentina, Chile, Bolivia, Paraguay, and Uruguay, with Brazil thrown in provided the Integralista Party succeeded in ousting the Vargas regime. Only in Bolivia did the plan fully succeed, and the various deals for German arms likewise came a cropper—but not for lack of effort by the Farrell-Perón crowd.

Belgian and Russian delegates to the United Nations have informally raised the question whether these facts were known to our government at the time we forced Argentina's admission into the UNO. Probably we did not then have all the evidence now in our possession, but we certainly had enough to know better. The truth is that we were guilty of a monstrous boner at San Francisco. Braden can't say that in so many words, and he is obliged in consequence to offer the lame explanation that we accepted the "pledged word of the Farrell-Perón government" to reform, only to find our confidence betrayed. But this painful cover-up for his predecessors, dictated by protocol, is unimportant. The significant fact is that Braden—more power to him—refuses to be bound by the wrong-headedness of Avra Warren or to base a continuing policy on the blunder of Nelson Rockefeller and Edward Stettinius.

The Harding Aura

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

WHEN President Truman traded in Ickes for Pauley he lost more than an able, progressive administrator; he also lost another big chunk of public confidence. Even the people who dislike Ickes and his ideas have caught the unsavory odor of oil politics in the shift. Indeed, for Americans who remember the twenties, oil is a symbol of political jobbery in high places; their minds revert automatically to the rocket-like rise and descent of Albert B. Fall and that earlier group of home-state boys who saw a natural link between public office and private interest. The greater intelligence and probity of Mr. Truman does not suffice to wipe out an unhappy resemblance to Mr. Harding. It can be effaced only by acts, and the public is anxiously looking for proof that the President intends to extricate himself from a mess he should never have got into. So far no proof has appeared. Instead, he has compounded his mistakes by sticking to Mr. Pauley and allowing Mr. Ickes a last word so blistering that its mark will show a long time, perhaps well through 1948.

Almost simultaneously he muffed another big chance to dispel the Harding aura. The reorganization of the stabilization-reconversion set-up, which was supposed to insure Chester Bowles's control of the price structure, has instead apparently left Bowles in a position subordinate to the pliable Mr. Snyder. At least that is the way things look as we go to press. If the change works out that way, another able and progressive administrator will soon walk off into the wings, for Mr. Bowles obviously means it when he refuses to be made responsible for continued inflationary price concessions to business.

The resignation of Ickes is an arrow pointing toward disintegration and defeat. If Mr. Truman's advisers realize this in time, they may help him salvage his Administration. If they keep their eyes fixed only on short-term political advantages, they will go down to defeat in two jumps—next fall and in 1948. We trust they and the President can summon the will to reverse their direction, for we see no hopeful alternative on the Republican side and no early alternative anywhere else.

But Ickes is more than a sign and a warning. He is a public servant who, in his own right, can ill be spared. When his resignation was rumored soon after Mr. Truman took office, we urged Mr. Ickes to stay on. With Wallace, he represented all that was left of the Roosevelt tradition. The war had thinned the New Deal ranks and erased most of the New Deal program. In spite of war-time concessions to business and the get-the-job-done-at-all-costs spirit, Ickes stood solidly and almost alone for progressive measures to insure a going economy and protect the community from unrestricted profit-hunting. At that time he stuck to his post, but he did so in a mood of pessimistic skepticism. The Pauley appointment and the President's casual dismissal of Ickes's testimony left him no alternative to resignation, even if he had wanted one.

He will be difficult to replace. His enormous administrative capacity has led him to accept, even advocate, numerous accretions to the huge, jumbled, multicellular structure of the Interior Department. A lesser man will have a hard time handling the job. It seems certain that the President will try to compensate for the Pauley blunder by choosing a progressive as Ickes's successor; he cannot possibly risk a strictly political appointment. That he will be able to find a man as strong, as stout-hearted and enduring, is most unlikely. The best possible choice would be Oscar L. Chapman, now Acting Secretary, who has been Assistant Secretary for thirteen years. Chapman is also a good administrator; he is liberal and uncompromising. His chief flaw, ironically, is his long and devoted service, which, in the process of fitting him for the arduous post of Secretary, has also deprived him of those political qualifications which party chieftains look for in their appointees. If he doesn't get the job it will be because he is too well prepared for it.

Mr. Truman Wavers

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 17

PERHAPS Mr. Truman's official life continues to be a series of crises because he rarely ends any one of them with a clear-cut decision. Each settlement carries the seeds of a new rumpus. This is certainly true on the anti-inflation front. When I wrote last week's letter, it looked as if Chester Bowles had finally won a free hand. It had apparently been decided to make him Economic Stabilization Director independent of Snyder, to authorize him to grant price relief only where proved necessary instead of as part of a general rise, and to give him direct power to deal with many acute shortages, as in textiles and building materials.

Presumably Mr. Bowles had gained that much by threatening to resign. He has become the center and symbol of the anti-inflation fight. He has political appeal, and he could do much damage if he took to the hustings. But the premature, perhaps deliberate, leak of the Bowles-Snyder shift to the press last week-end enabled Snyder's friends to organize a counter-offensive. The result is another precarious compromise. Mr. Bowles becomes Economic Stabilization Director but remains subject to Mr. Snyder as War Mobilization and Reconversion Director. Mr. Bowles and Paul Porter, his successor and subordinate as OPA Administrator, are given ample power to hold the line on prices—if Mr. Snyder does not interfere. But Mr. Bowles is also saddled, against his will, with the job of holding the line on wages through a new Wage Stabilization Board, which is the old War Labor Board in a new guise.

Compromise was piled on compromise in arranging the new price-control shift and ending the steel strike. Mr. Bowles, who had offered $2.50 a ton on carbon steel, and Mr. Truman, who had spoken of $4 a ton, were forced to agree to $3 a ton, not only on carbon but on alloy steel. A rise in the price of alloy is, if I may be forgiven the pun, pure steal—a gift of another $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 clear profit to the most profitable sector of the industry. In simple arithmetic, steel has managed to exact a $325,000,000 price increase from the government in return for a $185,000,000 wage rise. Actually much of this wage rise has already been compensated for by down-grading, the elimination of overtime, and so on. The price increase for the big integrated companies will be larger than it seems to be, for they will benefit to the extent of another $2 or so a ton from the additional increase the OPA will have to allow on fabricated steel products to save the smaller producers from a price squeeze. This was the most profitable strike in the history of the steel industry.

At one point in the negotiations the business crowd behind Snyder hoped for Presidential acceptance of a formula which would provide for a general price rise throughout industry. Mr. Truman finally turned this proposal for a new "Big Steel" formula down, probably under threat of a resignation by Mr. Bowles. The latter was finally given wide power to hold prices in line except where an industry would be left in "an over-all loss position." Such adjustment upward in price ceilings may be allowed as would "in the judgment of the Price Administrator" enable the industry, "unless operating at a temporary low volume," to earn the "average rate of profit" it earned in the pre-war base period. This broad grant confers great power on Messrs. Bowles and Porter, notably in the reference to "temporary low volume"—the phrase which is likely to be the storm center of reconversion pricing. For the issue will be whether to fix prices on the basis of immediate operations or on that of the capacity output which should be reached in most industries later in the year.

But a heavy price had to be paid for these powers. Mr. Snyder insisted that, if prices were to be held, wages must also be controlled. After being responsible for the premature scrapping of the War Labor Board last year, he demanded its replacement. Mr. Bowles and Secretary Schwelienbach wanted to leave wages to collective bargaining, price relief to government agencies. They lost, but in an effort to placate them and the labor movement the President gave the new Stabilization Administrator such broad discretion that wage control may be as strict or as mild as Mr. Bowles chooses to make it—always assuming that he is not hamstrung by Mr. Snyder. The breadth of the order is such that labor can hardly make a frontal attack upon it. The proof of this administrative pudding will be in the eating. With strong support from labor and consumers Mr. Bowles has a fighting chance under this order to hold any price increase to a mere "bulge" yet allow a wide forward movement in wages. And Mr. Truman, by backing Bowles and Porter, can still demonstrate that he meant what he said in advocating a general upward revision of wages and in declaring that this was possible without a general price rise.

Mr. Snyder in this picture is only President Truman's alter ego, if not his real self. Mr. Snyder is no strong man, except in the strength he derives from Mr. Truman's own faltering belief in the principles he espouses.

on formal speech-making occasions. There are a number of crises ahead on the price front, some of them grave enough to upset the whole settlement within a short time. There will be a sharp fight within the Administration when Mr. Bowles seeks to reimpose certain controls prematurely lifted last year by Mr. Snyder and Civilian Production Administrator John D. Small, notably those designed to channel textile facilities into the low-cost clothing field. Messrs. Snyder and Small will fight, despite the reference in the Presidential directive to the need for "prompt and firm enforcement, during the present emergency, of government controls over scarce materials and facilities." Mr. Krug at the War Production Board got away with similar defiance of a similar directive last year.

A second crisis may be expected on a broader front when Messrs. Bowles and Porter tackle the task of reconversion pricing. Mr. Snyder, who is industry-minded, favors prices which would allow for profitable operations even on a low, and temporary, level of output. The OPA will try to head prices to a level which will be adequately profitable when industry hits its stride. While fighting this battle, Mr. Bowles will almost certainly have to counter a flank attack from part of the labor movement. The A. F. of L. is against the new set-up; the C. I. O. is dubious. Just around the corner are John L. Lewis and a demand for higher wages in coal. This new wage board, unlike its predecessor, is not buttressed by a no-strike pledge. If too many wage applications bog down the machinery of stabilization, there will be trouble. Part of the labor movement may gang up with industry against price control. The biggest tussle of all will be with the farm bloc, which is lining up to blackmail and blackmail the Administration into higher prices or subsidies or both. Mr. Truman has asked Congress to extend the OPA, the subsidy program, and the Second War Powers Act, and to enact the Patman housing bill. Without these measures we can have neither price control nor new large-scale housing. But to get them the Administration must run the gauntlet of the cotton bloc, the dairy interests, the wheat, corn, and hog interests, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the real-estate crowd. It is a formidable line-up, but defeat almost certainly means disastrous inflation. Much depends on labor and consumers. The Administration has a first-rate housing plan which it could use to rally the veterans. Veterans would also respond to a thoroughgoing program for low-cost clothing. Given some daring and imagination on Mr. Truman's part—he is showing these qualities on housing—the battle against inflation could be won. But it's a tough one.

Spruille Braden

BY ROBERT BENDINER

SPRUILLE BRADEN is at least a 50 per cent violation of the State Department's traditional formula, "Too little, too late." There is nothing little in the bearing of the 240-pound Assistant Secretary, whose florid complexion, double expanse of chin, and impressive bulk recall nothing so much as Edward Arnold's portrayal of Diamond Jim Brady—down to the stickpin in the cravat. There is even less that is little in the gusty spirit with which he has swept away the cobwebs of diplomatic cant and made himself democracy's ambassador to Latin America. But many observers believe that Spruille Braden is "too late"; that he was placed in authority only after his struggle to prevent the emergence of a full-blown Nazi movement in the Americas had already been doomed by the bungling of his predecessors. One of his warmest admirers from below the Rio Grande—a man who bitterly resented the forcing of Argentina's admission into the United Nations some months before Braden's appointment—described him to me sadly as "the right man at the wrong time."

To Americans who like their ambassadors tough, straightforward, and uncompromisingly committed to the democratic ideal, Braden appeared dazzlingly to be

"the right man" in the summer of 1945. Overnight he had become a front-page figure as the man who had made a habit of rebuffing the most accurate facsimile of Mussolini ever produced in the Western Hemisphere—Colonel Juan Domingo Perón, dictator of Argentina. Here was an emissary of the ultra-cautious, infinitely stuffy Department of State serving as a catalytic agent in the gathering of popular forces against the government to which he was accredited. In the words of Perón's own shrill denunciation, "Braden gave shape, courage, and directives to the amorphous political organism that opposes us." Mr. Braden looked surprised when I asked him whether it did not require unusually strong democratic convictions for an American ambassador to a dictator state to speak so passionately on the evils of dictatorship and the necessity for its extinction. It didn't take much of a feeling for democracy, he said, to be repelled by what he had seen in Argentina or to condemn it with all possible forcefulness.

The case, as Braden saw it, was clear-cut. To qualify for a seat at the conference table in San Francisco, Argentina's representative, on April 4, had belatedly signed the Act of Chapultepec, an instrument that committed his country, with all other American nations, to a common safeguarding of "the essential rights of man." Hardly had the conference disbanded when American reporters in Buenos Aires began filing stories of a terrorism that went beyond anything the Farrell-Perón dictatorship had dared to attempt before Argentina's entrance into the charmed circle of United Nations. Regular features of these dispatches were reports of mass arrests, imprisonment without trial, and daily murder by armed bands which roved at will through the streets of cities chanting the name of Perón, setting fire to opposition newspaper offices, and sacking Jewish properties—all under the benevolent eye, and even with the armed support, of the Perón-controlled police. It was when these outrages reached a climax in threats to assassinate American correspondents that Braden stepped into the picture, and from July onward hardly a week went by without a Braden incident, a Braden protest, or a Braden pronouncement couched in terms almost without precedent in the relations of nominally friendly nations.

Speaking in the heart of a country that had declared war on Germany just in time to beat the surrender, Ambassador Braden had the daring to tell an audience: "Victory has brought us new and surprising friends. The victorious United Nations are now being acclaimed in some high places by those who in the past had with evident enthusiasm attached themselves and their destinies to the Axis." Against a backdrop of tyranny and violence he boldly warned a Buenos Aires meeting: "The peoples of the world have learned that fascist militarists, to attain their end, will stop at nothing, no matter how cruel or vile it may be. To defeat them we have paid a staggering price in blood and suffering. We shall not forget this lesson merely because petty tyrants are now assuming the disguise of spurious democracy."

Stung into an extreme of rashness, Dictator Perón made it plain to Braden in a blistering interview that not only was he unable to insure United States correspondents against assassination at the hands of his worshipful followers, but the same could be said of anyone who crossed his path. So pointed was the inference that Braden replied, "Whether you assassinate Cortesi [correspondent for the New York Times] or me doesn't matter. The principle is the same, and we stand on principle."

Perón backed down, but a few days later the walls of Buenos Aires broke out in a profusion of posters headed by the single word "Crime." In the text that followed, the Ambassador was linked with a disaster in a Chilean mine owned by Braden Copper, a company with which he had never been connected and which his father had sold thirty-three years before. "Workers, unite against Wall Street imperialism," the posters read. "Braden means exploitation and crime in Chile!" Pamphlets, too, deluged the city—some comparing Braden to Al Capone —and a "memorial" meeting for the mine victims rang with shouts of "Out with the Yankee pig!" and "Death to Braden!" Not too curiously, the leaflets and posters were strikingly similar in paper stock, typography, and layout to material turned out by the regime's official Press and Information Department. Even less curious, not the slightest attempt was made by the Buenos Aires police to check the distribution of the inflammatory literature, though it was clearly a violation of the law.

The net result of this blatant campaign, unexpectedly, was a further crystallization of anti-Perón sentiment in the country. Protests against the attack on Braden appeared in all the leading papers, signed by outstanding Argentines from all walks of life. Demonstrations were held in his honor, and the welcome he received at the station on his return from Santa Fé Province a few days later was a severe blow to the Colonel's prestige. He had tried to depict Braden as a "Yanqui cowboy trying to run the Argentine government," but millions of Argentines hailed him instead as "el Domador de Coroneles," the Colonel-Tamer.

An American diplomat whose family fortune stems from Chilean copper does not immediately seize upon the imagination as the natural foe of imperialism and the arch-champion of the democratic way. People reasonably wondered whether Braden's flare-up in the Argentine was not a flash in the pan, or perhaps a devious diplomatic game that called for a specialized technique. They could not be expected to know that Braden is the least devious character to be found in striped pants today—with the possible exception of Ernest Bevin. His genuineness and the simplicity of his approach are apparent both in his private conversation and in the record of his thirteen years as a diplomat.

Spruille Braden was a man of thirty-nine when President Roosevelt, soon after taking office, made him a delegate to the Inter-American Conference at Montevideo. The appointment was almost inevitable. He had been a personal friend of the President's since the middle twenties, had spent a major share of his life below the Rio Grande, spoke Spanish as well as his native tongue, and had long since abandoned a weak and purely hereditary attachment to the Republican Party.

The itinerant life of the Braden family had prevented Spruille from acquiring that early hardening of the social arteries with which an over-sheltered existence is prone to afflict the sons of the wealthy. Five years after his birth in the town of Elkhorn, Montana, his father, William Braden, shifted the base of his highly successful operations as a mining engineer and promoter to Canada. A few years later it was Mexico, and at the age of ten the future ambassador found himself a Chilean schoolboy. After six years of erratic education he was sent up to the Sheffield Engineering School at Yale, where he applied himself to water polo and heavy eating, as well as engineering, with a year out to acquire practical experience in the mines and oil fields of the West.

Through with his schooling at twenty, the young engineer returned to South America in 1914 and struck out in a series of ambitious projects in the field of industrial engineering and finance. Most ambitious of these, and most profitable, was the electrification of the Chilean State Railroads, which he undertook for Westinghouse after a spirited competition with General Electric and the German firm of Siemens-Schuckert. Other extensive business operations followed—but so did the crash of 1929. Much of the Braden fortune vanished overnight.

The great débâcle of 1929 was an eye-opener, however temporary, to many a business giant, but it is not fair to include Spruille Braden in their number. He had long since departed from the political norm for those engaged in "colonial" operations—even to the point of having campaigned for Al Smith in 1928, against his distinguished brother in the fraternity of engineers. "Braden just couldn't help convincing himself that he was a progressive," former Attorney General Homer Cummings once said of him. "It was in him all the time and had to come out."

It had, in fact, been "coming out" for a good many years before his entry into the world of government. In the first place, Braden is what one of his subordinates describes as a "glandular democrat." There is enough of the mining frontier in his composition to make him bridle at class or racial distinctions of any sort. An instinctive feeling for democracy rather than any carefully worked-out philosophy of government has animated his political life. It was this same feeling that prompted him as a successful young business man in 1920 to give an interview to the press in which were set forth the essentials of what was much later to be called the Good Neighbor policy.

Aside from his natural inclinations, Braden was moved to forsake the Republicanism of his forbears by the influence of Woodrow Wilson. He was convinced soon after leaving school, he says, that the Democratic Party offered more intelligence in the field of foreign relations. He believed in the League, and he believed in a low tariff. And beyond these formative political factors, there was his own characteristically oversimplified but obviously sincere theory concerning the nature of imperialism.

Braden had seen at close range the political effects of bribery by American industrialists in Latin America: the buying of elections and the payoff in concessions. Imperialism, he concluded, produced corruption; and corruption, in turn, produced dictatorship, since neither the giver nor the receiver of bribes could hope to continue his shady transactions under the fierce light of a free political system. Braden maintains that in their years of business operations in Latin America neither he nor his father ever found it necessary to engage in this common practice of "buying into" governments—a conviction that was to set him apart from his fellow-yanquis, to establish warm ties with democratic political groups throughout the continent, and finally to make him one of the most extraordinary emissaries ever sent from Washington to the countries of South America.

Spruille Braden has performed four major diplomatic missions in Latin America, and each one has added perceptibly to his political growth. At Montevideo he had been a minor figure, though Ernest Gruening, a fellow-delegate, says that even then he displayed in conferences a "rare feeling" for the people of the Latin American nations rather than a purely diplomatic regard for their governments. "It is time," he was heard to remark, "that we were as New Dealish in our foreign relations as we are at home." But it was not until 1935 that Roosevelt gave him his first chance to put his talents and experience to the test. He was sent to Buenos Aires to replace Hugh Gibson, who had been making no perceptible headway as head of our delegation to the Chaco peace conference.

Spruille Braden

After three years of indecisive warfare Bolivia and Paraguay had agreed to a ninety-day truce, during which the other powers of the hemisphere were to attempt to mediate. The ninety days were nearly exhausted when Braden arrived on the scene, and it did not take him long to make two acute observations: first, among the mediators themselves a fierce struggle for power was in progress between Argentina, Brazil, and Chile, and if hostilities were allowed to resume, the entire continent would go up in the flames of war; second, German and Italian diplomats were conniving feverishly behind the scenes to effect precisely this result, and were openly ridiculing the whole mediation procedure.

Braden succeeded in renewing the truce, and held the conference together for three years—in itself a notable achievement. During this period he took every advantage of shifting political tides, looking for the break that he knew would ultimately come. It came with the election of Roberto Ortiz to the Argentine Presidency. So impressed was Ortiz, himself a thoroughgoing democrat, with Braden's earnestness and good-will that he gave him

Argentina's advance consent to any decision he might make. The jam was broken. Going over the heads of the Bolivian and Paraguayan representatives, Braden addressed their two nations over the radio. The response was swift and decisive, and shortly thereafter the proposed treaty was signed.

One of the guests at the banquet in celebration of the peace was the German ambassador, Edmund Freiherr von Thermann. He had just returned from an equally historic celebration at Nürnberg—the first Parteitag of Greater Germany, held in honor of the German-Austrian Anschluss. Apparently still vivid in his mind as he turned to chat with Braden were the massed war banners and the imperial regalia of the Holy Roman Empire, brought from Vienna for the occasion. "The Nürnberg spectacle," he remarked, "was magnificent! It celebrated a peace made as Germans make it. We use a different method."

The comment impressed Braden deeply, and he kept it in mind when he reached Bogotá in 1938 to undertake his second major mission—as minister (later ambassador) to Colombia. It was obvious to everyone that the world was close to war, and it was equally obvious to Braden, at his new post, that Hitler's agents were close to the Panama Canal. He kept a sharp watch, and from Bogotá to Washington went reports of the discovery of secret landing fields and even of plans for destroying the Canal. Chief source of danger was Scadta Airlines, 16 per cent of which was controlled by the Germans. Here was a potentially hostile air fleet no farther from the Canal than New York is from Washington. When the conflict broke out, Braden acted at once. Officials of Pan-American Airways, which controlled by far the major share of Scadta, were asked to take over the German interest. When they balked, Braden threatened to hold them officially responsible for any possible attack on the Canal by enemy planes operating out of Colombia. In a matter of weeks the Germans were relieved of all control and their men replaced entirely by Americans.

Braden's next assignment, as Ambassador to Cuba, was noteworthy for continued vigilance against Axis agents, one of whom had been using his high post in the Batista government to spy on American shipping movements and tip off enemy submarines. It was noteworthy, too, for a remarkable application of Braden's long-standing prejudice against the influence of United States dollars in Latin American politics. Early in 1944 American business men in Cuba were jolted by a blunt warning that any of them who contributed so much as a dollar to either party in the approaching election could henceforth expect neither protection nor service from the American embassy. That was revolutionary, and the protests were loud and anguished. But Braden was adamant, and for the first time an election took place in Cuba without benefit of the American dollar. Batista, who had lost much of his one-time following, failed to put up the fight expected of him, but, even so, both Washington and Havana were astounded at the proportions of the landslide that replaced the dictator with the democrat.

When it became apparent in the early summer of 1945 that appeasement would no more work with Argentine fascists than it had with the Italian or German variety, it was inevitable for the Administration to turn, in desperation, to Spruille Braden. His assignment to Buenos Aires would in itself be a red light to the rampaging Colonel from Patagonia. More than that, it would be an admission that Nelson Rockefeller—under pressure from Avra Warren, a State Department appeaser from way back, and probably from the British as well—had blundered in forcing the acceptance of Argentina into the United Nations.

Braden's hold on the popular imagination of Latin America is undeniable—and the appeal is personal as well as political. A man who habitually wears out two shifts of subordinates, he has long been known for the tremendous zest with which he throws himself into his work, into his speeches, and into his play. As typical as the confidence almost automatically bestowed on him by the friendly Ortiz was the reluctant tribute paid him by Batista. "He is more a man," said the fallen dictator, "than a diplomat."

Despite his seal-like figure, Braden is today rated the best conga dancer in official Washington. And he is equally adept at the samba and the waltz. No doubt with an eye to modifying that same figure, Braden now sharply controls his fondness for the banquet table, but in his earlier years in the service his gustatory exploits amounted to a legend. Two or three times a week he would delight in feasts reminiscent of Elizabethan England and enjoyed today only in the food-rich Argentine—feasts that, launched in dry Martinis, progressed from pickled partridge through soup, a second bird, and a huge roast, to luxurious salads and rich desserts, the entire meal eased by a free flow of wine and topped off with a fine old brandy.

Affable in manner but extremely forthright, Braden is further assured of popularity in Latin America by his perfect use of Spanish and by his long and idyllic marriage to the daughter of a prominent Chilean family. His wife, the former Maria Humeres del Solar, is a Catholic, and the five Braden children have been reared in that faith. Braden himself remains a Protestant and has no use for the ultra-reactionary hierarchs who play a major role in certain Latin American countries. But he cultivates the friendship of liberal Catholic churchmen, and is known to entertain hopes that at least in clerical circles of this hemisphere their influence will predominate.

As Assistant Secretary of State, Spruille Braden faces an extraordinarily delicate task. He is strongly opposed to the old-style interventionism. "No one more non-interventionist than I ever served in" the State Department," he told me—and he obviously believes it. At the same time he believes just as firmly that fascism must be eliminated wherever it rears its head. "Democracy," he says, "cannot exist in a world half slave and half free. Our democratic system will go down if fascism is allowed to prevail anywhere."

His critics, chief of whom is Sumner Welles, believe that these two principles involve him in a dilemma from which he will be unable to extricate himself. And Braden himself fully appreciates the extreme narrowness of the path he has laid out for himself. He knows the depth of mistrust that still exists throughout Latin America for the "colossus of the North." When the Foreign Minister of Uruguay recently proposed collective action by American states against any one of their number that denied its people democratic government and basic human rights, Mr. Braden was quick to indorse the plan. But besides the United States, only Guatemala, Costa Rica, Panama, and Nicaragua were won over. Even countries like Colombia and Mexico, with the most liberal governments in Latin America, shied away. A record of sixty interventions in fifty years cannot be wiped out by a dozen years of good neighborliness.

Of course, Braden emphasizes the collective aspect of his approach, and, in fact, if this type of action is to be rejected as "intervention," then the doomed UNO need not bother looking for a site. But some of the best liberals of Latin America are not convinced. They know that the United States represents the real power in the collectivity—and they are suspicious.

If Braden is unable to bring pressure on Perón through collective diplomatic action, what is left? Armed action he rejects completely. Economic action is insufficient, since in this sphere Argentina depends primarily upon Britain rather than the United States among the great powers. There remains only the cultivation of public opinion, and in this Braden is a master, as his timely exposure of Argentina's war-time collaboration with the Axis abundantly proves.

He may be expected to employ his talents along this line to the utmost between now and the convening of the next inter-American conference at Rio de Janeiro in March. That meeting will be Braden's great test. If a Perón delegation is seated and allowed to make a farce of the proposed hemispheric security treaty, Braden will be finished. But those who know him best do not believe that he will allow himself to be maneuvered into any such position. He plans well. Senators who opposed his nomination to his present post spoke of him as a "bull in a china shop." That is a superficial view of Spruille Braden. Shrewd as well as forceful, he picks his china in advance and breaks only what he knows is ready for the breaking.

In the Wind

THE UNITED PRESS is our authority for the story of an ex-army sergeant who was arrested for drunkenness in Beaumont, Texas, after he had slugged a striker on a picket line. He explained that "when I was overseas I promised I'd punch the first picket I saw right in the nose." The picket was also an ex-army sergeant.

HIGHER EDUCATION NOTE: the Southern Illinois Normal University operates a Department of Effective Living.

WHEN UNITED STATES STEEL turned down President Truman's proposal of an 18½-cent wage increase, the Greencastle, Indiana, Daily Banner headlined its story on the start of the steel strike: "Steel Workers Reject Offer by Mr. Truman."

THE ANNUAL REPORT of the National Park Service complains that "the bighorn sheep-wolf relationships" problem is continuing. . . . And the Fish and Wildlife Service is having trouble with the whooping crane, a bald-headed bird which is almost extinct and is stoutly resisting all efforts to keep it from becoming completely so.

THE LEGISLATURE OF MISSISSIPPI, a theoretically dry state, has postponed consideration of a bill to repeal taxes which the state now collects on bootleg liquor.

CAPITALISM IN CRISIS: Oklahoma City pest exterminators are up in arms against a proposed ordinance empowering the city to order building occupants to ratproof and if necessary undertake the work itself at cost to the owner. Rats, the exterminators claim, are properly the concern of private enterprise, and they accuse the city of "using Hitler methods on us."

WILLIAM LINDSEY, president of the Florida Peace Officers' Association, told a recent meeting of Florida sheriffs that returning Negro veterans would be a major problem for law-enforcement officers. "In a 'keep them in their place' speech," reported the Miami Herald, "Lindsey asserted that Negro soldiers . . . are coming back pretending to be heroes without ever having seen a gun unless they stole one. . . . We have to iron out this situation, even if it's with a club."

THE TROUBLE WITH THIS COUNTRY, suggests the writer of a Letter to the Editor in the New York Herald Tribune of February 7, is that "the poor people have too much money." We knew somebody had too much money, but we weren't quite sure who it was.

PROFESSIONAL DIGNITY: When the proprietor of a New York "Fountain Pen Hospital" goes out to lunch, he hangs a sign on the door saying, "The doctor is out."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Cross-Fire in Korea

BY ANDREW ROTH

Author of "Dilemma in Japan"

JUST after landing in Korea Lieutenant General John R. Hodge, American commander in that area, regaled newsmen with a story about the "impractical and charming" Koreans. According to General Hodge, "a Phi Beta Kappa graduate of Brown University took off in a small boat, met us in the harbor, and told me he wanted to be Minister of Finance."

The full story of this incident is a reflection upon the General rather than upon the Koreans. Two Koreans did come out on the pilot boat on September 8 as the convoy bearing the Twenty-fourth Army Corps lay off the entrance to Chemulpo. But they were not job-hunting opportunists; they were distinguished patriots on an important mission. One was Professor Pak Sang-kyu, a substantial Korean landlord and a graduate of Brown, class of 1905; the other was Dr. Lyuh Woon-heung, head of the Left National Party, Foreign Minister in the 1919 Korean Provisional Government, Korean representative of the Singer Sewing Machine Company, editor of the Seoul daily Chung Il Bo until it was closed down by the Japanese in 1938, and from 1939 to 1942 an inmate of a Japanese political prison. Both spoke fluent English, which should have endeared them to an occupation force without Korean interpreters, but what was far more important was the letter they bore.

The letter came from a historic assembly held in Seoul two days before at the behest of a group which had operated underground during the war. The meeting had been attended by delegates from every one of Korea's thirteen provinces, some fifteen hundred in all, representing the three chief political groups in the resistance movement: the Left Nationalists (now the People's Party), a moderate left group drawn largely from the dispossessed middle class and intelligentsia; the T'ien Tao Chao, originally a rural religious sect which developed into an anti-Japanese politico-religious movement with roots deep in the land; and the Communist Party, whose hardened core of radical intellectuals and militant peasants and laborers had been considerably augmented after 1935, when it had adopted a "popular front" policy. The Seoul assembly was also supported by peasant and trade unions, students' and women's associations, claiming a total of 600,000 members.

These groups reached agreement on a twenty-seven-point program which included the immediate disarming and removal of the Japanese, confiscation and state ownership of Japanese-owned land (80 per cent of the cultivated area) and its free allotment to landless peasants, abolition of the Japanese usury system and cancelation of all debts incurred under it, abolition of exorbitant taxation and compulsory grain collection, confiscation and state ownership of Japanese-owned industries (85 per cent of Korea's industrial plant).

The popular forces represented in this assembly had already begun to dispossess the Japanese. Police stations—hated symbols of Japanese terror—had been stormed and the Korean prisoners replaced with Japanese. In many places Japanese troops had been disarmed, and by the time the assembly was convoked on September 6 all Korea's 182 districts had at least a rudimentary Korean administration. The Seoul assembly acted to place these local governments under a "Korean Provisional Commission for Forming a People's Republic" with Dr. Lyuh as chairman, the expectation being that Dr. Rhee Syng-man, Kim Koo, and other exiles would assume positions of leadership when they returned. Plans were made to hold elections on March 1, 1946, for a National Assembly which would convene on March 31. And a letter was addressed to the commander of the eagerly anticipated American forces offering the assistance of the Provisional Commission.

General Hodge ignored the letter, its distinguished bearers, and its offer of assistance.

UNPLANNED OCCUPATION

Seldom in modern history has the representative of a major power approached so ticklish a task with so little understanding of actual conditions or of the policy of his own government. General Hodge landed in Korea without even having read the State Department's basic directive on occupation policy. After the Cairo declaration of 1943 had promised Korea independence "in due course," the State Department had lethargically begun to plan for the transition, always assuming that the United States would occupy all Korea, with perhaps token Russian, Chinese, and British representation. At Yalta the Allied military chiefs had decided that when the Soviet Union entered the Pacific war the difficult task of conquering the Japanese in mountainous Korea would be divided between the Russians and Americans, but this decision was not confided to State Department planners until it was formalized at Potsdam. After Japan's capitulation the responsible State-War-Navy subcommittee hurriedly drew up a tentative directive, ordering, among other things, immediate replacement of Japanese officials, but this did not reach General Hodge until after he landed in Korea. His pre-landing briefing came from General MacArthur's staff, which, although it had been cautioned by the State Department and the Joint Chiefs of Staff to proceed with caution in the Korean political situation, acted on the conviction that it would be just as expedient to exploit the Japanese administrative machine in Korea as it was to work through the emperor in Japan.

This theory was put to a scorching test on the very night American forces landed at Chemulpo, the port of Seoul. Local labor groups decided to greet the liberating American forces even though they might run into trouble. Their leaflets declared that they were determined "to shake hands with . . . the heroes who help the independence of the Korean people." Accordingly five hundred unarmed workmen carrying tiny American flags paraded toward the landing place. Japanese police ordered them to halt and when the marchers refused, fired into their lines, killing two and wounding ten.

General Hodge defended the Japanese police, saying, "I had ordered civilians kept away because they would hinder the landing operations." He also said that the use of the Japanese administration was the "most efficient way of operating now." He praised the Japanese as his "most reliable sources of information" and slurred the Koreans as "too excitable" to be of any use. Within twenty-four hours indignant Korean demonstrations and American editorials produced a White House order to General Hodge, via General MacArthur, to replace all Japanese in the Korean government as rapidly as was "consistent with the safety of operation."

THAT OLD BOGY

Washington failed to eliminate another and more firmly established army fixation. In Tokyo Brigadier General W. E. Crist was reported to be telling Korea-bound officers that one of their principal missions would be "to form a bulwark against communism." Later Major General A. V. Arnold, first American military governor of Korea, told Gordon Walker of the Christian Science Monitor, "It is our job to see that the Koreans get the American type of democracy and not communism; call it the rule of enlightened dictatorship."

Since the major nationalist groups were linked with the Communists in the People's Republic movement, AMG's anti-Communist credo pushed it into the waiting hands of the Democratic Party, which claimed only 700 members and was admittedly a coalition of big landowners and big business men—in a country where only pro-Japanese could achieve that status—specifically founded to fight the People's Republic. Its suspicious wealth did not disturb General Hodge, who remarked: "Korean business men must have ability—they made money even under the Japs. They are hard-headed and realistic, but of course they are not liked by the Koreans."

Virtually all the Korean translators and assistants employed by AMG were persons indorsed by these rightist Democrats. In early October General Hodge established an eleven-man Advisory Council which he hailed as the "nucleus of democracy in Korea," and to which he named nine Democrats and two representatives of the People's Republic movement. The latter, however, refused to participate in a council so dominated by collaborationists. The council's chairman, Kim Sung-soo, was a wealthy industrialist who had served as consul general in Manchukuo and energetically recruited Koreans for the Japanese army. One member, Song Chin-woo—recently assassinated—had worked among his fellow-émigrés as a spy for Tsuruyama, Tokyo military police chief, and for the infamous General Tanaka when he was preparing to seize Manchuria. Another, Li Sung-seul, had been active in the movement to renounce Korean for Japanese culture and had frequently condemned the "outrages" of "American demons"; Cheun Kap-soon, the "patent-medicine king" had become rich selling morphine to Koreans and medical supplies to the Japanese army. The others were of the same stripe, or non-entities subservient to the party bosses.

Advised by these men, the AMG surrounded itself with a choice set of rich collaborationists. Paik Nam-hoon, a manufacturer, was named Governor of Kyang-kido Province. The mayor of Seoul was an American major, but as he could not speak Korean, the actual government of the city fell to Deputy Mayor Kim Chang-young, who had served the Japanese so faithfully as a spy in Korea and Manchuria that they had given him a retirement annuity of 150,000 yen. Persons similarly tarred with treachery and venal opportunism were placed in charge of the schools and other institutions.

To add strength, it would seem, to his rightist bastion General Hodge invited the exiled Dr. Rhee and Kim Koo to return but, needless to say, did not invite the leftist leaders of the Yenan-based Korean People's Emancipation League. Dr. Rhee was granted plane accommodations long before Kim Koo, perhaps because Kim, although very conservative, had close Chinese connections and had included some leftists in his Chungking-sponsored "Provisional Government." Dr. Rhee had made his Russophobia clear in Washington, where he had proclaimed that "democracy and communism cannot coexist" and that "future generations of Americans will have to pay" for inviting Russia into the Japanese war. When he reached Seoul he was given a bodyguard of American army officers and was warmly introduced by General Hodge at a mass-meeting where he asked rhetorically: "Is one part of Korea to be slave and the other master? . . . Is that army in the north going to remain there permanently?" Rhee later was to say, "I have watched the spread of communism in Europe and Asia, and I have come to the conclusion that the question had better be thrashed out here and now, rather than postponed." As was expected, Rhee and Kim threw in their lot with the Democratic Party, which, with continued AMG support, made considerable headway through December.

AMG did not restrict itself to sponsoring rightists; it also harassed popular left-wing elements. Fifty Seoul tramway workers were arrested as "Communists" because they struck against retention of the Japanese management. When workers employed by a pro-Japanese industrialist, Pak Heun-sik, refused to obey his orders and demanded that he be brought to trial as a war criminal, armed M. P.'s forced them to return to work. When the leftist Peasant Union attempted to throw off some of the oppressive measures imposed by the Japanese, AMG decreed: "The owners of the land [80 per cent Japanese] will continue to determine how tenants shall pay for their land. . . . Tenants must comply with the wishes of the owners." On October 10 Major General Arnold attacked the People's Republic movement even more virulently, according to Korean newsmen, than the Japanese had ever done, and ordered all Korean newspapers to publish his remarks. And when the People's Republic group answered in a documented English-language pamphlet, AMG banned the publication and distribution of pamphlets and handbills.

Naturally a wide chasm opened between the Russian and American zones. The Russians had moved fast, taking over their zone by August 26, thirteen days before the Americans landed. The Red Army, which included some 30,000 Siberian Koreans, trumpeted the slogan: "All Power to the Korean People." Japanese officials were summarily dismissed or imprisoned, and soldiers were disarmed and herded into pens for deportation. Members of the People's Republic movement were encouraged to take over the administration and to abolish land taxes and distribute the land.

Before the Moscow conference General Hodge tried without success to get the Russians to permit economic intercourse between the two zones. The demarcation line drawn at the Thirty-eighth Parallel had ignored Korea's economic geography: almost all the manufacturing capacity, most of the coal and iron, the greater part of the railroad rolling stock, most railroad repair shops, and all important sources of electric power are in the north, while the rich rice lands and fishing banks are in the south. The Russians, with by far the best of the bargain, acted tough, refusing to supply anything but electric power, perhaps because they were not anxious to strengthen the economic underpinnings of a rightist regime in southern Korea.

This friction had its military manifestations. Robert P. Martin, correspondent of the New York Post, reported that as many American combat planes were massed on Kimpo Field outside Seoul last November as had been massed on any Pacific island except Guam during the war. He also quoted one general: "We are ready for the Russians if they make one false move."

MOSCOW CONFERENCE

It was this strife-torn Korea that appeared on the agenda of the Moscow conference in December. Unlike the army officers running the field show, Secretary Byrnes and his adviser, John Carter Vincent, director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, thought Korea should be a peaceful bridge to Russo-American cooperation rather than a skirmishing field for a future Russo-American war. Mr. Vincent presented a plan for unifying Korea and giving it independence after a five- or ten-year four-power trusteeship. The Russians proposed that the Koreans be permitted to form a democratic provisional government under Soviet-American supervision. The Russian proposal, with a few American amendments, was accepted. In its final form the agreement called for the creation of a Joint Soviet-American Commission which would tackle, first, economic and administrative unification and then, in consultation with Korean democratic and social organizations, make recommendations to the American, Soviet, British, and Chinese governments for the establishment of a provisional government. Then the joint commission and the provisional government would work out measures for the achievement of democratic self-government and independence. If the Koreans prove unable to form a united and effective government, the commission is to recommend a five-year four-power trusteeship. (Sumner Welles described this as "almost identical with the plan providing for the ultimate independence of Korea which President Roosevelt favored three years ago.")

Koreans were disturbed when they read the Moscow communiqué: its language was fuzzy and its transmission garbled, and they feared that a trusteeship would be imposed immediately. They remembered that the Japanese had entered in the guise of trustees in 1905. The rightists thought they could develop this fear into mass support for their bid for power. On December 29 they distributed huge posters charging the Communists and Russia with responsibility for a trusteeship and violently attacked leftist papers. American flags were torn down, American soldiers were stoned, and a strike was called against AMG to indicate displeasure with the United States' alleged appeasement of Russia on the trusteeship issue. General Hodge had surrounded himself so completely with rightist supporters that when the strike came his aide had to shovel coal. A rightist mass-meeting assailed trusteeship and demanded immediate recognition of the Rhee-Koo provisional government and suppression of all opposition newspapers and parties.

General Hodge managed to end the disturbances by convincing the rightists that no immediate trusteeship was contemplated and warning them that further action would jeopardize their place on the contemplated provisional government. But a few days after the Russo-American negotiations opened in Seoul, on January 16, the same groups again started anti-Soviet demonstrations. The Russians, apparently convinced that this was done with tacit American support, retorted with a press campaign pinning responsibility for the trusteeship proposal on the United States and lambasting General Hodge for "inspiring" the Korean reactionaries. Negotiations made scant progress.

These developments underlined the validity of a statement broadcast by John Carter Vincent on January 19, in which he declared that Korea would be "a test of the ability of two great powers to cooperate in solving a problem of mutual interest." It would, he added, require that the Russian and American representatives be "of a caliber and character which will assure that they will approach the problem with unprejudiced intelligence and in a spirit of real cooperation; and that the Korean leaders submerge their factional differences and work with united zeal to reestablish the statehood of Korea."

[The second of two articles on Korea by Mr. Roth.]

Wages, Prices, and Production

BY BEN FISCHER

Research economist for the United Steelworkers of America

THE National Association of Manufacturers tells the radio audience each Saturday evening: "Production means jobs; production means higher wages; production means more purchasing power." Experts who speak for big business accuse labor of failing to understand this fundamental fact.

But does production mean higher wages, more jobs, and more purchasing power? Let's look at 1924-29, the period of prosperity that preceded the worst depression in our history. An examination of the facts will show that while production reached record heights and prices remained stable, the result was a bubble of speculation followed by the bursting of the bubble. Why was this so?

The trouble was that the fruits of production—the money value of the goods and services produced—were not converted into purchasing power in sufficient quantity to keep goods in use. The fruits of industrial activity were converted into exorbitant profits and dividends. As a result excessive corporate reserves and working capital were accumulated on a rapidly growing scale at the very time when mass purchasing power was lagging. Drastic reduction of production schedules inevitably followed.

Reduced to simplest terms, the story of the '20's reads as follows: Between 1924 and 1929 production of industrial items rose 27 per cent, according to the index of the Federal Reserve system. Productivity of labor rose 24 per cent, as computed by the Department of Commerce. Net industrial profits, after taxes, rose 72 per cent. But wages, the major form in which purchasing power is created, remained virtually frozen. A survey of twenty-five manufacturing industries by the National Industrial Conference Board shows an increase in average hourly earnings from 1925 to 1929 of 3.3 cents an hour—from 56 cents to 59.3 cents, only 5.8 per cent in six years.

The picture is sharply pointed up by the figures for the nation's key industry—steel. Between 1924 and 1929 production rose 47 per cent and net profits after taxes 157 per cent. The finished steel tonnage produced in 1924 was 28,000,000 tons; by 1929 it had reached 41,000,000 tons. The industry's profits were $188,000,000 in 1924 and $483,000,000 in 1929. Throughout these prosperous years there was no general wage increase. The common-labor rate remained at 44 cents an hour. In forty-nine steel plants, according to the study of the National Industrial Conference Board, the average hourly earnings of steelworkers rose from 64 cents in January, 1925, to the peak of 65.9 cents in October, 1929, the month of the crash. Such a slight gain represents merely small instances of upgrading and increased tonnage pay for increased production. It is apparent therefore that higher production did not bring higher wages; profits rose, not wages.

One may ask, "Perhaps the fruits of increased production went into lower prices, thereby increasing the purchasing power of the wage dollar?" Not at all. The price index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics shows only a tiny change between 1924 and 1929, less than 1 per cent.

No matter how one views the basic economic facts of the boom of the '20's, they lead directly to the conclusion that there could have been no speculation orgy without the excessive profits paid to stockholders and managers, and that the money invested took on the character of reckless speculation because the roots of the economy were rotting—underpaid consumers could not provide the purchasing power necessary for maintenance of production.

In the years ahead one of the few economic certainties is the ability of industry and labor to produce in overwhelming quantities. The tremendous expansion of plant, equipment, and scientific research during the war cannot fail to speed the flow of goods. The productivity of labor per man-hour rose 5 per cent annually during the war and can be expected to make great strides in the immediate future. Most of the war-time technological improvements are being utilized in peace-time production. In addition, innovations restrained by war-time shortages are now being installed. But it must be remembered that production is a source of improved living standards and a stable, prosperous economy only if wages are adequate to prevent economic paralysis and explosively excessive profits.

The other side of the N. A. M. penny bears the inscription: "Higher Wages Mean Higher Prices." The same business economists who peddle this line and warn against wage increases lest inflation overtake us also spearhead the drive against price control. While charging labor with favoring inflation, business itself fights for higher prices—a case of the right hand not knowing what the left is doing.

There is some sincere fear that wage increases are always absorbed by price rises. And some sources that know better encourage the notion. If this were true, real wages—that is, wages measured in terms of their ability to purchase goods—would never rise. The N. A. M. does not claim such economic stagnation.

The failure of wages to keep up with prices during the war is not explained by the working of our economic system but rather by the way government economic controls were applied in the political atmosphere of war-time America. The wage controls were rigid and effective. The price controls were much looser in the first place and much less effectively administered. Thus price levels ran away from wage levels. It would be disastrous if we now fell victim to the delusion that this war-time pattern will continue as the expression of some mystical economic law. The fact is that real wages and living standards have risen slowly but surely over the years—even when unionism was weak. When unions are aggressive and succeed in boosting pay rates, real wages rise sharply.

Some interesting data are available regarding wage-price relationships. The General Electric Company recently reported its success in achieving higher wages, lower prices, and fair profits. This report, appearing as an advertisement, revealed that G. E. wages averaged 72 cents an hour in 1935 and 89 cents in 1941, an increase of 23.6 per cent. During these same seven years the price of a G. E. refrigerator dropped from $199 to $129.95, or 34.6 per cent. Electric bulbs were reduced from 15 cents to 10 cents. A G. E. radio cost $47.50 in 1935 and $27.95 in 1941, a reduction of 70 per cent. Incidentally, during the same period G. E. profits rose from 70 cents per share of common stock to $1.75.

For all manufacturing industry the same story can be told. Real wages rose an average of 42 per cent between 1932 and 1940—not wage rates but real wages. Specifically, the average money wage of manufacturing workers rose 50 per cent while prices rose only about 18 per cent. This period of the New Deal and the C. I. O. brought on the sharpest improvement in living standards that has ever taken place in any decade of our history—even though a portion of the period found us in the throes of a severe economic depression.

Also of interest is the effect of collective bargaining on the economic dips. In 1937 the average wage was 57.7 cents. It rose to 65.5 cents by 1940, an increase of 13.5 per cent. Despite the business recession of 1938, wages did not go down because the C. I. O. stubbornly held the line and rejected proposed wage cuts. Prices did go down, 2.2 per cent between 1937 and 1940. Thus even during the 1937 to 1940 period a gain in real wages was realized. It was the rigid war-time controls that led to a loss for labor. Now that wage controls are substantially lifted, we can be certain that real wages will go up.

This is true despite the likelihood that prices will rise in the coming months. Various sources are forecasting increases in the price index for 1946 of 5 to 10 per cent. But they also agree that before 1946 is over we shall see a movement toward price reductions. The increases will result from the economic fact that severe shortages exist side by side with extensive purchasing power, plus the desire of business to convert special reconversion costs into higher prices while they still can. However, as savings are reduced and the supply of available goods increases, competition will resume its influence on price levels, and the rapid advances in technology will work to the same end.

Improved technology is one of the most encouraging factors and will fail to be effective only if competition is stifled and unionism destroyed. As long as free competition is permitted to continue in any significant measure and as long as unions continue their insistence on converting exorbitant profit margins into higher wages, industry will inevitably pass on savings from technological advances to the consumer in the form of lowered prices.

It borders on fantasy to cringe before the danger of inflation at such a time as this. Certainly, the OPA's efforts to forestall price increases deserve complete support. But we should realize where we are and where we are going. We are on the threshold of an era of abundant, high-speed production. Dizzy inflation cannot overtake us in such circumstances. What we should fear is rather an unsound type of prosperity—a prosperity not underpinned by sufficient mass purchasing power to insure consumption of the products of our industrial plant.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Post-War Planning in Sweden

THOUGH fortunate enough to remain unscathed by war, Sweden for nearly six years lived under the threat of invasion and consequently was forced to give defense a top priority in its budget. It maintained large forces under arms and diverted a good part of its national resources to building planes, warships, tanks, and other weapons. As a result, the national debt was quadrupled, even though taxes were raised steeply and new social reforms had to be postponed.

Now Sweden is once again able to add to its long record of progressive legislation. The coalition government which held office during the time of national peril has been replaced by a Social Democratic administration, commanding a majority in the Riksdag, with a program of constructive economic planning. Early in January the budget, introduced by Ernst Wigforss, Minister of Finance, revealed some of the government's plans. For the fiscal year beginning July 1 ordinary expenditures and revenues are expected to balance at about $814,000,000, and no supplementary military budget will be necessary, as it has been during the war years. However, taxation is to be maintained at war-time levels partly as an antidote to inflation, which Sweden must guard against so long as, in common with the whole world, it has to cope with a shortage of goods. But there is another reason for maintaining the flow of revenue, and that is to build up funds for new social benefits. The revenues that for years have been spent on armaments are to be used for increasing old-age pensions, hitherto little more than token payments. Now it is proposed to pay aged couples up to $600 a year. Other plans call for increased social distribution of national income in the form of free meals for school children and paid vacations for underprivileged housewives—recognition of a group whose contribution to national welfare is usually overlooked.

Sweden, for a good many years, has engaged in the business-like practice of setting up two budgets. The running expenses of government are provided for in the ordinary budget and are normally covered by taxes; revenue-producing expenditures, on the other hand, are grouped in a separate capital budget and amortized over a period of years. In the next fiscal year the capital budget will amount to about $167,500,000, compared with $92,750,000 in the current year. It will cover new investments in the railroads, public utilities, and other publicly owned undertakings and, to the extent of $62,500,000, credits to war-ravaged countries.

A capital budget of this kind is an essential tool for a planned economy. It provides a means of maintaining a balance between savings and investment, of checking booms which threaten to get out of hand, and of offsetting the deflationary effects of a fall in private capital expenditures. "The economic power of the state," declares the Program of the Swedish Labor Movement—a joint production of the Social Democratic Party and the trade unions—"ought in everybody's interest to be applied so as to give that support to the national economy which is needed in order to maintain a permanent and stable state of high business activity. The incomes of the community must be made so high, and made so secure, that demand does not slacken. In order to stimulate enterprises, the interest rate must be kept as low as possible. In addition, there must be a public coordinating body to insure that capital is employed so as to utilize fully for useful ends both labor and the material means of production."

To achieve these objectives, the Swedish government is not content to rely wholly on budgetary and other controls. Consideration is therefore being given to public ownership of a number of industries which, it is felt, are not being conducted efficiently by private enterprise. Examples are insurance, which under private management is thought to have assumed certain monopoly characteristics; stone quarrying, an industry suffering from obsolescent methods and needing new capital, new machinery, and new marketing methods; and the refining and distribution of oil and gasoline, now dominated by the big Anglo-American trusts. The last of these industries has already been investigated by a committee whose report asserts that prices have been held at too high a level by the oil monopoly and suggests means by which the distribution system could be simplified.

While the Swedish government is proceeding cautiously, allowing time for inquiry and discussion and showing no doctrinaire disposition to pursue socialization for its own sake, its plans have naturally aroused antagonism in business circles. What may be more surprising to those American conservatives who regard consumer cooperation as a form of communism is the strong opposition that has developed in the powerful Swedish cooperative movement. A few days ago I had an opportunity to discuss this question with Albin Johansson, head of the Kooperativa Förbundet (KF), the great Swedish cooperative organization. He said, in effect, that his movement fully approved of government ownership of railroads, public utilities, and other "natural" monopolies but was against the creation of monopolies, either public or private, in consumer goods or in the provision of such services as insurance. In these fields he thought that a strong cooperative movement, able to challenge private trusts by setting up "yardstick" enterprises as KF had done in the case of electric lamps, margarine, rubber shoes, and other products, was a better safeguard for the public than nationalized enterprises that were apt to become bureaucratic.

In the case of oil, the Swedish cooperatives have already their own distribution system, which they are planning to expand greatly. To this end they are negotiating with the Consumers' Cooperative Association of Kansas City, which operates a large integrated oil enterprise, to obtain direct supplies making them independent of the trusts. Hence, while they think some government control of the oil trade is justified, they feel that scope should be left for an organization such as theirs. Since the membership of the Swedish cooperatives overlaps to a considerable extent that of the Social Democratic Party and the trade unions, the government is bound to give full consideration to these views. But either way prospects for Standard Oil and Royal Dutch-Shell in Sweden seem rather dim.

KEITH HUTCHISON

BOOKS and the ARTS

FRENCH EXISTENTIALISM

BY HANNAH ARENDT

A LECTURE on philosophy provokes a riot, with hundreds crowding in and thousands turned away. Books on philosophical problems preaching no cheap creed and offering no panacea but, on the contrary, so difficult as to require actual thinking sell like detective stories. Plays in which the action is a matter of words, not of plot, and which offer a dialogue of reflections and ideas run for months and are attended by enthusiastic crowds. Analyses of the situation of man in the world, of the fundamentals of human relationship, of Being and the Void not only give rise to a new literary movement but also figure as possible guides for a fresh political orientation. Philosophers become newspapermen, playwrights, novelists. They are not members of university faculties but "bohemians" who stay at hotels and live in the cafe—leading a public life to the point of renouncing privacy. And not even success, or so it seems, can turn them into respectable bores.

This is what is happening, from all reports, in Paris. If the Resistance has not achieved the European revolution, it seems to have brought about, at least in France, a genuine rebellion of the intellectuals, whose docility in relation to modern society was one of the saddest aspects of the sad spectacle of Europe between wars. And the French people, for the time being, appear to consider the arguments of their philosophers more important than the talk and the quarrels of their politicians. This may reflect, of course, a desire to escape from political action into some theory which merely talks about action, that is, into activism; but it may also signify that in the face of the spiritual bankruptcy of the left and the sterility of the old revolutionary élite—which have led to the desperate efforts at restoration of all political parties—more people than we might imagine have a feeling that the responsibility for political action is too heavy to assume until new foundations, ethical as well as political, are laid down, and that the old tradition of philosophy which is deeply imbedded even in the least philosophical individual is actually an impediment to new political thought.

The name of the new movement is "Existentialism," and its chief exponents are Jean-Paul Sartre and Albert Camus, but the term Existentialism has given rise to so many misunderstandings that Camus has already publicly stated why he is "not an Existentialist." The term comes from the modern German philosophy which had a revival immediately after the First World War and has strongly influenced French thought for more than a decade; but it would be irrelevant to trace and define the sources of Existentialism in national terms for the simple reason that both the German and the French manifestations came out of an identical period and a more or less identical cultural heritage.

The French Existentialists, though they differ widely among themselves, are united on two main lines of rebellion: first, the rigorous repudiation of what they call the esprit sérieux; and, second, the angry refusal to accept the world as it is as the natural, predestined milieu of man.

L'esprit sérieux, which is the original sin according to the new philosophy, may be equated with respectability. The "serious" man is one who thinks of himself as president of his business, as a member of the Legion of Honor, as a member of the faculty, but also as father, as husband, or as any other half-natural, half-social function. For by so doing he agrees to the identification of himself with an arbitrary function which society has bestowed. L'esprit sérieux is the very negation of freedom, because it leads man to agree to and accept the necessary deformation which every human being must undergo when he is fitted into society. Since everyone knows well enough in his own heart that he is not identical with his function, l'esprit sérieux indicates also bad faith in the sense of pretending. Kafka has already shown, in "Amerika," how ridiculous and dangerous is the hollow dignity which grows out of identifying oneself with one's function: In that book the most dignified person in the hotel, upon whose word the hero's job and daily bread depend, rules out the possibility that he can make an error by invoking the argument of the "serious" man: "How could I go on being the head porter if I mistook one person for another?"

This matter of l'esprit sérieux was first touched upon in Sartre's novel "La Nausée," in a delightful description of a gallery of portraits of the town's respectable citizens, les salands. It then became the central topic of Camus's novel "L'Étranger." The hero of the book, the stranger, is an average man who simply refuses to submit to the serious-mindedness of society, who refuses to live as any of his allotted functions. He does not behave as a son at his mother's funeral—he does not weep; he does not behave as a husband—he declines to take marriage seriously even at the moment of his engagement. Because he does not pretend, he is a stranger whom no one understands, and he pays with his life for his affront to society. Since he refuses to play the game, he is isolated from his fellow-men to the point of incomprehensibility and isolated from himself to the point of becoming inarticulate. Only in a last scene, immediately before his death, does the hero arrive at some kind of explanation which conveys the impression that for him life itself was such a mystery and in its terrible way so beautiful that he did not see any necessity for "improving" upon it with the trimmings of good behavior and hollow pretensions.

Sartre's brilliant play "Huis Clos" belongs to the same category. The play opens in hell, appropriately furnished in the style of the Second Empire. The three persons gathered in the room—"Hell is the Others"—set the diabolical torture in motion by trying to pretend. Since, however, their lives are closed and since "you are your life and nothing else," pretense no longer works, and we see what would go on behind closed doors if people actually were stripped of the sheltering cover of functions derived from society.

Both Sartre's play and Camus's novel deny the possibility of a genuine fellowship between men, of any relationship which would be direct, innocent, free of pretense. Love in Sartre's philosophy is the will to be loved, the need for a supreme confirmation of one's own existence. For Camus love is a somewhat awkward and hopeless attempt to break through the isolation of the individual.

The way out of pretense and seriousness is to play at being what one really is. Again Kafka indicated in the last chapter of "Amerika" a new possibility of authentic life. The great "Nature Theater" where everyone is welcome and where everybody's unhappiness is resolved is not by accident a theater. Here everybody is invited to choose his role, to play at what he is or would like to be. The chosen role is the solution of the conflict between mere functioning and mere being, as well as between mere ambition and mere reality.

The new "ideal" becomes, in this context, the actor whose very profession is pretending, who constantly changes his role, and thus can never take any of his roles seriously. By playing at what one is, one guards one's freedom as a human being from the pretenses of one's functions; moreover, only by playing at what he really is, is man able to affirm that he is never identical with himself as a thing is identical with itself. An inkpot is always an inkpot. Man is his life and his actions, which are never finished until the very moment of his death. He is his existence.

The second common element of French Existentialism, the insistence upon the basic homelessness of man in the world, is the topic of Camus's "Le Mythe de Sisyphe; essai sur l'absurde," and of Sartre's "La Nausée." For Camus man is essentially the stranger because the world in general and man as man are not fitted for each other; that they are together in existence makes the human condition an absurdity. Man is the only "thing" in the world which obviously does not belong in it, for only man does not exist simply as a man among men in the way animals exist among animals and trees among trees—all of which necessarily exist, so to speak, in the plural. Man is basically alone with his "revolt" and his "clairvoyance," that is, with his reasoning, which makes him ridiculous because the gift of reason was bestowed upon him in a world "where everything is given and nothing ever explained."

Sartre's notion of the absurdity, the contingency, of existence is best represented in the chapter of "La Nausée" which appears in the current issue of the Partisan Review under the title The Root of the Chestnut Tree. Whatever exists, so far as we can see, has not the slightest reason for its existence. It is simply de trop, superfluous. The fact that I can't even imagine a world in which, instead of many too many things, there would be nothing only shows the hopelessness and senselessness of man's being eternally entangled in existence.

Here Sartre and Camus part company, if we may judge from the few works of theirs which have reached this country. The absurdity of existence and the repudiation of l'esprit sérieux are only points of departure for each. Camus seems to have gone on to a philosophy of absurdity, whereas Sartre seems to be working toward some new positive philosophy and even a new humanism.

Camus has probably protested against being called an Existentialist because for him the absurdity does not lie in man as such or in the world as such but only in their being thrown together. Since man's life, being laid in the world, is absurd, it must be lived as absurdity—lived, that is, in a kind of proud defiance which insists on reason despite the experience of reason's failure to explain anything; insists on despair since man's pride will not allow him the hope of discovering a sense he cannot figure out by means of reason; insists, finally, that reason and human dignity, in spite of their senselessness, remain the supreme values. The absurd life then consists in constantly rebelling against all its conditions and in constantly refusing consolations. "This revolt is the price of life. Spread over the whole of an existence, it restores its grandeur." All that remains, all that one can say yes to, is chance itself, the hazard roi which has apparently played at putting man and world together. "'I judge that everything is well,' said Oedipus, and this word is sacred. It resounds in the ferocious universe which is the limit of man. . . . It makes of destiny an affair of men which should be settled among men." This is precisely the point where Camus, without giving much explanation, leaves behind all modernistic attitudes and comes to insights which are genuinely modern, the insight, for instance, that the moment may have arrived "when creation is no longer taken tragically; it is only taken seriously."

For Sartre, absurdity is of the essence of things as well as of man. Anything that exists is absurd simply because it exists. The salient difference between the things of the world and the human being is that things are unequivocally identical with themselves, whereas man—because he sees and knows that he sees, believes and knows that he believes—bears within his consciousness a negation which makes it impossible for him ever to become one with himself. In this single respect—in respect of his consciousness, which has the germ of negation in it—man is a creator. For this is of man's own making and not merely given, as the world and his existence are given. If man becomes aware of his own consciousness and its tremendous creative possibilities, and renounces the longing to be identical with himself as a thing is, he realizes that he depends upon nothing and nobody outside himself and that he can be free, the master of his own destiny. This seems to be the essential meaning of Sartre's novel "Les Mouches" ("The Flies"), in which Orestes, by taking upon himself the responsibility for the necessary killing of which the town is afraid, liberates the town and takes the Flies—the Erinyes of bad conscience and of the dark fear of revenge—with him. He himself is immune because he does not feel guilty and regrets nothing.

It would be a cheap error to mistake this new trend in philosophy and literature for just another fashion of the day because its exponents refuse the respectability of institutions and do not even pretend to that seriousness which regards every achievement as a step in a career. Nor should we be put off by the loud journalistic success with which their work has been accompanied. This success, equivocal as it may be in itself, is nevertheless due to the quality of the work. It is also due to a definite modernity of attitude which does not try to hide the depth of the break in Western tradition. Camus especially has the courage not even to look for connections, for predecessors and the like. The good thing about Sartre and Camus is that they apparently suffer no longer from nostalgia for the good old days, even though they may know that in an abstract sense those days were actually better than ours. They do not believe in the magic of the old, and they are honest in that they make no compromises whatever.

Yet if the revolutionary élan of these writers is not broken by success, if, symbolically speaking, they stick to their hotel rooms and their cafes, the time may come when it will be necessary to point out "seriously" those aspects of their philosophy which indicate that they are still dangerously involved in old concepts. The nihilistic elements, which are obvious in spite of all protests to the contrary, are not the consequences of new insights but of some very old ideas.

THREE POEMS

BY ROBERT LOWELL

Rebellion

There was rebellion, Father, when the mock
French windows slammed and you hove backwards, rammed
Into your heirlooms, screens, a glass-cased clock,
The highboy quaking to its toes, and damned
My arm that cast your house upon your head
And broke its flintlock on your skull. The dead Caught at my knees and fell:
And it was well
With me, my Father. Then
Behemoth and Leviathan
Devoured our mighty merchants. None could arm
Or put to sea. O Father, on my farm
I added field to field
And I have sealed
An everlasting pact
With Dives to contract
The world that spreads in pain;
My bondsmen, having had their fill,
No longer line the ditch at Bunker Hill
Where the clubbed muskets broke the redcoat's brain.

The North Sea Undertaker's Complaint

Now south and south and south the mallard heads,
His green-blue bony hood echoes the green
Shutters of Gray Rock, and the mussel beds
Are sluggish where the webbed feet spanked the lean
Eel grass to tinder in the take-off. South
Is what I think of. It seems yesterday
I slid my hearse across the river mouth
And pitched the first iced mouse into the hay.
Thirty below, it is. I hear the dumb
Club-footed orphan ring the Angelus
And clank the bell-chain for St. Gertrude's choir
To wail with the dead bell the martyrdom
Of two more parish priests, the phosphorous
Shriveled to glory when they babbled fire.

Where the Rainbow Ends

I saw the sky descending, black and white
Not blue, on Boston where the winters wore
The skulls to jack o'lanterns on the slates
And Hunger's skin-and-bone retrievers tore
The chickadee and shrike. The thorn tree waits
Its victim and tonight
The worms will eat the deadwood to the foot
Of Ararat: the scythers, Time and Death,
Helméd locusts, move upon the tree of breath;
The wild ingrafted olive and the root

Are withered, and a winter drifts to where
The Pepperpot, ironic rainbow, spans
Charles River and its scales of scorched-earth miles,
The tree-dabbed suburb where construction mans
The wrath of God. About the Chapel, piles
Of dead leaves char the air
And I am a red arrow on this graph
Of revelations. Every dove is sold,
The Chapel's sharp-shinned eagle shifts its hold
On Serpent-Time, the Rainbow's epitaph.

In Boston serpents whistle at the cold.
The victim climbs the altar steps and sings:
"Hosannah to the lion, lamb and beast
Who fans the furnace fire of Is with wings:
I breathe the ether of my marriage feast."
At the high altar, gold
And a fair cloth. I kneel and the wings beat
My cheek. What can the Dove of Jesus give You now but wisdom, exile? Stand and live,
The dove has brought an olive branch to eat.

THOMAS PAINE, Rationalist

BY PERRY MILLER

TODAY it is unnecessary to defend Tom Paine against Theodore Roosevelt's accusation, "filthy little atheist." Historians and biographers have at last impressed upon our generation the long-forgotten fact that "The Age of Reason," from which Paine's fame as an "infidel" sprang, was actually the work of a pious deist. Yet it remains a significant commentary on Paine's career that for a century after his death Americans charged him with infidelity on the strength of a book he wrote in the pathetic hope of arresting the progress of atheism in France of the Terror. His simple confidence that mere rational persuasion could curb the unleashed furies of the Revolution was roundly refuted by the Jacobins who condemned him to prison. The irony of his subsequent reputation shows how Paine was victimized by his place in history; he had the misfortune to be the most fervent of rationalists at the very moment when rationalism of the eighteenth-century variety was going down before the rush of an entirely new kind of fervor.

Undoubtedly it was his reputed infidelity that caused nineteenth-century America to forget his services in the War of Independence. When he returned to America in 1802, political machinations were again to challenge his faith in the goodness of man, for under the regime of Thomas Jefferson, Federalist politicians and clergymen found that by denouncing the atheism of Tom Paine they could strike a glancing blow at the man in the White House. Their campaign of vilification found a ready response among the people for the more important reason that it coincided with an evangelical revival and the collapse of the "republican religion" of the eighteenth century. Not until the twentieth century, when Paine's anti-Christian sentiments no longer seemed shocking or dangerous, could justice be done to him, and the image of the "filthy atheist" be replaced with that of the champion of liberty writing the first Crisis paper on a drumhead by the light of a camp fire among Washington's demoralized militia. Yet bigotry in the age of Jackson must have been intense indeed if it could so utterly efface the memory of Paine's patriotism. It seems strange, moreover, that even emancipated Americans of the time, Emerson and Thoreau for instance, should have thought so little of Paine that they went to Luther and Cromwell for their revolutionary heroes and celebrated Napoleon as the Representative Man of Action. Perhaps bigotry is not, then, the only explanation for the neglect into which he fell.

The answer to his problem is not long in emerging when Paine's work is surveyed in the new complete edition of Dr. Foner,* where we can view it in its entirety, excellently annotated and unobscured by the haze of nineteenth-century religious prejudice. When one reviews these 2,000 pages of political polemics, deistic tracts, scientific projects, labored verse, and argumentative letters, one may ask oneself where else in English literature one could go to find enunciated more clearly, more concisely, more readably the body of doctrine conveyed by the term "eighteenth-century rationalism." Certainly not to Locke himself, for however simplified the doctrine ultimately became, in him it was tentative and skeptical, and made consistent with the "reasonableness of Christianity." Nor to Jefferson either, for despite the succinctness achieved in the second paragraph of the Declaration of Independence, his thinking was characteristically much more subtle, more uncomfortably aware of the complexities of human nature and society. Perhaps the closest parallel is Paine's contemporary, Godwin; but in him the rational doctrine had become rigid and fanatical, with a "Gothic" element entirely lacking in Paine. So we may look to Paine to find, in all its naked simplicity, the faith that animated the optimistic eighteenth century: the belief that man is by nature good and reasonable, since his mind is a tabula rasa on which a benevolent Newtonian universe writes rational principles; that the evils of society have been brought about by the scheming designs of a few corrupt kings and priests; that all man has to do in order to reach his original perfection is to excise these corruptions and let nature take its course. Society, his thesis runs, is "natural," while government is an artificial construction of rational men to facilitate the ends of society. But when government "assumes to exist for itself, and acts by partialities of favor and oppression, it becomes the cause of the mischiefs it ought to prevent." The remedy for Paine is always to reduce the scope of government; the body of his work is devoted, in this sense, to a negative purpose, because he was always serenely confident

* "The Complete Writings of Thomas Paine." Collected and Edited by Philip S. Foner. Two Volumes. The Citadel Press. $6.

JAMES P. WARBURG

presents the first concrete proposal ever put forward for the elimination of psychological warfare and for the organization of world-wide freedom of information—a freedom essential to lasting peace.

UNWRITTEN TREATY

MR. WARBURG states clearly the difference between information and propaganda; he studies Axis propaganda technique, and tells the inside story of Allied psychological counter-attack. His strong arguments in favor of psychological warfare disarmament, and detailed study of methods and techniques for accomplishing this purpose are causing provocative discussion everywhere.

NEW REPUBLIC: "Warburg is that rare and valuable combination—a fighting liberal with a flair for propaganda . . . He strikes out eloquently and vigorously against the 'failure of the United States to carry out its obvious mission' of liberal democratic leadership."

J. RAYMOND WALSH: "An admirable contribution to understanding. It challenges men to act either on its recommendations or on better ones of their own making."—N.Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
BOOK REVIEW $2.00

At all bookstores

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

that the positive functions would take care of themselves. For example, "in those associations which men promiscuously form for the purpose of trade, . . . in which government is totally out of question, . . . we see how naturally the various parties unite." Paine believed that men were held together in human society for motives as simple as those that formed joint-stock companies, and no amount of experience with contentious Frenchmen or Americans could shake his conviction.

The neat simplicity of this thinking explains in part why Paine was effective as a political pamphleteer. He was the ideal spokesman in a time of hesitation, when issues needed to be crystallized, when the period of debate was closed and arms must decide the contest. Yet there was something more to Paine's achievement than mere simplification of issues. Jefferson put his finger upon it exactly: "No writer has exceeded Paine in ease and familiarity of style, in perspicuity of expression, happiness of elucidation, and in simple and unassuming language." Paine preached the doctrines of natural rights, social compact, and right of revolution in their classic simplicity, not only because he was incapable of more complex thinking, but also because he had a more pressing motive for preaching them than other theorists of the century. Actually, the doctrine was a learned production, best understood by men like Jefferson who could see through the cloudy style of John Locke and follow the demonstrations of Sir Isaac Newton; Paine was neither gentleman nor scholar. He was poor and self-educated; the theory of natural goodness and natural rights was not the amusement of his leisure. For him the debate was to be won not in the library but among men. Above all, it had to be made clear to the mass of men. It is therefore as a popularizer that Paine must be estimated, not as a theorist. He was the man who could bring home the idea of the social compact to the meanest capacity in colonial America through the problem of building a log house on the frontier: "Four or five united would be able to raise a tolerable dwelling in the midst of a wilderness, but one man might labor out the common period of life without accomplishing anything." Or he could dramatize the political covenant in a single phrase: "Some convenient tree will afford them a State House." So also he was at his best when he ridiculed Burke's purple passage on the vanished chivalry of France which should have rallied to the side of a silly queen with his devastating epigram, "He pities the plumage but forgets the dying bird," or when he exposed Burke's perversion of the Glorious Revolution by declaring that the Parliament of 1688 might as well have enacted themselves to live forever as have made their authority to live forever.

But there was something else in Burke which Paine was unable to understand. For the polemical occasion, it is true, he did not need to examine the fundamentals of Burke's thinking; nevertheless, when he replied only by exploding Burke's rhetoric and by straightforwardly reasserting the rational doctrine, Paine betrayed a complete inability to grasp Burke's vision of society as organic and not contractual, Burke's concept of man as an emotional being and not a calculating machine. Paine could perceive that Burke's eloquence was a defense of the status quo, but he could not see that Burke understood some tendencies of human nature better than he, tendencies which even at that moment were carrying the French Revolution into directions that nullified the rational doctrine. It was Burke and not Paine who predicted Napoleon.

There is pathos enough in Paine's last years. Living in poverty, denied a vote by the righteous citizens of New Rochelle, he petitioned Congress again and again for some reward for his work in the Revolution, a reward that was altogether his due when it is remembered that he had taken no profits from the immense sale of his writings. And yet there is in these memorials a note of self-righteousness that interferes with our complete sympathy. He was reduced to quoting his own words to remind a heedless generation that those had been "the times that tried men's souls," and with all the tedious obstinacy of a man with the truth on his side he insisted, "I do not believe independence would have been declared had it not been for the effect" of "Common Sense." It is a sad spectacle, and a reproof to America. But it is clear also that Paine had outlived his time. The ringing words of 1776 or even of 1792 were no longer ringing. When Emerson called upon the young writers of America to treat the near, the low, the common, instead of the sublime and beautiful, to deal with the meal in the firkin and the milk in the pan instead of following the "cold and pedantic" style of Johnson or Gibbon, it did not occur to him to make an exception of Paine. Even the language of Jefferson's praise shows to what stylistic era Paine belonged, the age of "perspicuity" and "elucidation." With all his courage and selfless devotion Paine remained the single-minded doctrinaire. He was an artist and a writer first and

The first complete, authoritative survey of the Middle Eastern powder-keg

IRAN

By William S. Haas

Of the Iranian Institute and School of Asiatic Studies

An international danger spot, Iran is one of the most discussed and least understood countries in the world. Mr. Haas knows Iran, its people and its history, intimately. His book "reflects a great deal of information which has never before been published. Iran should receive great welcome from all those interested in knowing more of the actual problems of Iran."—Dr. Taghi Nassr, Director, Iranian Trade and Economic Commission. With 8 pages of photographs and a map.

At all bookstores • $3.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
MORNINGSIDE HEIGHTS • NEW YORK 27, N. Y.

ATOMIC ENERGY for ENDURING PEACE

MEDICAL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY is the title of an article in the January Atlantic Monthly by Professor Robley D. Evans of Massachusetts Institute of Technology. This institution was prominent in the development of atomic energy and the discovery of the atomic bomb.

Dr. Evans' article shows that through medical advances alone atomic energy has already saved more lives than were snuffed out by the bombs.

The subject of atomic energy reminds us that pupils in our schools have the right to study out of textbooks which tell of atomic development. Such textbooks can be found in Physics and in Chemistry.

Not only in Science, but in Geography, the Social Studies and Mathematics, young American pupils have the right to study from new books which have the latest developments in the subject. Such books are available.

A complete equipment of new textbooks costs less than 2 percent of each school dollar. Pretended economies reducing textbook purchases save only a very small sum at the cost of impaired results for the pupils.

Textbooks and teaching are a team, each necessary to the other. Let us have the best of both.

Below are listed a few of the textbooks in the above-named subjects which are available to young pupils of America:—

Stull-Hatch Global Geographies
 Quinlan Basal Primary Readers
 Rainbow Readers, Adventures in Science
 Adventures in English, New Language Books
 Adventures in Language, Activity Notebooks
 Magruder's American Government in 1946
 Hughes' Building Citizenship
 Townsend's Our America
 Hughes' Making of Today's World
 West and West's History Series
 Global Geography for High Schools
 Wood and Carpenter's Our Environment
 A Complete Modern Science Series
 Brownlee's Elements of Chemistry
 Fuller, Brownlee and Baker's Physics
 Smallwood's New Biology
 Stein's Refresher Arithmetic
 The New Mathematics Series
 Edgerton and Carpenter's Algebras
 Chardenal Textbooks in French
 Smith-Thompson's First Year Latin

TWO CENTS

Allyn and Bacon

Boston New York Chicago Atlanta Dallas San Francisco

"Books that Live"

THE PSYCHOANALYTIC THEORY OF NEUROSIS

by Otto Fenichel, M.D.

Author of

OUTLINE OF CLINICAL PSYCHOANALYSIS

In Dr. Fenichel's new book, the reader will find a wealth of clinical material, and the 'general' theory of psychoanalysis presented in a systematic and comprehensive manner. Here is important, up-to-date information of great value to everyone interested in psychoanalysis. $7.50

Other Important NORTON BOOKS

In the Field of Psychiatry and Psychoanalysis

OUR INNER CONFLICTS

A Constructive Theory of Neurosis

By KAREN HORNEY
$3.00

EMOTIONAL PROBLEMS OF LIVING

By O. S. ENGLISH and
G. H. J. PEARSON $5.00

THE NEUROTIC PERSONALITY OF OUR TIME

By KAREN HORNEY
$3.00

NEW WAYS IN PSYCHOANALYSIS

By KAREN HORNEY
$3.00

SELF-ANALYSIS

By KAREN HORNEY
$3.00

A HANDBOOK OF PSYCHIATRY

By P. M.
LICHTENSTEIN
and S. M. SMALL $3.50

PSYCHOTHERAPY WITH CHILDREN

By FREDERICK H.
ALLEN $3.50

FREUD'S CONTRIBUTION TO PSYCHIATRY

By A. A. BRILL $2.75

COMMON NEUROSES OF CHILDREN AND ADULTS

By O. S. ENGLISH and
G. H. J. PEARSON $3.75

A HISTORY OF MEDICAL PSYCHOLOGY

By GREGORY
ZILBOORG and
GEORGE W. HENRY
$6.00

READING, WRITING AND SPEECH PROBLEMS IN CHILDREN

By S. T. ORTON $2.50

THE PROBLEM OF ANXIETY

By SIGMUND FREUD
$2.25

NEW INTRODUC- TORY LECTURES ON PSYCHOANALYSIS

By SIGMUND FREUD
$3.25

At all booksellers

W-W-NORTON & CO. • 70 Fifth Avenue, New York 11

foremost, but an artist within narrow limits. The man of the people could make the doctrine of the learned live for the people only so long as they would listen to the language of rationalism. And so the failure of nineteenth-century liberals to perceive that Paine had pleaded their cause in eighteenth-century language is comprehensible. To appreciate Paine today requires an exercise of the historical imagination, from which one comes away impressed on the one hand with his integrity and his courage and on the other with the limitations of his mind and the fatiguing insistence of his optimism. One comes away, also, with a renewed realization of the difficulties involved in presenting complex political issues on the plane of the people's understanding. The price of popularizing for contemporaries is temporary popularity.

"The Russian Adventure"

SOVIET POLITICS AT HOME AND ABROAD. By

Frederick L. Schuman. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

ABOUT the difficulty of either writing or reviewing a book on Russia Professor Schuman speaks eloquently. "The Russian adventure," he says, "was nurtured on soaring aspirations and reared to a tough and efficient manhood amid the squalor of poverty, the excitement of vast adventures, and the grim necessity of a brutal fight for life. If the result does not lend itself to any description and analysis to which all informed and reasonable persons can subscribe, the difficulty scarcely lies in the complexity of the society observed. It is rather attributable to the absence among observers of any generally accepted norms and techniques for depicting the social dynamics of any contemporary community."

Most books on Russia manage merely to reinforce our previous prejudices and preconceptions, partly because these prejudices are deeply cherished and partly because the author himself is guided in the selection of his material by profound political and spiritual commitments. Let it be said immediately that Professor Schuman's basic convictions do not fit into the usual pattern of the Russophobes or the Russophiles, of those who regard Russia as the seat of vice or virtue in international relations.

He is profoundly convinced that in the absence of a world government—which for reasons he does not adequately explain he seems to regard as having been within the historical possibilities of our era—the peace of the world requires the closest collaboration between Russia and the Western powers and therefore the best possible understanding of each other's virtues and good intentions. There must be an increasing number of people in this country who, despite their prejudices, share this conviction because it is so inescapable.

Professor Schuman adds a new force to this conclusion by believing and proving that there is no more possibility of the liberal democratic creed conquering Russia than of the Western world overwhelming Russia in military conflict; and per contra that Russia can no more defeat the Western world than the Communist creed could become the means of salvation for a not too healthy Western society. "Marxist dreamers of world revolution," he declares, "while wholly incapable of uniting the global society of our time, could yet shatter the hope of unity beyond repair if their dream should ever again become the guide of Soviet policy. Fortunately no such development is possible. The men of the Kremlin are realists."

Many of us are willing to entertain this belief or hope with Professor Schuman, but we are not quite as sure about it as he is. He assumes again and again that the Communist parties of the world have no real relation to Kremlin policy but are merely mouthing phrases which Russian policy has made obsolete. Quite a few lengthy quotations from Kremlin leaders in his own book contain strong ideological attacks upon Western democracy and capitalism, and none of them prove that Stalin's disavowal of Trotsky's plan of world revolution means more than the insistence that communism must be made secure in Russia first. It may be that dreams of world revolution will ultimately be completely disavowed. All we can say at the moment is that this ultimate hope of Marxism is held in abeyance in Russia, but not in such a way that the Kremlin is unable to use the groups in the Western world which cling to it as instruments of its policy.

Though he may have failed to be completely discriminating on such details, Professor Schuman's effort to support the necessary psychological disarmament between Russia and the West with an ideological disarmament is important and persuasive. He is not equally persuasive in analyzing the actual political realities in either Russia or the West.

In assessing the future of Western democracy Schuman assumes, rightly I believe, that in the event of social catastrophe a middle-class society is much more likely to try fascist than Communist forms of escape from its problems. "The Soviet way can never be the way of the West," he says. He is rather scornful of the Socialist meliorists in the Western world, but his own program for the solution of our political problem is essentially theirs. "A new way," he declares, "combining in its design as much public planning as is needful for stability and as much private property and competitive enterprise as is possible of preservation, must be found if modern man is to escape self-inflicted annihilation. Any contention that such a union of public and private activities is impossible is a threat of death sentence upon Western culture." This way out is not elaborated beyond this single sentence.

In dealing with the political realities in Russia he begins with the basic and essentially correct proposition that the kind of planning which is done in Russia is incompatible with democratic or party government as we know it. Beyond this point he seems uncertain whether to regard the consequence as a dangerous destruction of democracy or as a new kind of democracy which will ultimately develop some more obvious characteristics of democracy. On the whole he is inclined to the latter view.

Perhaps a reviewer is merely betraying his own prejudices if he finds these democratic explanations of the absence of democracy in Russia unconvincing. But many of them seem unconvincing on Schuman's own grounds. A few examples are in order:

The greatest spy story ever told

—AND IT'S TRUE!

In a book that reads like an Eric Ambler thriller, these two young parachutists of O.S.S. tell the life-and-death story of the men who fought our secret war. Here are the agents who gambled with death and torture behind enemy lines—and often lost. Here is the human story of the Office of Strategic Services—the greatest undercover operation in history, told at last after years of utmost secrecy.

At all bookstores $2.50

By Stewart Alsop and Thomas Braden

The
O. S. S.
and American Espionage

SUB ROSA

REYNAL & HITCHCOCK

NEW BOOKS

THE UNITED STATES
AFTER WAR

By Hansen, Hill, Hollander, Fuller, Briggs, and Stoddard. Introduction by C. W. de Kiewiet

The considered opinions and forecasts of six highly qualified Americans concerning problems of postwar development.

CONTENTS: Social Planning for Tomorrow by Alvin H. Hansen—Agriculture in the Postwar Economy by F. F. Hill—The Role of Organized Labor in the United States Economy by Louis Hollander—American Business After the War by Walter D. Fuller—Power Politics and International Organization by Herbert W. Briggs—Educating American Citizens by George D. Stoddard. $2.50

THE WORLD'S HUNGER

By F. A. Pearson and F. A. Harper
New York State College of Agriculture,
Cornell University

A forthright discussion of the obstacles to an immediate improvement of the world's diet. Professors Pearson and Harper survey the food-producing areas of the world, and present a great many vital facts about food habits around the globe, the differing degrees of pressure of population on food supply, and prospects for upgrading the nutritional standards of the world's two billion people. $1.50

ORDER FROM YOUR BOOKSELLER OR CORNELL UNIVERSITY PRESS
ITHACA, NEW YORK

Schuman finds the adulation of Stalin disquieting, for "it recalls to Western democrats the ancient myth of the divine right of kings, the modern cult of charismatic despots, and every other image of arbitrary personal power." Yet he finally dismisses the extravagant appreciation of Stalin as not being due to personal conceit and as not having had the consequence "of isolating Stalin from his colleagues or causing him to suffer the atrophy of his critical faculties." This seems to me to miss the point that a political system which makes a leader immune to criticism inevitably results in extravagant appreciation of his powers and virtues and that this quasi-religious adoration in turn adds to his arbitrary power.

On the subject of the class structure of the new Soviet state, Schuman wisely recognizes that differentiation of function does create at least inchoate classes. But he is convinced that the Russian system will validate itself because it is practically impossible for a "leisure class" to arise. This assumes that the primary threat to justice is a functionless class which lives on the labor of others. Is not the primary threat an oligarchic class which holds irresponsible power? In a capitalist society such a class may vote itself undue privileges, including that of functionless leisure for its offspring. But it is dangerous to justice if it refrains from this privilege and exercises power which is not subject to review. There is such a class in Russia, though it is probably not yet self-perpetuating and may not become so.

On the question of the relation of freedom to literature and the arts Schuman thinks that the tremendous output of the Soviet men of letters validates a system which "gives scientists and artists economic security through regular salaries plus generous rewards for achievement through royalties, prizes, and numerous privileges. Since freedom is commonly viewed in the West as the sine qua non of productivity, the enigma of Soviet culture seems to many quite inexplicable." The difficulty here is that "productivity" is made the criterion of the adequacy of the artist.

All the inadequacies of interpretation seem to be derived from a lack of understanding of the fundamental value of freedom. We are told for instance that "freedom from want is the best guaranty of freedom of speech and religion." Actually it is possible to beguile men from seeking a more ultimate freedom by securing them against want. As Professor Schuman himself admits in another context, "a job without free speech may seem preferable to free speech without a job."

It must be admitted that Western civilization has not solved its economic problem within the framework of a free society; and it may not be able to. It may be that Russia has solved the economic problem. We ought at any rate to appreciate the real achievements of this great adventure. But if genuine liberty has been sacrificed for the sake of achieving its end, we ought to know about it. The world society is bound to embrace various economies and cultures. It is therefore important to mitigate prejudices against systems other than our own. But our tolerance need not prompt us to disavow what we have painfully learned about the relation of freedom to justice in ages of history.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

THE MEN NOW SHAPING THE FUTURE

give you the true meaning of what is happening now

*..and what will happen
in the years ahead*

*The momentous book about the future
by the world's best informed men*

If you could sit at a conference table with many of the foremost thinkers and doers of our time, with men whose thoughts on the future will affect all of us and generations yet unborn. . . .

If, sitting in intimate council, you could ask them the questions that plague and bewilder you in these times. . . .

Would you not consider that a vital privilege?

TREASURY FOR THE FREE WORLD has been designed to provide exactly such a privilege.

Here you will find answered your most urgent questions about education, race prejudice, economics, politics, self determination, international relations, science, world food supply, world business — by men whose views are heeded with respect by governments and parliaments and by millions of awakening citizens of the world.

Among the contributors:

EDUARD BENES • HENRY A. WALLACE
JAN MASARYK • SUMNER WELLES
BERTRAND RUSSELL • VINCENT SHEBAN
ALBERT EINSTEIN • THOMAS MANN
LIN YUTANG • CHARLES DE GAULLE
HERBERT H. LEHMANN • TITO

—and many others

Treasury for the Free World

EDITED BY BEN RAEBURN

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY ERNEST HEMINGWAY

At bookstores everywhere . . . or use coupon

International Acclaim

"The TREASURY is the first universal book, giving invaluable facts and ideas about the foundations of a truly free world."

—HENRY MORGENTHAU, JR.

"If collections like this were published more often maybe the world would collect its wits sooner. A profound and important book for this profound and important time."

—NORMAN CORWIN

"TREASURY FOR THE FREE WORLD is utterly fascinating."

—TED THACKREY, Editor, N. Y. Post

"In these critical times every intelligent reader will find in TREASURY FOR THE FREE WORLD vital enlightenment —and reason — hope as well as reason to fight."

—FREDA KIRCHWEY, Editor, The Nation

ANCO PUBLISHING

Dept. 35, 480 Lexington Ave., New York 17

Please send me copies of TREASURY FOR THE FREE WORLD at $3.50.

☐ I enclose $ Send prepaid.

☐ Send C.O.D. plus postage charges.

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY, ZONE, STATE

The Irrepressible Myth

THE SHELLEY LEGEND. By Robert Metcalf Smith, in collaboration with Martha Mary Schlegel, Theodore George Ehrsam, and Louis Addison Waters. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

THE Shelley myth perhaps began when Trelawny snatched Shelley's heart from the funeral flames and, by making a present of it to Leigh Hunt, precipitated the quarrel between Hunt and Mary Shelley over the rightful ownership of the precious relic. Professor Smith and his collaborators do not call it a myth; they call it a legend and really mean a lie. The nature of the story they investigate, whether myth, legend, or lie, cannot better be suggested than by the fact that one of the most familiar portraits of Shelley—there are no wholly authentic portraits from the life—is a conscious copy of Leonardo's head of Christ with only a slight change of features. Students of comparative religion point out how the Dying God of the fertility rites, Attis or Adonis, was assimilated to the Christian Messiah. Professor Smith and his colleagues undertake to show how the Shelley who preached sexual freedom and freely practiced what he preached was turned into a figure acceptable to Victorian piety.

It has of course long been known that Mary Shelley wished to clear her husband of any taint of free sexuality. For one thing, she wanted to be known as the unique love of Shelley's life. Then, too, she hoped to obscure anything that might make the poet unacceptable to the strict morality of a later time, or that might bring embarrassment to their son, Sir Percy Shelley. To maintain her position as Shelley's only real mate she encouraged the vilification of his first wife, Harriet; she falsified her husband's relationship to her half-sister, Claire Clairmont, and she was inclined to represent as mere "platonic" whatever manifestations of Shelley's roving attention made her uneasy. Yet in point of fact neither Shelley nor Mary herself practiced the chastity she was later to prize. Professor Newman Ivey White, in his "Shelley," has shown that they planned to carry out Shelley's theory of sexual community by admitting Shelley's old friend Hogg as a third party to their marriage; now Professor Smith shows that this plan was actually put into effect. It is clear to Professor Smith, and he makes it pretty clear to the reader, that Shelley was Claire Clairmont's lover and even that he was, what Professor White insists he was not, the father of a child by Claire, the mysterious Elena, of whose existence Professor White first made us aware. And it seems pretty certain to Professor Smith that Shelley was the lover and not merely the admirer of Jane Williams.

Although Mary Shelley is not a person of attractive character, much can be forgiven her natural pride and her impulse to protect herself and her son. Her daughter-in-law, Lady Shelley, is less forgivable and more interesting. Someone called her "a more temperate Lady Macbeth," and if we look at the matter with the novelistic eye it deserves, she is the great figure in the story. She was married not so much to Shelley's son as to Shelley's fame, and she devoted her life to establishing its spotlessness. She opened her long campaign by erecting the first Shelley monument, a dreadful statue of the drowned poet expiring in Mary's arms in the traditional posture of the Pietà. She established the Shelley shrine at Boscombe Manor and required that ladies remove their bonnets before coming into the presence of its relics. She rehabilitated Shelley at Oxford by bringing about the acceptance of a monument by the very University College that had expelled the undergraduate Shelley for atheism. She allowed her manuscripts to be used only by those biographers whom she could control, or thought she could; she excised passages from important documents; in order to clear Shelley of any blame for Harriet's suicide she accepted as authentic certain letters that she knew, or had reason to know, were forged. She established and largely manipulated the Shelley Society, where miasmatic minds demonstrated that Shelley was everything he was not. The very shape of Shelley's nose was a matter for her passionate supervision, and she fought against even the authority of Shelley's own description of it, for he had so far forgotten himself as to write of it as a "little turn-up nose."

A precise judgment of the conclusions reached by Professor Smith in all the questions he raises is beyond the competence and rather beyond the interest of this reviewer. Professor Smith's general view of Shelley's sexual conduct can surprise no one who is aware of the ease with which Shelley passed from theory to practice. That Shelley has been represented, in both his life and his thought, in an emasculated and sentimental way is certainly true, and it is useful and amusing to know how much conscious effort helped bring this about. If there is one major criticism to be made of "The Shelley Legend," a work of which the scholarship is precise to the point of querulousness, it is that its authors seem unaware of what is primary in the myth they deal with—that is, Shelley himself. "None of us was the same after Shelley's death," Trelawny said, and indeed to the little group in Italy Shelley irradiated some energy, or meaning, that made them more alive than they would ever be again. For good or bad, his poetry, which was always involved with his life, continues that irradiation. He was a mythopoeic man, a mythical personality. He saw himself as what we now call a culture hero, and he saw himself truly. Professor Smith and his collaborators, careful and literal people, see how the lies and perversions were contrived, but they do not see either the energy of the myth itself or its ability to absorb lies. Mary Shelley Creates the Shelley Legend is one of the book's

WHAT SHALL BE DONE WITH THE JEWS IN EUROPE?

An Appeal for

THE OPENING OF PALESTINE

and the rehabilitation of the Jews in Europe

Read: "IN PEACE AND DIGNITY"

The testimony of JUDGE JOS. M. PROSKAUER before the ANGLO-AMERICAN COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY

Write for Your FREE Copy Today
Dept. "N"

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

386 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

chapter headings. But actually Mary, whatever she wished, did no more than make certain quantitative changes in the account of the hero's life. Neither she nor Lady Shelley made the legend or myth. What is important in a culture hero is the pattern of his conduct, and this they did not change. The charm of the myth of Shelley, for those who are charmed by it, is the paradox of strength in weakness, of duty in pleasure, of chastity in passion. This pattern Shelley established himself. Shelley believed that nothing he did was sinful or wrong, that his sexual passions were chaste no matter how indulged; Mary made out that he did nothing sinful or wrong, but although she omits the indulgence, she is careful not to destroy the paradox of his passion and chastity. Her version of the paradox was more easily accepted than the poet's own, but still it was the paradox that had meaning and appeal. Like any myth, the Shelley myth had to sink some of the terrors of reality before it could become available.

LIONEL TRILLING

VERSE CHRONICLE

MARSDEN HARTLEY'S collection of verse ("Selected Poems," Viking, $3) shows observation, sentiment, humor, and indignation but no knowledge of how to organize and concentrate these into poems; the sympathetic magic that takes the place of knowledge he seems to have borrowed, with ungrudging and rather unreflecting admiration, from whatever passed as lingua franca among modernist poets in the '20's. If there were only some mechanism—like Seurat's proposed system of painting, or that projected Universal Algebra Gödel innocently believes Leibnitz to have perfected and mislaid—for reasonably and systematically converting into poetry what we see and feel and are! When one reads the verse of people who cannot write poems—people who often have more intelligence, sensibility, and moral discrimination than most of the poets—it is hard not to regard the Muse as a sort of fairy godmother who says to the poet, after her colleagues have showered on him the most disconcerting of gifts: "Well, never mind. You're still the only one that can write poetry."

This is so much the age of anthologies that it is surprising that poets still waste their time on books of verse, instead of writing anthologies in the first place. If you are about to print a book of poems, don't make up a few names and biographical sketches with which to punctuate your manuscript, change its title to "Poems of Democracy," and you will find yourself transformed from an old pumpkin, always in the red, to a shiny black new coach. For the average reader knows poetry mainly from anthologies, just as he knows philosophy mainly from histories of philosophy or textbooks: the "Complete So-in-So"—thousands of small-type, double-column pages of poetry, without one informing repentant sentence of ordinary prose—evokes from him a start of that savage and unreasoning timidity, that horror vacui, with which he stares at the lemmas and corollaries of Spinoza's "Ethics." Those cultural entrepreneurs, the anthologists, have become figures of melancholy and deciding importance for the average reader of poetry, a man of great scope and little grasp, who still knows what he likes—in the anthologies.

BARGAINS in BOOKS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail-Order Book House

ORIGINAL EDITIONS—NOT REPRINTS

1. BOUDOIR COMPANION. Edited by Page Cooper. Illustrated. A lusty collection of uninhibited humor. The ideal companion for the privacy of the boudoir or bedroom. Many bits of wit and wisdom revealing the intimate thoughts of women about men. $.98

2. SORCERERS OF DOBU. By R. F. Fortune. Illustrated. The fascinating study of the unmissionized natives living off the coast of New Guinea, written after months of intimate association with the superstitious aborigines. Richly illustrated and interesting to layman and anthropologist alike. Published at $3.75. $1.29

3. THE TOOLS OF WAR. By James R. Newman. Illustrated. A veritable encyclopedia of weapons used from the earliest times to the present day, profusely illustrated with hundreds of sketches, photographs and prints, a valuable source book. Published at $5.00. $1.69

4. THE LOST BOOKS OF THE BIBLE and The Forgotten Books of Eden. Two volumes complete in one large, fully illustrated volume. Handsomely bound, 562 pages. Only $1.98

5. THE GOLDEN BOUGH. A Study in Magic and Religion, by Sir James G. Fraser. Index. 758 pages. "One of the greatest books of all time." Contains the wealth of the 12-volume edition published at $30.00 and formerly published in this 1-volume edition at $5.00. Only $2.49

6. FOREIGN LANGUAGE WORD CARDS. Stephens Word Cards. The famous simplified self-teaching system of foreign language study, containing 512 cards and illustrations. By means of these cards anyone can acquire a basic vocabulary and a general familiarity with Spanish, French, German, Italian and even Esperanto. Put up in an envelope. All for only $1.29

7. CARPENTRY. Craft Problems. By H. H. Siegle. With 700 illustrations. Index. Contains everything you want to know about carpentry. Only $1.98

8. A CENTURY OF MURDER MYSTERIES. 101 Years' Entertainment. The Great Detective Stories 1841-1941. Edited by Ellery Queen. 599 pages. From Poe to Agatha Christie, Ellery Queen has selected 50 of the finest detective-mystery-crime short stories ever written. Only $1.98

9. 10,000 TRADE SECRETS, RECIPES, etc. Fortunes in Formulas for Home, Farm and Workshop. (Henley's Twentieth Century Book of Ten Thousand Formulas, Processes and Trade Secrets). Edited by G. D. Hiscox. M.E. Illustrated. Index. 888 pages. (Formerly published at $4.00). Only $1.49

10. THE TRAVELS OF MARCO POLO. Ed. by Manuel Komroff. The 13th century Venetian merchant's own amazing story of his world travels. The most spectacular travel narrative ever recorded. Only $1.98

11. IN AND OUT OF COURT. By F. X. Busch. Illustrated. 306 pages. "As rare a collection of humorous courtroom incidents as has ever been gathered into one volume." Published at $3.00. Only $1.29

12. MEN PAST FORTY. By A. E. Niemoeller. A.B., M.A., B.S. Illustrated. "This treatise contains an immense amount of wonderful information about impaired vigor, the prostate gland, weak manhood, rejuvenation, etc." Special $1.49

13. THE OPERA LIBRETTO LIBRARY. Contains all the words, and music of the principal airs of 33 great operas: 3-volume set containing 10 Wagner operas including the entire Ring. Tannhauser; 11 Italian operas including Aida, Pagliacci, Il Trovatore; 12 French and German operas including Carmen, Faust, Fidelio, Hansel and Gretel. Authentic original text with full English translation in parallel columns. 3 vols. $5.95

14. THE BORGIAS or, AT THE FEET OF VENUS. By Vicente Blasco Ibañez. Were the Borgias worse or better than history has painted them? The famous author of "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" answers the question in a full-bodied novel that is at the same time a true description of the lusty passionate Borgias who typified this licentious period of Italian history. Published at $3.00. $.93

15. ENCYCLOPEDIA OF FURNITURE. By Joseph Aronson. 1,115 photographs, hundreds of drawings. The tremendous number of illustrations shows almost every kind and type of furniture ever made. For home decorators, collectors, antique dealers, architects, students, 424 pages. 8 1/2" x 11". Only $2.98

Money-Back Guarantee

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

Established 1884

N-45

121-123 East 24th Street, New York 10, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the items I have encircled below, delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

(Mark circle around items desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Bargain Catalog No. 345-N, containing hundreds of equally unusual Book Bargains—just off the press!

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

WHY has the Catholic Church

Supported

Mussolini
Hitler
Tiso
Franco
Salazar
Peron

?

Why did the Catholic church support Roosevelt's domestic policies and oppose his foreign policy?

Why is the Catholic church anti-Capitalist as well as anti-Communist?

What kind of a political, social and economic system is the Catholic church attempting to bring about?

How has this affected your life and how may it affect the lives of your children?

READ:

"THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND ECONOMICS"

by L. H. Lehmann

Third of an important series of articles which began in our January issue, describing aspects of the Catholic Church never before revealed.

In the March Issue of

THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE

Edited by former Catholic Priests

Subscription only $1.00 a year (10 issues)

Canada - $1.25

Sample Copy 15¢

To make sure of receiving March issue return this ad with your order.

Agora Publishing Company, Dept. T-251

229 WEST 48th STREET

NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

Government regulation or enforced free competition?

INTERNATIONAL CARTELS

By Dr. ERVIN HEXNER

WITH over 100 case studies as ammunition, Dr. Hexner presents a broad and stimulating study of pre-war international economic agreements. This book is essential reading for all those who wish a solid, factual background for their thinking on one of the most perplexing economic questions of this era. $6.00

At your bookstore

The University of NORTH CAROLINA PRESS

Chapel Hill, North Carolina

And yet if you ask, "What do I need to become an anthologist?" it is difficult to answer, as one would like to answer, "Taste." Zeal and a publisher are the irreducible, and usually unexceeded, minima. The typical anthologist is a sort of Gallup poll with connections—often astonishing ones; it is hard to know whether he is printing a poem because he likes it, because his acquaintances tell him he ought to, or because he went to high school with the poet. But certainly he is beyond good or evil, and stares over his herds of poets like a patriarch, nodding or pointing with a large industrial air.

Anthologies are, ideally, an essential species of criticism. Nothing expresses and exposes your taste so completely—nothing is your taste so nearly—as that vague final treasury of the really best poems that grows in your head all your life, and that finds ambiguous and expedient utterance, if you are an anthologist, in the more "objective" anthology you send your publishers. Your readers will have to infer that taste mainly from the more unusual inclusions and omissions of your anthology. (You may leave out James Whitcomb Riley because you are afraid of being laughed at; but if you leave out Spenser you mean business.) It is a pity that Arnold's touchstones, which as they are remind one of the charm bracelets little girls wear, never evolved into an anthology. Nobody quotes better than Eliot—his quotations and preferences have helped generate two of the better modern anthologies, those of Charles Williams and Michael Roberts; it is a great pity that he has never made an anthology of his own instead of sticking to "Selected Poems." Even a highly idiosyncratic taste can produce charming and valuable anthologies of a more personal sort: imagine the "Moral Treasury" of Yvor Winters! And since anthologies are a part of criticism, there should be anthologies which explain instead of evaluating; which demonstrate, say, the rise and fall of a certain way of looking at the world, by reproducing its most typical, influential, or exaggerated expressions, not merely its most poetically successful ones. But I am talking about rare or non-existent anthologies, not the commercial conveniences one encounters in bookstores.

I am grateful to the editors of "War and the Poet," Richard Eberhart and Selden Rodman (Devin-Adair $3), for two enchanting poems entirely new to me. One, called "The Maudling Soldier, or the Fruits of Warre Is Beggary," is a ballad written with extraordinary humor and command, quite worthy of being recited to the ghost of Falstaff. The other is the poem—the only one extant—of a predecessor of Dante's named Niccolo degli Albizzi. I wish that he had written as many poems as Southey; I am never going to forget the "black yellow smoke-dried visages" of the defeated, starving, and shamefaced troops "stumbling for hunger on their marrow-bones Like barrels rolling, jolting . . . their eyes, like hanged men's, turning the wrong way." He is the only poet I ever read who could have written, "Johnny, I Hardly Knew Ye," for he ends his poem:

Their arms all gone, not even their swords are saved;
And each as silent as a man being shaved.

Otherwise "War and the Poet" is not much. It is thoroughly topical in conception, though it appears, like the P-80, a little late for combat. Its editors have great enthusiasm, moderate sensibility, and little judgment. After reading prefaces that are gushing and eccentric, notes that are random and gossipy, and war poems that are sometimes good, sometimes bad, and sometimes not war poems at all, you know a great deal about the emotions and ideals of the editors, but you have no idea whether either of them can tell a good poem from a bad one. Some of their judgments are hardly normative at all: only chance or necessity could have led them to include obviously bad or mediocre poems by Shaemas O'Sheel or Don Gordon or Kenneth Patchen or Timothy Corseilis or Harry Brown, or such, while they were leaving out "Nineteen Hundred and Nineteen" and Yeats's poems about the Irish civil war; "Willie MacIntosh"; Owen's

"Miners" and "Exposure"; Gregory's poem about the dead of the American Revolution or Tate's poem about the dead of the Civil War; and many more. Often they pick the right poet but the wrong poem: imagine representing Yeats by nothing but "An Irish Airman Foresees His Death"! Imagine picking from the Bible neither the 137th Psalm nor that chorus of wondering exultation over fallen Assyria that begins, "Hell from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming"—and that goes on, "How art thou fallen from Heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" There are good poems in the anthology, but far too few to leaven a lump of its size.

But there is one thing in "War and the Poet" that deserves to be immortal. Its dust-jacket, after condemning politicians, scientists, journalists, and "literary pundits" for their part in the war, concludes: "Only the poets, inspired by a tradition of humanism that brooked no barriers of race or creed, kept faith." Surely this is the most charitable conclusion that anyone anywhere has ever come to.

RANDALL JARRELL

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents

MAURICE EVANS

In His New Production of Shakespeare's

HAMLET

Columbus Circle Thea. B'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
Eves. 8:30. Mts. Thu. & Sat. 2:30

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT

Lyrics by

Made by

DOROTHY FIELDS

DOROTHY FIELDS

SIGMUND ROMBERG

BROADWAY THEATRE

B'way at 53rd St. Mats. & Sat. &
Sun. Eva. Incl. Sun. 2:30 & 8:30

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS"—Nichols, The Times

Rodgers and Hammerstein present

MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA

In JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone Circle 6-4435.
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30 Sharp.

"THE GREATEST OF ALL MUSICAL COMEDIES"—Barnes, Herald Tribune
KERN AND HAMMERSTEIN'S

SHOW BOAT

Musical by JEROME KERN. Books and Lyrics by OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd.

Based on the novel by EDNA FERBER • Staged by HASSARD SHORT.
ZIEGFELD THEA., 54th Street and Sixth Avenue. Cl. 5-3200.
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
88th ST.
near Loc.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
21st ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYON
Coney Island

Queens
Kath's
FLUSHING
Kath's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL

RKO NOW

"LEAVES YOU PUNCH-DRUNK WITH DRAMA"

—N. Y. World-Telegram

"HIGHLY COLORED TALE"—N. Y. Sun

DARRYL F. ZANUCK presents

'LEAVE HER TO HEAVEN'

By BEN AMES WILLIAMS

In TECHNICOLOR

GENE TIERNEY • CORNEL WILDE • JEANNE CRAIN

—Also—

"BE SURE AND SEE IT!"—Walter Winchell

'HITLER LIVES?'

"A MEANINGFUL DRAMA"—PM

DICK POWELL
'CORNERED'

—with—

WALTER SLEZAK • LUTHER ADLER

Story and Adaptation by JOHN WEXLEY

—and—

'MAN ALIVE' PAT O'BRIEN ELLEN DREW

PARAMOUNT presents
VERONICA LAKE SONNY TUFTS

JOAN CAULFIELD

"MISS SUSIE SLAGLE'S"

—with—

BILLY DEWOLFE • RENNY McEVOY

—and—

LILLIAN GISH

A Paramount Picture

NOW PARAMOUNT

—In Person—
DANNY KAYE

MISS

Georgia Gibbs

Tip, Tap & Toe

Bob Chester

AND HIS ORCHESTRA

—Featuring—

Larry Butler

TIMES
SQUARE

The Love Story That Will Live with You
Today . . . Tomorrow . . . and Forever!

International Pictures Presents

CLAUDETTE COLBERT

ORSON WELLES • GEORGE BRENT

—IN—

"TOMORROW IS FOREVER"

Released Thru R.K.O. Productions—Directed by Irving Pichel

Doors Open 9:00 A.M. WINTER GARDEN Broadway at 50th Street

Continuous Performances—Popular Prices

BUY BONDS—TO KEEP

Is the ENGINEER the HOPE of our CIVILIZATION?

Imagine that overnight all our material civilization is destroyed, all the works of man and his written records and even the memories of formulas and techniques; and that in effect we are returned to the stone age. Everything obliterated except in the minds of engineers and scientists their peculiar attitude, their scientific method.

It wouldn't take long as compared to the ages of man for engineers and their like-minded colleagues to regain our technical knowledge and reconstruct our world.

And it might be a differently organized world—a civilization free of wars and panics, poverty and disease. But it would not be if scientific workers again fell under the economic control of less objective thinkers. Remember that the scientific method came late in history. Superstition preceded and held sway over men; and still does in large measure outside the scientific group.

What manner of men are our scientists and engineers? What is their stake in society and their remuneration? How are they organized? And how can they bring to our social, economic and political problems the power and objectivity they have learned to apply to the problems of our physical universe?

You will find some provocative answers to these questions in

THE ENGINEER IN SOCIETY

by
JOHN MILLS

Timely, readable, significant.

At all bookstores after February 28. $2.50

D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc.
230 Fourth Avenue New York 3, N. Y.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

IN SAN FRANCISCO some years ago the late Sidney Howard was fascinated by the performance in a Chinese theater of a play called "Pi-pa-ki." This play, so we are told, has been extremely popular in China for five hundred years, though it was little known except by name in the Western world. After prolonged inquiry Howard located an obscure French translation and made from that an English version which, over a period of years, various producers considered and then gave up. Will Irwin reworked the text, and at last "Lute Song," as it is now called, reaches the Plymouth in an astonishingly prodigal production. There are lyrics by Bernard Hanighen and music by Raymond Scott; there are settings (very fine) by Robert Edmund Jones and costumes by Jones and by Valentina. There is choreography by Yeichi Nimura, and there is, finally, a large cast of excellent performers, including, among others, Mary Martin, McKay Morris, Helen Craig, and Augustin Duncan. Michael Myerberg, the producer, has been so lavish with talent as well as with money that the spectator has some difficulty putting it all together or taking it all in. He is likely to finish the evening more dazzled and bemused than quite sure just what judgment he wants to pronounce upon the whole.

To say merely this is no doubt to say that there is a possible ultimate success which the production does not achieve. But it does not, on the other hand, by any means imply mere failure or anything near it. As a play "Lute Song" is occasionally faintly puzzling, at a few moments a trifle languid, at certain other moments very beautiful and very touching. As spectacle, as movement and color and design, it is always absorbing, sometimes thrilling, even breath-taking. Raymond Scott's incidental music seemed to me to serve its purpose admirably, but his songs, though agreeable in themselves, struck me as not wholly appropriate. One of them, "Mountain High, Valley Low," is quite lovely and another, "Monkey See, Monkey Do," quite charming. But even these, though properly plaintive and without stridency, seem to carry both in the words and in the music a suggestion of the ragtime idiom which does not accord too well with either the text of the play or the atmosphere of the production.

Mary Martin reveals quite unexpected excellence as an actress in the role of the heroine, which is said to have been one of Mei Lang Fang's famous parts. The story concerns the long separation of a devoted bride and her young scholar husband, who is held against his will at the imperial court, and that story as well as the manner in which it is told resembles in a broad general way the very few other ancient Chinese plays I am familiar with. Some of the dramatic devices employed—for instance, recognition first by one alone of the two parties and finally by both—are those familiar also in the ancient classics of the Western world. On the other hand, there is an atmosphere, not of question, but of pity, tolerance, resignation, and ultimate serenity, which is not Greek and which may possibly represent something which can be achieved only by those who have been civilized longer than the Greeks ever had time to be. When one considers also the sly humor and a pseudo-naïve method of storytelling which is obviously beyond rather than not up to realism, one begins to wonder whether the Chinese drama is not in spirit rather closer to "Cymbeline" and "The Winter's Tale" than to any other Occidental drama.

Obviously the text of "Lute Song" has passed through too many hands before reaching the Plymouth for anyone unfamiliar with the original to know how many of its incidental features correspond to equivalents in the play as first written. I have, for instance, no way of knowing whether the almost Gilbertian figure of the imperial preceptor of morals, who unctuously delivers himself of such sentiments as "Life, I have observed, is a sovereign remedy for the disease of optimism," is what the Chinese playwright meant him to be. But even if he is not, I think it easy to see that the original author was a satirist as well as a poet, that there are serene mockeries of tradition as well as serene acceptances of it in his work, and since we are being lavish of comparisons, we may add that he is quite as much in the tradition of Euripides and Molière as he is in that of less protestant playwrights.

However that may be, it still remains true of the present production that the most unequivocally successful part is the visual, and I suspect that the majority of spectators will find the most unforgettable moments to be those of ritual, ceremony, dance, and procession. I assume that the scenery, the costumes, the choreography, and all the rest of it are merely "on Chinese themes," but the whole is molded into a consistent and stunningly effective style. I think that my susceptibility to pageantry is rather less than more than average, but I have seldom or never been more thrilled by anything of the kind than by, for instance, one of the processions in which the crimson-coated guards are followed by the big drum born suspended from poles and sounded by the prancing figures who accompany it. I am sure that Mr. Scott's music contributed a great deal to the effect, and the fact that I was scarcely aware of it as a separate thing is no doubt a tribute to its excellence.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THIS year's water-color and drawing section of the Whitney Annual (through March 13) achieves a higher and more even general level than did the previous oil-painting instalment. Like the English, we have usually managed more successfully to extract the virtues of our defects in the lighter mediums than in oil. But the cost is only too often the absence of emphasis and vigor. The total impression of this show is less sad, it is true; yet it offers almost no occasions for real pleasure. Where the oils sinned by commission, the water colors and drawings do so by omission. And their extreme tepidness seems to furnish but more evidence of the broad-front retreat of American art at the moment.

But perhaps we have here the emergence of a new cultural phenomenon. Perhaps my excessive irritation at the Whitney's oil-painting instalment and the Pepsi-Cola show was misdirected—the result of taking them for something they were not, at bottom, intended to be. As Kurt List, the music critic, says, we may be witnessing the emergence of a new, middle-brow form of popular art that, while it exploits many of the innovations of avant-garde art, lowers their intensity and dilutes their seriousness in order to convert them into something calendar and magazine can digest—as if in answer to a public that is making new and higher demands on the art offered to it. Thus there is, for instance, the increasing practice on the part of commercial firms of having what in popular estimation are high-art artists illustrate their advertisements. (Usually, these painters issue from the fanes of the Associated American Artists gallery, which plays a role as mediator between high art and Kitsch somewhat analogous to that played in literature by the New Yorker and Harper's Bazaar.)

The middle class in this country—though swelled by war prosperity with millions of new recruits who may be no easier to assimilate culturally than the previous 1918-1928 wave—is now surging toward culture under the pressure of anxiety, high taxes, and a shrinking industrial frontier. All this expresses itself in a market demand for cultural goods that are up to date and yet not too hard to consume. Such a demand, supported as it is by so much buying power, inevitably attracts and compels the serious and ambitious artist; he is tempted—most often unconsciously—to meet this demand by softening, sweetening, and simplifying his product. But what distinguishes the present situation is that the artist must not soften and sweeten too obviously, he cannot outrightly vulgarize—for the public still wants something that has the smell of high art.

This state of affairs constitutes a much greater threat to high art than Kitsch itself—which usually keeps the distinctions clear. The demand now is that the distinctions be blurred if not entirely obliterated, that is, that the vulgarization be more subtle and more general. Artists—who in this period have tended to be aggressively anti-intellectual—become reluctant to insist on preserving the distinctions, because the contemporary cultural élite, on whom high art presumably depends, can furnish them with neither intellectual and moral support nor markets. Given the temptations of attention and money, even the best of the artists find it difficult amid the present confusion of standards not to surrender to Mr. Luce or the Associated American Artists.

The future of art and literature will brighten in this country only when a new cultural élite appears with enough money and enough consciousness to counterbalance the pressure of the new mass market. The other alternative is socialism, of course—but right now who talks of socialism in America?

The sculpture instalment of the Whitney Annual, running concurrently with the water-color and drawing exhibit, is another story—perhaps because sculpture is slower to feel the pull and tug of public taste. The sculpture section shows on the whole a great improvement over former years.

CHARLES A. BEARD

calls it:—

"An informing document for all civilized persons now interested, of necessity, in what is called the Jewish problem."

Here are 576 pages of thoughtful, scintillating writing by the elite of the World of Letters.

THE JEWISH FRONTIER ANTHOLOGY

The selected gems of a great journal of thought. Articles by:—

Norman Angell
Dorothy Thompson
Leon Blum Carl J. Friedrich
David Ben Gurion
Justice Robert H. Jackson
Sholom Asch Hayim Greenberg
Jacob J. Weinstein
and many others

"The very highest standard in modern journalism... must appeal to Gentile no less than Jew."

Lewis Mumford
"A bright mirror reflecting the life of a decade." Martin Lowenthal

On sale only by the publisher

Cloth bound, 576 pages
Price—$2.50, postage prepaid
Canada and Foreign, $3

Jewish Frontier, Dept. 1 N
45 E. 17 St., New York 3, N. Y.

JEWISH FRONTIER
Dept. 1-N
45 East 17th Street
New York 3, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

Kindly send me, POSTAGE PREPAID, _____ copies of THE JEWISH FRONTIER ANTHOLOGY. Enclosed is my check for $_____ (at $2.50 a copy; Canada and foreign, $3).

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

Postal Zone _____ State _____

These men agree!

ERIC JOHNSTON President,
U. S. Chamber of Commerce

"Since the labor union is an American institution that is here to stay, it is vital that every citizen understand its structure and function. The Truth About Unions, admittedly a pro-union book, should be read by everyone—management or labor—who seeks to be well-informed on unionism."

PHILIP MURRAY Pres., C.I.O.

Leo Huberman has performed an invaluable service to the labor movement. His book is a simple, clear account of the reason for unions, their structure, their importance in our society. It should be read by every worker in the United States."

ROBERT S. LYND
Prof., Columbia University

"Those of us fortunate enough to know Leo Huberman know him as a hard, clean, all-out fighter for democracy. He knows at first-hand what democracy is, and isn't, inside and outside unions. A book like this is good news for democracy."

THE TRUTH ABOUT UNIONS

by Leo Huberman

Author of The Labor Day Book and Man's Working World

All rights reserved © 1941, 42

PAMPHLET PRESS

An abstract, skeleton-like piece in steel and bronze, "Transition," by Theodore Roszak, whose work has not been shown in public for several years, is the best thing in the entire museum. It expresses almost dramatically the composite character of its material—the tensile strength of steel and the fluidity of bronze—and at the same time conveys speed, directness, draftsmanship. David Smith's "Cockfight—Variation" shows inventiveness and animation, but seems too dispersed when measured, as it must be, against this artist's best examples. In Trajan's polychrome Keen's cement "Birth of Isis" I feel, as in most of this sculptor's work, a very genuine impulse that still fails to realize itself, dissipated in expressionist extravagance.

There is, as always, a great deal of false and cliché-ridden sculpture on hand at the Whitney, but the frequency of interesting pieces this year is surprising. Even work such as Isamu Noguchi's marble "Figure," a piece of contrived effect in inappropriate material, deriving from Picasso's "bone" period, and Martin Craig's "Lilith," coming from somewhere near the same quarter, elicits at least interest and hope. And two relatively academic statues, a bronze Lipschitzian "St. Christopher" by Nathaniel Kaz and a marble "Caress" by Oronzio Maldarelli (both, by some miracle, reproduced in the catalogue), overcome one's instinctive resistance enough to produce a definite pleasure—notwithstanding that the first is disfigured by a double anklet of bronze representing feet in water and the other's polished surface and stylized contours bring it very close to soap sculpture.

David Smith's work, David Hare's recent show, Theodore Roszak's return to activity, Calder's (somewhat undeserved) popularity, other signs—all point to the possible flowering of a new sculpture in America, a sculpture that exploits modern painting and draftsmanship, new industrial methods, and industrial materials. Certainly, of all arts, the new pictorial or constructivist sculpture relates best to American décor, understands it best, and would affect it most directly.

And—to return to the considerations touched on above—the new sculpture is protected as yet from public taste by its very novelty. This makes it rather hard, financially, for the sculptor himself, but he has the large or small satisfaction of knowing that his work will be bought for the right reasons in most cases. It still takes a certain independence of taste to invest in a Smith or a Hare.

Last but not least, the new sculptor has the advantage of working in a virgin medium, one in which even the proper and beginner can—as even gropers and beginners in naturalistic painting did in the fifteenth century—produce permanent works of art. Only a few hints are needed from the masters in Europe: Brancusi, Gonzalez, Gabo, the earlier Lipschitz, Pezner, Giacometti. . . .

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE tendency to archness and cuteness was disturbingly evident in Lotte Lehmann's Town Hall series last year—evident in her choice of songs that were themselves arch and cute, and in her treatment of some that were not. But what went on at the Wolf recital of this year's series—what she did, and the way her audience responded to her every titillation—was something for a stronger stomach than mine. And a song like "Nun wandre, Maria" she spoiled with exaggeratedly pathetic inflections that compelled constant retardations and accelerations in what should have been the steady plodding onward of the piano part. But if the idea of the piano part contributing anything to a song of Wolf or of Schubert beyond the minimum of sound necessary as a basis for her singing ever occurred to Lehmann, it seems to have been rejected by her.

It is admirable of Columbia to issue a recording of Mahler's Fourth Symphony performed by Bruno Walter with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and Desi Halban, soprano (Set 589; $6.50), and thus to make it possible for the public to get to know the lovely work from Walter's extraordinary performance of it. Fortunately, also, Columbia's engineers have achieved their best recording of the Philharmonic so far—one that makes the sound clear, bright, and agreeable.

Victor issued the Casals-Horszowski recording of Beethoven's wonderful Sonata Opus 102 No. 1 for cello and piano a number of years ago, but not the companion recording of Opus 102 No. 2, which Columbia now gives us performed by Piatigorsky and Berkowitz (Set X-258; $2.50). The work is one of those in which there are the first manifestations of the characteristics of Beethoven's last sonatas and quartets. Its first movement is abrupt and concise; the end of its slow movement is mysterious, strange, and remote; its concluding fugue is, for me, as inaccessible as parts of the "Grosse Fuge" and the concluding fugue of the "Hammerklavier" Sonata. The performers do well with the first half of the work; but are ineffective with the mystery and strangeness of the end of the slow movement, and seem to make no more sense of the fugue than I do. But this impression of their playing may be the result of recording which produces an extremely bad sound of the piano with the wide-range Brush pick-up or muffled confusion with the limited-range Astatic Tru-Tan.

On a single (12161-D; $1) are the Overture and Allegro from the Couperin-Milhaud "La Sultane" Suite played by Mitropoulos with the Minneapolis Symphony, which I have compared with the Golschmann-St. Louis Symphony version (Victor 11-8238). Mitropoulos's performance of the beautiful Overture strains and distends for sonority and eloquence, whereas Golschmann's flows easily—with the result that Mitropoulos's breaks the piece, whereas Golschmann's completes it on one side. Then, while the recorded sound of Golschmann's performance is less sharply distinct, it has greater smoothness and refinement; and whereas everything in the Minneapolis performance is equally clear and near, in the St. Louis performance it is correctly placed in space: winds, for example, are heard from the back, strings from the front.

Bartlett and Robertson perform an Elizabethan Suite (Set X-256; $2.50) of arrangements for two pianos of a number of pieces for virginals. Most of the pieces—Byrd's Variations on "John, Come Kisse Me Now," Farnaby's "His Conceit," "A Toye," "Tower Hill Jigge," Tune for Two Virginals, and "His Dreame," Peerson's "Fall of the Leaf," and Bull's "King's Hunting Jigge"—are no more than pleasant listening; but Byrd's wonderful "Earle of Salisbury's Pavan" is also in the volume. The pianists plays them with restraint; and their performances are well-recorded.

"Chopiniana" (Set 598; $3.50) offers orchestral transcriptions by Dimitri Rogal-Lewitzky of Chopin's "Revolutionary" Etude, C minor Nocturne, Mazurka Opus 33 No. 4, posthumous E minor Valse, and Polonaise in A flat, performed by Mitropoulos with the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra. The orchestrations are dreadful (for example, the third section of the Nocturne, with the melody played by violins and glockenspiel); the performances are Mitropoulos atrocities; and they are poorly recorded.

Harl McDonald is one of our most prolific writers of tripe, which his position as manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra enables him to have performed by the orchestra and recorded by whatever company has it under contract; and that is all that needs to be said about his Symphonic Suite "My Country at War" (Set 592; $3.50).

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.

MAKING A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ♦ ♦ 29 LANGUAGES Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

BOTH IN ONE BARGAIN OFFER...

America's Favorite Book

"UP FRONT"

By BILL MAULDIN

with

A NATIONAL LIBERAL NEWSPAPER that takes you behind the headlines for the real story of the strikes, the shortages and the high cost of living. The original $3 edition of a best-seller . . . the wonderful cartoons and the personal story that has warmed and tickled millions . . . it's yours with this combination PM subscription offer.

Clip the coupon below and mail with $6.50 (check or money order, no cash please) and you will receive PM by mail for specified periods with "Up Front" by Mauldin. Send to PM, Box 81, Times Square, New York, N. Y.

This is a New Subscription ☐

Extend My Subscription ☐

Daily and Sunday

Daily Only

Sunday Only

14 Weeks ☐

22 Weeks ☐

52 Weeks ☐

Name
(Please print)

Street

City Zone State

Newsstand price, 5c daily, 10c Sunday. These rates apply only to the U.S.A. and possessions. No mail subscriptions accepted for New York City.
(M-NA)

Crossword Puzzle No. 149

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 High ----- with pen and inks
- 4 Where is he?
- 7 Do not confuse the prophet with anything so transparent
- 9 Third party in the dispute
- 10 Do this to meat, not to words
- 12 A Slav
- 13 In England, a cheap place of amusement
- 15 The outlook is wet, but suits the holiday guest (two words, 3 & 4)
- 17 In short, pens which write like pencils
- 18 Where the warriors never quailed (or if they did they concealed it)
- 19 A poem from P. G. Wodehouse
- 21 His Barber has been called "musical champagne"
- 23 To start the ball; but not the first step in the dance
- 24 An astringent
- 26 Some may be strikingly smart, and others smartly striking
- 28 "-----, stoic Cato, the sententious, Who lent his lady to his friend Hortensius"
- 31 Big guns greet "big guns" with these
- 32 Toppers
- 35 Tell me, what is "lobscouse"?
- 36 The Wild Men of Borneo
- 37 Casket chosen by the Prince of Morocco
- 38 A salty drop
- 39 Wood in which Rosalind bravely wore the breeches
- 40 A half-witted Barnaby

DOWN

- 1 Is this what makes the door stick?
- 2 Spreads by rumor

- 3 Pigeon-holed
- 4 The thought-bound Dane
- 5 "A wave of the ocean, a bird on the ----"
- 6 Free composition
- 7 Author of the Mosaic Law
- 8 Baldhead's nickname?
- 11 Card game, or where it may be played
- 14 A light matter
- 15 An involved argument
- 16 Sir Rupert Murgatroyd employed his leisure in persecuting them
- 19 Black gold
- 20 "A trainband captain --- was he"
- 21 Juno-esque
- 22 When "for cloth of gold you cease to care," up goes the price of this
- 25 We can never grow this
- 27 He accounted for 1,000 Philistines
- 28 Restored to health
- 29 May account for that faint chlorine odor in the air
- 30 Drink you may have cried for
- 33 Mr. Kremlin had only one, and that was wrong
- 34 The port is bespoke
- 35 Outdoor festivity

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 148

ACROSS:—1 DESOLATION; 6 BALL; 10 POPCORN; 11 DIABOLO; 12 SUPERMAN; 13 PROTH; 15 RUSSE; 17 NEOLOGIAN; 19 GODDESSES; 21 ELSIE; 28 LEAVE; 24 AVERSION; 27 ELUSIVE; 28 BUTCHER; 29 YEAR; 30 FOLDED ARMS.

DOWN:—1 DIPS; 2 ST. PAUL'S; 3 LOOSE; 4 TENEMENTS; 5 OLDEN; 7 AMOROSI; 8 LION HUNTER; 9 CALF-LOVE; 14 ART GALLERY; 16 EXEGESIS; 18 OYSTER BED; 20 DRACULA; 22 SMOTHER; 24 ALEDO; 25 SATID; 26 ARTS.

The NATION

RESORTS

Vacation Time Never Ends at

The Oaks

Pack your troubles away and come out a lively caper... at THE OAKS... the merry, year 'round vacation resort... only 50 miles from New York. Spend a vacation you'll long remember. For Fun, Frolic and Fine Food are the order of the day at this charming country estate.

Make Reservations NOW

ELBERON LONG BRANCH
NEW JERSEY 2433

INVITATION TO RELAX

Enjoy the scenery of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, roaring fireplace, delicious food—and fun. Only 55 miles from New York. MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY

plum point
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
Hill Windser, N.Y. Tel. Newburgh 4270

Shangri-La Farm

Welcomes you for the Spring and Summer Season. Accommodations for 10 at this lovely modern home. Enjoy beautiful countryside, delicious food and complete rest.

Rifton, N. Y., near Kingston Tel. Rosendale 2475.

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 502-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Wind-inn Mountain Trails, Ski Tow, 700-foot Ski Slope. Delicious food. Easy transportation

Attractive Winter Rates
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone, Tannersville 290

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR Newburgh 4477
Delightful...skating on private lake. Open fireplace.
Different...the colonial atmosphere.
Delicious...our unexcelled cuisine.
Dancing...recordings for listening & dancing.
All this only 55 miles from New York City
A Resort for Adults Only

SUMMER RENTALS

COTTAGES summer, modern improvements. Lakewood Farm, Roscoe, N. Y. 70-acre private lake, elevation 2,400 feet. 114 miles George Washington Bridge. Brooklyn telephone NAvarre 8-5273.

COUNTRY HOUSE, 53 acres in Susquehanna County, Pa., for someone who requires quiet surroundings. Set 100 feet back among pine, maple and oak trees. Horse, cow. Gas light for comfortable reading, fireplaces, stone cellar, storm doors and windows. Write Box 1756 c/o The Nation.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

FOR SALE: 100 acres; 7-room stone cottage, fireplace; view; pines. Electricity available. Exceptional bargain to close estate. Asking $7,500. Terms. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, New York.

WANTED

PENNSYLVANIA LIBERALS! Help elect the next Governor of Pennsylvania. Defeat the reactionary political interests. Write P. O. Box 636, Reading, Pa.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 2, 1946

NUMBER 9

The Shape of Things

FRANCO'S EXECUTION OF CHRISTINO GARCIA and nine other Spanish Republican leaders who had fought with the Maquis against the Nazis represents a challenge to the democratic powers which they will ignore at their peril. In France, where the nature of that challenge is better understood than here or in Britain, the news produced a tremendous outburst of popular indignation. For the second time the Constituent Assembly voted for a diplomatic break with Spain, all parties, except for a minor rightist group, enthusiastically supporting the motion. Hitherto the continuance of relations has been excused on the ground that it made possible French intervention in behalf of Republican prisoners. The execution of the ten, however, in disregard of the repeated pleas of the French ambassador in Madrid, indicates the futility of the diplomatic approach. More than that, it appears as deliberate provocation of the French government, based on the assumption that France will not receive the support of Britain and the United States in any move against Spain. We hope this assumption proves ill founded. It ought to be clear by now that Franco is not perturbed by verbal spankings. Only a complete rupture of relations will sterilize this focus of fascist infection.

✱

WE HOPE FRANCIS CARDINAL SPELLMAN enjoys the rare distinction he conferred on himself by being the only one of the new cardinals from a non-fascist country to attend the state dinner given at the Franco embassy at Rome. The dinner was otherwise notable for the number of those who failed to attend. Of the thirty-two new cardinals, only seven showed up: the two Spaniards, the two Portuguese, the Vatican's Tedeschini, Spellman, and Antonio Cardinal Caggiano of Argentina. The other three new United States cardinals—Glennon of St. Louis, Mooney of Detroit, and Strich of Chicago—stayed away, as did James Cardinal McGuigan of Toronto. It is worth noting that, except for Tedeschini and the Iberians, none of the new European cardinals attended. Spellman's presence and the mild sensation it caused helped obscure an affair which constitutes a rather extraordinary rebuff for the Franco regime from Catholic quarters. The new Brazilian, Chilean, Peruvian, and Cuban cardinals, by absenting themselves, showed a political discretion Spellman would do well to emulate. The United States government, as he knows, is about to issue a Blue Book showing how closely Franco worked with the Axis during the war. But Spellman not only paid the Spanish dictator the honor of attending his strikingly unsuccessful little party in Rome but plans to be his guest in Madrid on his way home. The New York cardinal makes his debut, knee-deep in anti-democratic politics.

✱

OUTBREAK OF CIVIL WAR IN MANCHURIA at a moment when the final solution of the Chinese political crisis seemed imminent is a serious matter. Manchuria is the one area in the world where American and Russian interests obviously overlap. For reasons none too clear at this distance, the United States has committed itself to transporting Kuomintang troops into Manchuria, while the Russians are obstructing Chungking's efforts to consolidate its rule even though they have formally recognized its supremacy in the region. If Russia desires, it can put up a strong case, based upon historic, strategic, and economic considerations, for special rights in Manchuria. The Yalta agreement and the subsequent Sino-Soviet pact recognized these claims by granting it half interest in the Chinese Eastern and South Manchurian railways together with a naval base at Port Arthur and a free port in Dairen. Whether Russia has claimed under this agreement half interest in the Japanese industries controlled by the South Manchurian railway is uncertain. It might have some legal basis for such a claim, but the moral basis is dubious. China's claim to these industries, on the other hand, rests on the prior Cairo document which clearly stated that all of Manchuria was to be restored to China. Russia can scarcely deny, moreover, that it failed to withdraw its troops by February 1. The Moscow agreement commits both Russia and the United States to a prompt removal of their forces, but if peace is to be restored this action should be preceded by an extension of the Kuomintang-Communist agreement to cover Manchuria.

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	245
The Fruits of Suspicion	247
India: Eleventh Hour	248
Ballot Without Bullets by Freda Kirchwey	249

ARTICLES

The Sins of American Liberals
Kingsley Martin vs. Max Lerner	250
India's Passage to Freedom by Alice Thorner	253
German Casualties: New Evidence by Saul K. Padover	255
Atoms Won't Wait by Louis N. Ridenour	256
Bread, Bills, and Bevinism by Aylmer Vallance	258
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	261
The People's Front by Del Vayo	262

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

New Georgia A Poem by Randall Jarrell	263
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	263
The Anglo-American Paradox by Stuart Chase	264
Briefer Comment	266
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	269
Films by James Agee	269
Music by B. H. Haggin	270

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 271

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 150

by Jack Barrett	272
------------------------	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:

Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellom Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental European Publicists, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Librarians: The Nation is Indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

THE WAR RECORD OF WESTBROOK PEGLER clearly qualifies him for his current role of veterans' adviser. True, he was not in uniform, but as a civilian he did a powerful job for national morale. His approach was subtle. To win the right-thinking people to the war effort, he had to attack the Commander-in-Chief and Mrs. Roosevelt. To help speed production he hammered away at the villainy of labor leaders. Lest the joint war effort endanger our post-war preeminence, he issued repeated warnings against internationalist and Communist trends in the administrative policy. His current attack on Charles Bolté and the American Veterans' Committee of which he is chairman is simply a continuation of Pegler's wartime mission. For AVC shows dangerous New Deal tendencies and there's a Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., on its planning committee. AVC takes a reasonable stand on labor issues. AVC is an active agitator for such elementary rights as jobs and decent houses. And AVC doesn't entirely endorse the American Legion. Pegler dislikes such doctrine; ergo, it must be Communist! Embarrassingly enough for Pegler, Communists don't like AVC either and have come out for the Legion. Pegler to the right of them, the Daily Worker to the left of them. Perhaps, after all, that's where American veterans who believe in the best of American democracy belong.

✱

THE WELL-GUARDED HALLS OF MONTEZUMA, long sheltered from the din of demobilization protest by a cagy Marine Corps discharge system and an iron Marine Corps discipline, have finally been invaded by an initial and nasty "incident." In Honolulu six NCO's were broken to private, and three of them brigged, for sponsoring a cable of protest to President Truman and others. Their petition—signed with 150 names—was a calm and discreet document, a model of tact among the many shriller outbursts current. It stated that marines have no information on demobilization policy, get no credit for service since V-J Day, and are under orders not to hold protest meetings. The merits of their first complaints may be debatable: the corps has been less concerned with policy than it has with practice, and its discharge record has not been bad. But there can be little debate over their third complaint or the action taken against them. This is the first publicized post-war occasion of a service flatly denying its men the right to get together and gripe—even denying a group of them the right of petition. As such it sets a bitter peace-time precedent. A marine spokesman explained that "a petition is regarded the same as an assembly, which was forbidden last month by General Geiger." The AVC, one of the recipients of the treasonable cable, has espoused the cause of the six marines; Mr. Pegler will no doubt find further evidence of Communist leanings in this defense of such an alien doctrine as the right of assembly.

BY THE TIME THIS ISSUE OF THE NATION appears on the stands, transportation in the city of New York may be crippled by a subway strike. The issue arises from the demand of the Transport Workers' Union that it be recognized as sole collective bargaining agent for subway workers. The T. W. U. is willing to submit to an election to determine its claim to represent the majority of these workers. Mayor O'Dwyer, buttressed by an opinion from the city's corporation counsel, John J. Bennett, refuses—as LaGuardia did before him—to recognize the T. W. U. as sole bargaining agent. The Nation believes that employees of a business operated by a governmental agency have the same rights of collective bargaining as any other workers. If Seattle, Boston, and other cities can bargain collectively with a transport union, so can New York. That Bennett advises otherwise is not surprising; his training and bias are on the employer side of the fence. An ideal and easy solution would be to apply the principles of the Railway Labor Act to New York City transit, protecting the public against strikes except as a last resort and after mediation, and at the same time giving transit labor the same rights enjoyed by railway labor. That Mayor O'Dwyer prefers a showdown to a compromise of this kind does not speak well for a public official who owes his job to labor support and calls himself a progressive.

✱

ONE OF THE FINEST PROGRESSIVE SCHOOLS in the country, the Horace Mann-Lincoln School in New York City, has been sentenced to death by its parent, Teachers College. This Roman verdict has been given without regard to the fact that the school was never more flourishing. It has a splendid faculty, a capacity registration, a long waiting list, the enthusiastic support of parents, and an operating deficit twice covered by income from funds originally donated for its maintenance by the General Education Board. The administration of Teachers College, however, professes to fear that the school might become too heavy a financial responsibility in the event of a new depression; in addition, it desires to use the funds for experimental projects inside the public schools. Since these projects have only been outlined in the most general terms it is impossible to pass judgment on their probable value. The beneficial influence on teaching methods throughout the country of the work that the Horace Mann-Lincoln School has been doing for many years is, on the other hand, a matter of record. That so valuable an institution should be cut off in its prime seems incredible; or, perhaps we should say, would seem so if the administration of Dean William F. Russell at Teachers College, as James Wechsler wrote in The Nation of December 17, 1938, had not long been notable for "two continuing elements—internal autocracy and pandering to external conservative elements."

The Fruits of Suspicion

A FEW days after a pillar of fire had ushered in the atomic age President Truman remarked to the world in an offhand way that of course the atom bomb would remain exclusively ours. Political and scientific innocents took this observation for granted, as though a discovery that could blow the world apart was naturally to be regarded in the same light as a slightly improved howitzer. But everyone else knew that we had neither the moral right to exclusive control of a weapon that meant life or death to other nations nor the power to monopolize it even if we had the right.

To the Russians in particular, long nurtured on suspicion and generating it in turn, the Truman view made no sense. They were no more prepared to subject their future to the atomic power of the United States than we would be to throw ourselves on the mercy of the Kremlin. Viewed from this perspective, their attempt to pry loose some of the secrets of the bomb's manufacture is understandable. Were the situation reversed, such efforts by American agents would be defended from every sounding-board in the country as the highest kind of patriotism.

By the same nationalistic standards, Canada has every right and duty to prosecute its own citizens for selling or giving secret information to Soviet agents. One need not take seriously Russia's defensive and self-righteous protest that the whole affair is an elaborate plot in "retaliation for all the annoyance caused by the Soviet delegates to [Prime Minister Mackenzie] King's friends" in the United Nations Assembly. The Canadian informers must be more than creatures of a conspiratorial imagination, since the Russians themselves admit not only that "individual collaborators" did in fact turn over certain information to the Soviet military attaché, but that the Soviet government viewed the matter seriously enough to recall the attaché "in view of the inadmissibility of the activities of these collaborators." Canada, be it noted, made no attempt to round up Russian agents but confined itself to arresting its own nationals. Would the Soviet government have done less? The question is purely rhetorical.

What emerges, then, from this bitter episode, given the national approach to control of the atom bomb, is that the Russians were right in attempting to spy out its secrets, that the Canadians were right in trying to frustrate the Russians, that suspicion and fear are fast freezing into a fixed hostility, and that the whole insane progression toward an atomic war threatens to become as inevitable as the spinning out of a Greek tragedy.

It is for President Truman and Congress to decide whether the national approach is worth that price. They can break the cycle of suspicion, defense, and retaliation by placing the atomic-bomb formula in the hands of the United Nations Security Council, with the proviso that its manufacture by any member state be forever outlawed and a requisite system of inspections established. But the time for this act of supreme statesmanship is running out. Once the Russians have acquired or developed the knowledge for themselves, it will be too late. We may be frantically eager then to bury the horror in the vaults of the UNO, but the Russians may be less enthusiastic about surrendering their hard-won prize. They will know then that we are doing out of fear what we lacked the vision to do when we had the strength.

India: Eleventh Hour

THE decision of the British government to send three senior Cabinet Ministers to India is an impressive gesture, but at this late hour gestures, unless accompanied by positive steps for meeting Indian demands for independence, are useless and even dangerous. For the land to which the mission is going is a land seething with unrest and threatened by disastrous famine. Strikes, riots, and most recently a naval mutiny are signs of a mounting tension. Not many more sparks of this kind are needed to set off the whole powder keg.

Unfortunately, in the face of this situation, the British government does not appear to have selected the strongest possible team for its Indian mission. Lord Pethick-Lawrence, the septuagenarian Secretary for India who is to lead it, is a worthy but rather dull parliamentary veteran whose mental arteries have long since hardened. He is noted chiefly as a financial authority, and his only qualification for his job appears to have been his membership of the Round Table Conference in 1931, which paved the way for the last instalment of Indian reform. A. V. Alexander is a leader of the cooperative movement who has gone nautical. He is serving his third tour of duty as First Lord of the Admiralty, that is, civilian head of the navy, whose mannerisms and, we fear, prejudices he has thoroughly assimilated. The third member is Sir Stafford Cripps, still to some extent under the cloud of the failure of his previous mission to India in 1942. That failure was partly due to the nature of his instructions from Mr. Churchill, but his own character may have been a contributing factor. With all his great qualities, Cripps combines a Wilsonian inflexibility—a definite handicap in delicate negotiations.

What is the British policy which will inspire this mission? In essence it does not seem to have changed since 1942. Then the British government announced that it stood for a completely self-governing union of India with dominion status optional, the right of non-accession to the Union secured to dissentient units, a constitution drawn up by a specially created body representing all Indian interests. Or as Prime Minister Attlee said in the House of Commons when announcing the mission, "It is our intention to set up machinery in agreement with the Indians whereby the Indian people themselves will decide their destinies."

There does not appear to be an unbridgeable gap between this prescription and Nehru's demands as formulated in an interview reported on page 253. But the "right of non-accession" may be an obstacle to building that bridge as it has been in the past. For the official organ of the Moslem League, while offering cooperation to the British mission, has declared that the Moslems will never "surrender their right to autonomous, sovereign homelands in the Northwest and Northeast Provinces." Mr. Jinnah, the leader of the League, has stated in recent interviews that the principle of separation between Moslem India and Hindu India must be conceded prior to any discussion of constitutions. Despite Jinnah's threats of revolt if this demand is refused, we think the British representatives should make it clear that the right of secession is a question for Indians to settle themselves and must therefore be discussed in an all-India Constituent Assembly.

It must be recognized that the result might be a boycott of negotiations by the Moslem League and a new deadlock. Nehru, however, has suggested that this difficulty could be overcome if the British agreed to negotiate, not with a committee made up of the different party leaders, but with a conference composed of representatives of the Provincial Assemblies, which, despite the narrow franchise, are the most popularly elected bodies in the country. Such a plan might prove feasible provided Jinnah fails of his ambition to capture at least three of the eleven provincial legislatures in the elections now in progress.

The Moslem-Hindu schism is perhaps the biggest lion in the path of Indian independence, but there are others almost as formidable. Little has been heard lately about the problem of fitting the "independent" princely states—some six hundred of them—into a free, united, and, we hope, democratic, India. The semi-feudal rulers of these states, whose privileges are protected by treaties with the British crown, expect to be represented in any constitution-making body by their own nominees. Leaders of the All-India Congress take the stand that delegates from these states should be elected by the people inhabiting them. Unless the British recognize that the very existence of these states is an anachronism, even though a few of them have been modernized, and take measures to modify their treaty rights, the princes can wreck all negotiations simply by sitting tight.

Whatever concessions Britain makes, it cannot hope to liquidate its centuries-old imperial adventure in India and leave everyone content with the new era. It cannot afford to wait until a smooth transition to independence can be made. For that would postpone action indefinitely, and one thing we can be sure of—the longer the birth of Indian freedom is held back, the greater the turmoil with which it will be ushered into the world.

Ballot Without Bullets

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

Buenos Aires, February 24

AS I write, the polls are closing throughout Argentina; the nation's most critical election has ended. All day I have toured through the streets of the capital and the industrial suburb of Avellaneda, one of Perón's chief strongholds. I must have passed a hundred polling places. I used my military pass to go inside one of them and watch the voting. Nowhere did I see a hint of disorder. The army guarded the streets and the polls. Soldiers, rifles unlimbered and bayonets fixed, were stationed everywhere. The police were on hand too, but the army's electoral command was in full control. Long queues of voters stretched along the block outside of each polling place. They were calm, sober, business-like. At Radical Party headquarters, reports were coming in from other districts. They were all the same—quiet, no signs of coercion.

To all outward appearance, these have been free elections—at least as free as elections can be after years of intimidation and police control. The fact is astonishing enough to demand explanation.

Credit must go first of all to the people. The Democratic Union, slow to get under way, hampered by the state of siege and the provocations of Perón's strong-arm squads, developed immense strength as the campaign went on, so much strength that its victory seemed certain if the elections were free. Until recently, few expected free elections. The army had guaranteed them, but the people did not trust the army. Why should they? They knew that while Perón's support among the officers had diminished owing to intrigues and conflicts within the clique, he could still count on a strong following there. The army had done nothing since June, 1943, to inspire confidence in its democratic intentions; it had been a faithful instrument of dictatorship deeply imbued with Nazism.

But within the last couple of months the attitude and behavior of the army have begun to change. Even high officers of known Nazi sympathies like von der Becke, who has charge of the elections, reiterated their intention to guard the balloting. Democrats with whom I have talked attribute this change to a variety of causes, chiefly to professional pride. The prestige of the military had sunk so low among the people that many officers left off their uniforms when they went into the streets. Meanwhile the future of Perón became more ambiguous; the nation's position both in the pan-American regional set-up and in the UNO was obviously deteriorating; the Blue Book drove home the point that any regime headed by Perón would be fatally compromised by his proved Nazi connections and his fascist methods. For these reasons, apparently, the controlling elements in the army decided to live up to their commitment to guard the elections. Cynics believe that the commitment was made when it seemed certain that Perón could walk into office in spite of ostensibly clean elections—through his demagogic appeal to the masses, his use of public funds, propaganda, the effective machine built up in the Department of Labor and Social Welfare, and above all through constant intimidation and violence. They believe that by the time the Democratic Union developed its full strength it was too late for the army to back down on its promise.

This may be true or partly true. It is certain that the power of the democratic people of Argentina, fully awakened to the meaning of the choice confronting them, aroused as never before to their duty as free men and women, was the greatest single factor in forcing a fascist government and army to allow a free election.

This much they have won; whether they have also won the election will not be known certainly for several weeks, although some indication of the result may be available within five or six days. Most of the democratic leaders believe that victory is certain. Many also believe that Perón is finished, that he cannot risk an attempt to seize power in the face of the army's attitude and the democratic triumph, but skeptics are not ready to count their chickens so soon. They argue that the record of the army in Argentine politics offers no reason to believe in its permanent conversion to constitutional practices. They feel even more certain that Perón and his clique will not accept defeat and obligingly disappear without a fight. The Perón machine is an instrument of force. He did not build his military police and arm his rowdies in order to hand over power to a democratic elected government. So they argue, speculating whether he will move as soon as he sees how the vote is swinging or whether he will hold off hoping for the disintegration of the Democratic Union and a new chance to seize power. The worst contingency any of them can imagine is Perón's election. Few believe this possible in view of today's peaceful balloting, but the chance is there. The election of Dutra in Brazil was almost as unexpected. The result of an apparently legal victory for Perón would be disastrous for the anti-fascist forces in Argentina. Its international effect would be even worse. At the very least it would mean a bad defeat for the democratic inter-American policy supported by Mr. Braden.

The Sins of American Liberals

Letter to an American Liberal

[The following letter by the editor of the New Statesman and Nation (London) appeared in that weekly on January 19. The Nation asked Mr. Lerner to reply in its pages.]

DEAR MAX LERNER: I enjoyed your article in PM on General Morgan. I usually enjoy your writing, and on this occasion you fairly let yourself go. It must have been fun to compare the General with Goebbels and to represent him as a Yahoo who regretted that Hitler had not succeeded in exterminating all the Jews. It so happens, as this journal said last week, that the General was guilty of indiscretion, not of Yahooism or anti-Semitism. How did so experienced a journalist as yourself come to make so violent an outburst on the basis of ambiguous phrases quoted out of their context? Surely you cannot have become one of those American liberals who join forces with Colonel McCormick whenever there is a chance of putting Britain in the dock.

Please understand that, this outburst aside, I have no quarrel with you or PM, which is an outstanding example of a good paper fighting for good causes against long odds. You yourself have fought valiantly on the right side; you did your best to persuade Americans that it was "later than they thought." Nor do you stand alone among American liberals. I recognize friends and allies every week in the New Republic and Nation. But some of the tendencies of American liberalism are disturbing. American criticism seems to me oddly subjective, as if it arose less from the facts criticized than from some internal conflict. There is still a strong Puritan strain in the United States. Perhaps the effect of living in so much comfort in a world so near starvation is to generate a sense of guilt, coupled with a fear of the wrath to come. And then, I cannot help thinking that the collapse of Germany and Japan has left you without an external object of vituperation. The devil has his uses, and those who are not prepared to fit the U. S. S. R. into the diabolic role find the British Empire the most satisfying substitute.

Let me pursue the example of Palestine. After the last war the British, partly for reasons of strategic interest and partly from genuinely humanitarian motives, offered the Jews a national home in Palestine. They were attacked for imperialism in doing so, just as they are attacked now for imperialism because they don't suddenly promise to put several million Jews into an Arab country in less than no time. I think the British might have done more to fulfil their promise if they had taken a more definite line at an earlier stage, but American attacks seem really to ignore the existence of the Arabs altogether. It would have been better, in my view, if the Jews had been content to leaven the cultures of other nations, where they have always played a most distinguished role. However, I well understand why they want a home of their own, and why, after the unique tragedy of the last years, with only a remnant saved from Hitler's slaughter-houses, you are impatient to see them in a land which is not associated with these terrible events. I agree with you that many of them find little hospitality in Europe, mainly, I think, because the Nazis have disposed of all their property to other people, many of whom paid for it in the legal way and naturally do not want to give it up.

But do you know how many of these unfortunate survivors of a tortured race really want to go to Palestine? Is this small and disputed country surrounded by enemies really attractive to most European Jews? I don't know. I am hoping that the Anglo-American Commission will tell me. The only definite statement I've seen is that many of them would prefer to stay in Europe if we can design tolerable conditions for them there, while the majority of those who want to emigrate would prefer America to Palestine.

Whatever happens in Palestine, the number of Jews who can go there is limited, and I can't help wondering why you do not advocate that some of the Jewish refugees who arrive in the crowded and hungry British zone should be taken over by the Americans, whose zone is little devastated and comparatively well fed. And why should not many of them emigrate to the United States, if only on the German quota, which I presume has not been taken up during the war? You could write a magnificent article demanding the right of Jewish entry into America—which flows with milk and honey, even if it is not the original Promised Land.

Such a suggestion, which seems so obvious to us, must come from American rather than British pens. It might savor of criticism, and the British are too polite to criticize America. We know that Americans—for some reason that it would be worth while to analyze at length on another occasion—assume that it is good for the British to be attacked in unmeasured terms, while British "interference in American business" is said only to do harm, worsening relations and making things more difficult for American reformers. That puts a very considerable responsibility upon you. A socialist like yourself, Max, knows that America is not in fact streamlined in chromium from Hollywood to Fifth Avenue, but is a nation with poverty (I've seen your share-croppers literally starving in Arkansas and Mississippi) as great as any in Poland or Hungary; you know that to millions in the United States freedom means freedom to be unemployed; that the racialism you rightly condemn in its most extreme form in Nazi Germany, as you do in its milder forms in the British Empire, is the accepted basis of society throughout your Southern states. American liberals love writing articles about this effete little island, which in fact fought Germany for a year by itself; they do not even dare to tell the American public that British casualties in the war were higher—not relatively, but positively—than those of America, which has three times our population.

You know all these things and you understand clearly enough the conflicts inside the United States. Are you not a bit out of date in bothering so much about British imperialism, which is in retreat even in India, Greece, and Indonesia? What about your own racialism? And if you are really worried about imperialism, let me call your attention to the aspirations of some of your own generals and your business tycoons.

By all means preach to us in your spare time; to do so is always the privilege of those who have bomb-proof pulpits. But I am not sure, if you once get to work on your own complex problems, that you will have much leisure left over for preaching about ours. We built our Labor Party during a period of British imperialism because socialists were no longer content to be a mere adjunct of the Liberal Party. But except in two states an American socialist still has to choose between voting Democrat or Republican. Will this choice content you in the Presidential election at the end of Mr. Truman's term? How far will you be able to defend your liberties if American business decides that the best way out of its present economic mess is to beat the imperial drum and maintain a huge program of national armaments and a policy of foreign adventure? I know today America is rushing back to civilian life and free enterprise; but the contrast between strikes and labor crises today and booming profits during the period of war-time discipline carries a lesson that may not be lost on American capitalists. If they fail in their present trial of strength with the C. I. O., some of them may get round to the notion that an American Duce could make trains run on time.

These are only questions thrown out to you across the Atlantic; but they do need answering. For I cannot avoid the conclusion, as I read the violent diatribes of American liberals against Britain, that they are born less of knowledge of British sins than of a sense of frustration in your own country, of uneasiness about its future, and of guilt about its share of responsibility for the world's misery.

KINGSLEY MARTIN

Answer to a British Laborite

DEAR KINGSLEY MARTIN: What strikes me hardest about your letter is the curiously nationalist level on which it is written. I know you are a socialist, but in this instance you do not write as one. You write rather as an Englishman writing to an American—quick to resent any criticism of British policy on Palestine, defensive about the Empire, insistent that the British be given credit for their war losses, caustic about the "bomb-proof" position of the Americans, invidious in comparing the internal problems and positions of the British Labor Party and of American liberals, to the decided disadvantage of the latter. It is a mote-and-beam letter you have written me. I do not take it personally. If I read it aright, it is directed less to me than to American liberals as a group, uncohesive though we are. My piece on General Morgan merely touched off an ammunition charge which had evidently been accumulating for some time in your mind. But what troubles me in your letter, as it troubles me in the fiery speeches of your Foreign Secretary, is that you should dwell so much on patriotic resentment when the deep maladies of our time require a socialist analysis and humanist outlook.

Let me start with some simple questions of humanism, and then go on to the more complex questions of socialism.

The General Morgan incident was of importance partly because it lit up for a brief revealing moment not only the tragic plight of the Jews but the corrosion of the democratic conscience. Try to remember what the past two decades should have taught us about how fragile is the heritage of human decency and how thin the veneer that separates us from the beast crouching in the jungle of the human instincts. That is the central lesson of the fascist adventure, a terrifying lesson that goes beyond Germany and the Germans. Seven million Jews were killed in Europe, under conditions that underline the great moral fact of our time—the atomizing of the human conscience, the deadening of human sensibilities. Try to see the Morgan incident within this context. You say that General Morgan was "guilty of indiscretion." This can only mean that he spoke the truth but was tactless about it. I welcome the truth, and I don't care about the discretion: in fact, I recoil from the notion that this is anything to be discreet about.

I agreed with the General about the Jews wanting to get out of Europe, but I asked whether the desire to get away from what is a cemetery of their people was a crime to be charged against them. I agreed that others were helping them, but I asked whether it was not Goebbelsesque to call their help a "secret Jewish force" and a "world conspiracy." And when the General was quoted as saying—I have seen none of these phrases denied—that the Jewish refugees were the "hard core" that contained the "seeds of the third world war," I saw in his words an ironic reversal by which the pitiful remnants of Hitler's victims had become not the accusers at the bar but the accused in the dock. And in this reversal I found—and still find—that atomizing of the democratic conscience that can only lead to Yahooism.

We had cherished some hopes that on the question of Palestine the British Colonial Office was not speaking the mind of the non-office-holding members of the Labor Party like yourself, but your letter dashes those hopes. You speak scornfully of putting "several million Jews into an Arab country in less than no time." Doesn't that beg the question of the historical claims of the Jews and the legal commitments to them? And wasn't the issue a matter not of several million Jewish immigrants but of a hundred thousand to start with? And is it fair to say "less than no time," considering the long successive delays over immigration? You ask why the Jews of Europe are not "content to leaven the cultures of other nations." Surely you will not disagree that they are economically excluded from the Eastern Europe which was their home, and that any leavening they would do there from now on would be with their blood and their humiliation.

You ask whether they "really want to go to Palestine," whether it is "really attractive to them." The most recent testimony we have is from Bartley Crum, an American member of the Joint Inquiry Commission, who has seen these people and reports not only that they are almost unanimous in wanting to go to Palestine but also that they are on the point of mass suicide. You ask why I do not write an article "demanding the right of Jewish entry into America." The answer is that I did exactly that—a week before I wrote on General Morgan—in a PM piece called Shall America Be a Closed Country? And in another piece three weeks before that, called Cant, I attacked our Congressmen for complaining of British policy in Palestine when "not a single one of these champions of the despised and rejected has dared suggest in Congress that the gates of America should be opened to new mass immigration."

I say all this only to get the record straight. Any argument about whether American racism—toward both Jews and Negroes—is worse than British imperialism, or vice versa, is a fruitless argument, and for socialists it comes close to being infantile. For myself I write not as an American or a Jew but as a democrat and socialist who cares more deeply about the strengthening of human decency and integrity than about anything else in the twelve corners of the world. It is these human values that are at stake, Kingsley—not just Jewish hopes or Arab resistance or British power or the American sense of guilt.

When it comes to the question of working for a socialist democracy, we in America are in many respects the pupils of your British Labor movement. If we believe that there are "two nations" in England, we have the massive authority of Disraeli to back us up; and we know there are also two nations in America. This knowledge is what should cement us to you in a common struggle. We have uniformly made the distinction that the Labor writers have taught us to make in their pamphlets—K. Zilliacus, for example, in foreign policy and Aneurin Bevan in domestic—between the acts of the Tory rulers in the past and the deepest wishes of the British common people.

We have admired and supported the people of Great Britain, as against their ruling class, from the beginning of the world crisis. I am sorry that you should speak of my "bomb-proof pulpit," and complain that we do not tell the American people about British casualty lists. The American liberals supported the cause of the British people from the war's beginning, not out of any Anglo-philism but because we knew their cause was mankind's as well. If we now attack the foreign policy of the British government, it is not out of any Anglophobia, or even—though I hate to spoil your psychiatric probings—out of a sense of our own guilt, but because that foreign policy deserves attack for humanist reasons. And if I read the Parliamentary reports correctly, and also the New Statesman and the London Tribune, there are members of your own party who attack it in the same strain. What was reactionary policy when practiced by Churchill and Eden does not become, by some curious alchemy, socialist policy when practiced by Attlee and Bevin.

But I would give a false picture of my views if I dwelt on this phase at any length. I think the American liberals try to see the whole British picture in perspective. We regard with envy the starts you are making in nationalizing the mines and electric power, and in housing and social security. We know something about the economic losses you have suffered, as well as the loss in lives, and the difficulty of your economic position. We have given every energy to overcoming Congressional opposition to the pending loan, and from the beginning we asked that its terms be more generous. I say this not out of defensiveness or a desire to make a conspicuous display of virtue, but again to set the record straight on how the vast majority of American liberals feel.

It is not preaching, however, to make a sharp analysis of the conditions of socialist success. Neither the Labor Party in England nor the New Dealers in the United States have thus far been successful in achieving a democratic socialism. If you are closer to the goal than we, you are approaching it under a heavier burden. We have to cope with the tenacity of capitalist power and with an outworn party set-up. But you have the terrible burden of somehow trying to equate the retention of a colonial empire with a socialist society. We in America believe you must make the choice between colonialism and socialism: we do not believe that the two are compatible. And we are dismayed when, in your efforts to hold on to imperial power—in Palestine, Indonesia, India—you not only endanger your socialism but come very close to betraying the simplest human values. I don't pretend that the fight is an easy one: it is easy neither in England nor in America. But in the struggle for a socialist democracy, as in everything else, to acknowledge the mistakes and face the tests is the beginning of wisdom.

MAX LERNER

India's Passage to Freedom

BY ALICE THORNER

During the war analyst of Indian affairs in the Foreign Broadcast Intelligence Service, Federal Communications Commission

New Delhi, January 19

THE issue in India today is no longer one of interim arrangements and war-time expedients. Indians want a final settlement that will put an end to British rule, and they want it now. Yesterday, in a special interview for The Nation, I asked Jawaharlal Nehru, who has been preaching this doctrine to enthusiastic multitudes the length and breadth of the country, just how the Indian National Congress proposes to achieve independence.

The background for his answer is found in the bitter history of the past three and a half years, beginning with the leaderless, incoherent uprising of August, 1942. At the very time when popular forces all over the world were gathering in the great tide that finally crushed fascism, India's national leaders were in jail and its people sunk in apathy. The failure of the Simla conference last June completed the disillusionment of the newly released Congress leaders about achieving any satisfactory agreement with the government without a display of strength. Simla also embittered them against the Moslem League, whose demand for a politically autonomous Moslem homeland they vehemently rejected. In September the All-India Congress Committee revived "Quit India" as a fighting slogan. Since then the Congress has been busy mending its political fences with a view to a showdown with both the government and the league in the provincial elections. By April, when the balloting will be completed, Congress confidently expects to have received an overwhelming popular mandate as the chosen instrument of India's deliverance.

The league has similarly concentrated its energies on the coming poll with the aim of proving that India's 100,000,000 Moslems will be satisfied with nothing less than partition. Already it is clear that the vision of an independent Pakistan, comprising three provinces in the northwest and two in the northeast, has won the support of a considerable section of the Moslems. Thus the contention between the two great parties can be reduced to whether there shall be one or two free Indias.

Food shortage, land rents, debt reduction, labor strikes, unemployment, economic planning, caste barriers, civil liberties, simply do not exist as election issues. Non-violence, although again confirmed by the Congress Working Committee last month, is alien to the temper of the times. Congress leaders nourish anti-government feelings on memories of the ruthless stamping out of the 1942 agitation. Congress election rallies thrill to glowing accounts of the "Indian National Army" which Subhas Chandra Bose, a former Congress president, organized in Japanese-held Malaya with the avowed purpose of driving the British out of India. Mahatma Gandhi's spiritual prestige is today overshadowed by Vallabhbhai Patel's grip on the Congress machine, Sarat Bose's control of his brother's old stronghold of Bengal, and Jawaharlal Nehru's unmatched popularity.

This week in Delhi crowds are besieging the house where the Congress high command confers on election strategy, hoping to catch a glimpse of Jawaharlal. Everywhere is a feeling that after the stalemate of the war years the Indian people are again on the move. Outlining his program for the transfer of power, Nehru said:

In essence the Indian problem is simple. Britain must decide on the recognition of India as an independent country, and on a freely elected Constituent Assembly having full authority to frame her constitution. Once this is done, the rest becomes fairly easy, although no doubt many hurdles will have to be got over.

He was particularly concerned to avoid a repetition of the deadlock which wrecked the Simla conference, when the Congress and the league were unable to agree on what constituted legitimate Moslem representation:

The easiest and fairest way to proceed is not to deal with parties as such, or with religious or other groupings, but with the provincial legislatures after they are elected. It is unfortunate that their franchise is a limited one. Nevertheless, we shall have something which does represent the people.

What subjects, I asked, should be referred to these provincial assemblies, and how could they be consulted?

The first two questions that will arise immediately after the elections will be the convoking of a Constituent Assembly and the formation of a new central government to function as a "caretaker" until the new constitution comes into effect. In the solution of both of these problems the newly elected provincial legislatures should have the dominant voice.

The eleven legislatures, he explained, could select delegates from among their members to form a preliminary conference. This might possibly develop into the constitution-making body, and would in any case lay the ground for it.

Would the Moslems agree to take part in such a conference? Nehru's reply was that Congress would spare no effort to assure them a fair voice in the proceedings. The delegates from the provincial legislatures, he suggested, could well be elected by the proportional system to allow minority groups full representation. Or, if they preferred, the Moslem members of the legislatures could get together and elect their own delegates. Nehru thought it very unlikely that any provincial legislature as a whole would refuse to cooperate. He explained that Congress, as either the majority party or the largest single party, expected to form ministries in eight of the provinces; there would probably be coalition governments in the other three. If a Moslem League ministry came to power in one province and would not join with the others, he imagined it would be possible to go ahead without that province and see what would happen later on.

I asked him about the recent statement of Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel that Pakistan could be achieved only through a civil war. Nehru answered:

No question arises of any civil conflict. It is already agreed that the largest possible autonomy should be given to the constituent units of the federation. Ultimately if any particular area wants to walk out, it can do so, provided it clearly expresses its decision on a specific proposal. But if any attempt is made to force areas to remain outside the federation against their will, as Mr. Jinnah suggests [Nehru refers here to Hindu and Sikh populations within the borders of the provinces claimed for Pakistan], then inevitably there will be conflict.

It must be remembered that there can be no absolute self-determination anywhere. There are some overriding considerations, such as those of defense, which cannot be ignored. This is especially important in view of the situation developing in the Middle East.

He predicted that when Moslems were faced with the actual economic and political problems involved in separating predominantly Moslem areas from the Indian state, they would lose their present enthusiasm for Pakistan.

What, I asked, would be your criterion of the good faith of Britain in the course of these preliminaries?

The Labor government [he replied], if it is at all sincere, should recognize the Constituent Assembly as having final authority. If it is treated merely as a consultative body, then nothing gets going at all

Pandit Nehru was also anxious to make clear to American readers the importance of Asia in all world calculations and the key place of Indian independence in the stability of Asia:

Asia is likely to play a far greater role in the future than in the past few hundred years. If there should be, unfortunately, another world war, Asia is likely to be a bigger center of it than Europe. In any consideration of war or peace in Asia, India is crucial both for the Middle East and for Southeast Asia. I have little doubt that if India had been given an opportunity to cooperate in the war as a free country, the struggle might have ended a year or two earlier and millions of lives might have been saved. If India gains its independence soon, far-reaching changes will follow in the Middle East and Southeast Asia, and new and peaceful groupings will develop in certain present-day danger spots.

Although Nehru contends that there is no final solution for the world except a federation of free nations, his attitude toward the UNO is wait and see. He raised questions about the recent policies of Britain and Russia and had a warning for the United States:

The events in Indonesia have been bitterly resented all over Asia and especially in India because Indian troops have been used there. What is happening in Iran has also disturbed people here. I recently referred to the United States as to some extent underwriting the British Empire. I did not mean that American policy as a whole was committed in that direction, but there were certainly some trends which I considered dangerous. I can well understand how in the world context today America wants to help Britain in many ways. That is necessary and desirable. But the point is that there must be a distinction between helping Britain and helping the British Empire. To do the latter is really to weaken Britain in the long run as well as those who support her. And the long run is likely to be a short run.

The essence of Nehru's belief is that a strong, free India is indispensable to the peace of the world. He calls upon Britain in its own best interests to hand over the reins of power to whomever the Indian people choose as their representatives. He maintains that once the principle of independence is granted, Moslem demands can be settled within the framework of the Congress program. He hinges his whole formula on British willingness to leave final decisions on all constitutional matters to an elected Constituent Assembly. In effect he has stated the terms on which the Congress will undertake to insure a peaceful transition period. Whether the program he outlines can succeed will depend on the relative bargaining power of the Congress, the league, and the government at the close of the elections, the intensity of the desire for Pakistan, and the extent of an aroused people's patience with protracted constitutional procedures. The next few months will show whether India's passage to freedom can be a smooth one.

German Casualties: New Evidence

BY SAUL K. PADOVER

Historian and political scientist; during the war a member of the Psychological Warfare Division

GERMANY, said a famous German general whom I interviewed at the time of the Nazi collapse, "is through as a military power. We have lost at least five million men and we shall not be able to recover. We are kaput."

The General had been the chief propagandist of the Wehrmacht, and I wondered whether his statement was not the beginning of a new propaganda line. I recalled that when peace came in 1918 many people were convinced that Germany could not easily recoup its terrible losses in man-power. Almost three million Germans had died for the Kaiser, and nearly twice as many more had been disabled. Yet twenty years later, when Germans who were boys then had grown up, the Reich furnished Hitler a mightier army than it had Wilhelm.

Today as in 1918 German sympathizers, not necessarily Nazis, are saying that the fantastic number of men killed in this war has permanently crippled the Reich, and that we need no longer fear its military might. The argument obviously depends upon the number of casualties suffered by Germany in World War II. What are the facts?

No reliable official figures of German losses exist. To the best of my knowledge, even the Allied governments have only estimates, not accurate data. The Nazi leaders undoubtedly knew the truth, but they kept it to themselves. Casualties were published for the purposes of political propaganda. In the latter part of the war Hitler exaggerated them in order to incite the German people to their utmost efforts. In effect, he said: You have already made such a colossal investment in blood that you cannot back out now; millions of men have died and more must be sacrificed in order that it shall not have been in vain.

This explains why such wild statements about German losses are current today. Two months before his end, Hitler told the people that the Reich had suffered 12,500,000 casualties, of which number half were killed. Just before the surrender Berlin raised the figure to 16,000,000—3,500,000 in one month—6,000,000 of them killed. Astronomical figures were also circulated by the Russians, who for their own political reasons made gigantic claims concerning the number of Germans they had slaughtered. These imaginary statistics spread through the world, reaching new heights with each retelling. Recently, for instance, a Swiss periodical, the Nation, reported that Germany had lost no fewer than 8,500,000 in killed and 6,300,000 in wounded. If this were true, it would mean that around 40 per cent of all Germany's males, including male babies, boys, youths, middle-aged men, and old men, were dead or disabled—a preposterous assumption, as everybody who visits Germany can perceive.

To arrive at an approximation of the truth, a colleague and I investigated the matter experimentally in a number of German towns. The conclusion we came to was that German losses in this war were not so great as in World War I. Our experiments were of course limited and therefore liable to error, but here is the evidence we turned up. The figures are at least honest and precise, not estimates colored by politics.

In considering how to attack the problem, I recalled the ingenious techniques employed by historians to obtain light on population, wealth, and trade in the ages before public records were kept. One of their methods was to consult the church records of births and burials. I decided to search out the number of German casualties in the same way.

The first town we chose as a sample was Breinig, near Aachen. It was a typical small town of three thousand inhabitants, and fortunately its church records were intact. The parish priest cooperated gladly. He explained that the community was nearly 100 per cent Catholic and that the people worked in factories and on farms. There was no great wealth and no great poverty. The most important thing for our purpose was that the priest had kept a complete record of all the men of Breinig who had fallen in battle. His "Liber Mortuorum" was a thick, meticulously kept volume which contained in Latin the names, ages, and parentage of all his parishioners who had died. With his help we made a list of the casualties.

The record covered exactly five years of war, from September, 1939, to September, 1944. During this period 600 men of Breinig were taken into the German armed forces. Of these, the priest said, "an enormous number were wounded," twenty were missing (many of them probably as prisoners in Russia; with no Red Cross contact between Germany and the Soviet Union, no reports of prisoners were received), and sixty-four were killed. If we assumed that half the missing were dead, the number of killed became seventy-four, or 2½ per cent of the town's population.

The Breinig record also gave interesting information on where and when the men were killed. An eloquent story of Germany's war fortunes could be read between the lines of the "Liber Mortuorum." For the first two years of the war, until Hitler's invasion of Russia, Breinig had only three men killed, one of them at sea. This checks with the larger picture; the Germans seized Poland, overran the Low Countries, and crushed France with a minimum of cost to themselves. It was only after Hitler slashed at the Soviet Union that the curve of losses began to mount sharply. About three-fourths of all the dead of the Breinig parish were listed as killed on the Russian front.

The next town we visited was Bardenberg, which had a population of 4,100. Like Breinig, its inhabitants were Catholic factory and farm workers. Records kept by the church were not so complete as in Breinig, but the priest was able to fill in some of the gaps from memory and by inquiry among his parishioners. Between September, 1939, and September, 1944, Bardenberg lost 90 men killed—2.2 per cent of the population, compared to Breinig's 2.5 per cent. The difference may be accounted for by the gaps in the Bardenberg record. The majority of the men of Bardenberg also fell in Russia.

Two other towns yielded similar percentages. In Fischeln, near Krefeld, where the deputy mayor kept the town records, we learned that 200 men had been killed out of a population of 9,000. Fischeln, too, was a Catholic community with a small-business and working-class population. Here the percentage was 2.2 per cent, the same as in Bardenberg. In World War I, Fischeln's dead had numbered 252, and the population had not changed. The fourth town, Frecheln, a Rhineland community of 16,000, lost 400 men, or 2.5 per cent of the population.

If we assume that this percentage is typical of the country as a whole, and apply it to the German population of roughly 75,000,000, we get 1,875,000 as the number of German killed. My figures, however, cover only the first five years of the war, up to September, 1944. Between October, 1944, and May, 1945, the Allies probably killed another 500,000 Germans, which gives a total of 2,375,000. If to this we add the 500,000 civilians who, according to the United States bombing survey, lost their lives in Allied air raids, the grand total is 2,875,000.

I am presenting these figures with the warning that they are based upon limited records. But I believe that in the absence of reliable statistics they deserve consideration. If the Germans lost less than three million men, the war, in terms of human life, was for them a cheap one. They had directly or indirectly caused the death of an estimated twenty to twenty-five million human beings in Europe. They had also subjected most of Europe to dangerous undernourishment while they themselves remained reasonably well fed. Biologically, therefore, the Germans cannot be said to have lost the war.

Atoms Won't Wait

BY LOUIS N. RIDENOUR

Professor of Physics, University of Pennsylvania; during the war expert consultant to the Secretary of War and member of the Radar Committee of the Combined Chiefs of Staff

THE two billion dollars spent on the atomic bomb gave us more than a weapon of unparalleled effectiveness. They gave us a new power technology, which may become revolutionary but cannot be fully exploited now because operation of an atomic power plant involves the manufacture of atomic explosives on the side. These explosives can be separated from the uranium fueling the power plant and used for atomic bombs if bombs are wanted. A nation's total installed atomic horse-power measures its capacity for making atomic bombs; experts say the change-over time would be short. In this difficult situation the United States is awaiting the development of enforceable safeguards against the improper use of atomic energy before revealing the important features of its atomic technology. Although this policy will inevitably delay the development of atomic power, there is little disagreement about its wisdom.

Unfortunately, the veil of secrecy which it has been decided shall continue to cover much of the war-time work of the Manhattan Engineer District is being extended to cover it all. This rule seems unnecessarily sweeping. Secrecy about the medical knowledge gained in the atomic-bomb project cannot possibly be considered desirable. Yet though the great nuclear chain-reacting piles at Hanford, Washington, are ceaselessly producing radioactive substances of tremendous importance to clinical medicine and medical research, the many hospitals, universities, and industries which have applied to the army for radioactive material have so far been consistently refused. Let us examine the technical background of the question.

Fifty years ago this month Henri Becquerel launched the science of radioactivity in a paper read before the Academy of Science in Paris. He reported his observation that compounds of uranium emit rays which can affect a photographic plate, even through materials opaque to ordinary light. Only three months earlier Roentgen had announced his discovery of X-rays. Early workers in radioactivity and X-rays often suffered fatal burns because the serious effect of these rays on living tissue was not understood. Means were later developed for the measurement and exact control of radiation dosage, and safety standards were established. An overdose of radiation is now rare.

Intensities of radiation produced in the work on the atomic bomb were fantastically higher than any ever produced before. Much of the radiation consisted of neutrons, which were first discovered in 1932 and whose physiological effects had been investigated only in a preliminary way before the war. Sharp attention was paid to health problems raised by these intensities. In addition to radiation hazards, the medical experts had to deal with the danger of ingestion or inhalation of the various radioactive or toxic materials handled, many of which were substances not occurring in nature and possessing unknown properties. An enormous amount of work has been done on these and other problems. The results, and their extension by every qualified research agency, are clearly of the greatest possible importance to a world entering its atomic age. Yet the only official summary of them available is that contained in Professor Smyth's report. Quoted in its entirety, it runs, "Extensive and valuable results were obtained."

Even before the work on the atomic-bomb project we had been able to add to the forty or so different kinds of radioactive atoms occurring in nature some three hundred new kinds. By the end of 1939 every one of the chemical elements was represented by at least one type of radioactive atom. These new types were created in the course of the atomic transmutations that men were learning to cause and control.

The great practical importance of these radioactive specimens of the common chemical elements arises from our ability to use the sensitive techniques of radioactivity research to detect extremely small quantities of them. By mixing a tiny quantity of radioactive iron with a sample of ordinary iron we can tag the sample for future identification. No matter what complicated chemical or physical changes may occur in it, the tagged sample can always be surely recognized by its radioactivity.

The value of such a tag can be illustrated by its use in a typical investigation. The problem was to find a preservative for whole blood which would permit it to be stored for some time before use. The donors of the blood to be treated with the preservative under test were fed small quantities of an iron compound containing radioactively tagged iron; their red cells took up some of this iron and were thus themselves tagged. After the transfusion a small blood sample was taken from the patient. The red cells from the stored blood could be identified by their radioactivity, and their number was a precise indication of the effectiveness of the preservative.

Similar techniques are valuable in other fields—in physics, chemistry, botany, metallurgy. To exploit them, we must have artificial radioactive elements. These can be and are being made by the bombardment of suitable targets in a cyclotron. But only small quantities of radioactive material can be made in this way, and all but a few of the working cyclotrons in the country are in the hands of the Manhattan District. The greatest source of most of the known types of radioactive atoms are the huge piles now producing atomic explosives. Some radioactive atoms occur as the atomic fragments resulting from the fission of uranium—the process which keeps the piles running—and are thus true by-products. Others can be made by inserting targets of suitable material into the piles, where an intense neutron bombardment changes stable atoms of the target into radioactive ones. The piles can produce radioactive examples of some elements whose intensity of radiation rivals that of all the refined radium in the world. Artificial radio-elements can be used as a substitute for radium or X-rays in therapy and in medical and industrial radiography. But these radioactive by-products are now being stored underground and allowed to decay, and targets are not being inserted into the piles for any purpose except to further the army's investigations.

Until three months ago the army was perfectly justified in refusing to arrange for the equitable distribution of radioactive by-products to competent and worthy research agencies. It expected to be promptly relieved of the entire problem by the passage of the May-Johnson atomic-energy bill, which provided for the appointment by the President of an Atomic Energy Commission with plenary powers; the army did not wish to circumscribe these powers by previous policy decisions. However, widespread objection to certain features of the bill made it clear that proper legislation on so complicated and vital a subject demanded much more consideration than it had been given. Accordingly, a special Committee on Atomic Energy was set up under Senator McMahon to hear testimony and to "report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date by bill or otherwise" on matters relating to the development, use, and control of atomic energy. Pending the passage by Congress of a law governing these matters, the army is still the proprietor of the atom.

Since no atomic legislation is likely to be passed in the near future, it would seem desirable for the army to act now on matters about which a future commission could hardly have a different opinion. The most urgently needed steps are the immediate clearance of all the project's medical and biological work and the distribution of artificial radio-elements to the proper agencies. The latter could be arranged by selecting a responsible organization, say, the National Academy of Sciences, to receive and coordinate requests for such material and report its recommendations to the army. It is now six months since the explosion over Hiroshima—and high time for a realistic appraisal of the degree of secrecy we actually need to preserve.

Bread, Bills, and Bevinism

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

The Nation's London correspondent

London, February 11

IF ONE accepts G. K. Chesterton's poetic version of British social history, in 1649—when a king lost his head—"a few men talked of freedom, while England talked of ale." In these days of 1946 England's leading conversational subject is not the problem of supposedly liberated Europe and Asia but dried eggs. Their abrupt removal from the nation's diet, coupled with the halving of the meager lard ration and reversion to war-time "high-extraction" flour for bread, has come as a hard psychological blow to the public, particularly since there is an uneasy feeling that we have not yet seen the full extent of this renewed enforcement of austerity. The Tory press, delighted with the chance to canalize popular resentment against a Labor government, is doing its best to build up an atmosphere of political crisis, with talk of back-bench revolts and ministerial failures. This is a gross distortion of realities: the British housewife and her husband find the food cuts a bitter pill, but they are swallowing it philosophically, in the knowledge that, so far as cereals and fats are concerned, it is a question of over-all scarcity in an interdependent world, and that Britain is still better off than most European countries.

Criticism of the government on this issue will center in two points. Why were Parliament and public left so unprepared for decisions which the Cabinet must have foreseen long before Sir Ben Smith's Christmas visit to Washington? And why were the Ministers of Agriculture and Labor so slow to adjust their departmental strategy in accordance with their Food colleague's appreciation of coming needs? There is an uncomfortable impression of faulty staff work, imperfect collaboration, and a Micawberish clinging to hopes of something "turning up." The present stoppage of imports of dried eggs was evidently determined on last September on the supposition—hardly warranted by the Washington Combined Food Board's crop estimates—that poultry feed in 1946 would be more plentiful here. But far from reinsuring against grain scarcity, the Minister of Agriculture, by cutting the 1946 wheat subsidy from $16 to $8 an acre, allowed farmers to put much land back to "roots" and grazing; and only last month the Minister of Labor announced the prospective call-up of 8,000 young agricultural workers for the services. This lunatic misdirection of man-power has now been hurriedly canceled, use of much more German prisoner-of-war labor on the land is planned, and larger wheat subsidies are likely to be enacted in haste. It is late in the day, however, to expect farmers to change their spring-sowing plans, and war-time bread means fewer millers' waste products for feed. Making due allowance for the recent worsening of the world crop outlook through drought in India and South Africa, the government will not find it easy to answer the charge that it either was caught napping or has been guilty of the cardinal sin of not taking the public into its confidence soon enough.

Meanwhile, if the loss of those dried eggs leaves a bad gap in the family menu, the Parliamentary plate is piled high. Coal nationalization, comprehensive social insurance, investment control, housing subsidies, and the repeal of the 1927 Trade Disputes Act—all these measures have been launched on their legislative voyage since the House reassembled three weeks ago; and hard on their heels are bills to establish a national health service and to deal with "development value" of land. The government should have little difficulty in pressing forward its heavy program apace. The Opposition—with Churchill sketching the Miami water front and marketing his great, once "secret," war speeches to Mr. Luce—is sensationally ineffective; and so far as domestic legislation is concerned, the snipers of the left wing are unlikely to use obstructively the license to speak and vote freely which was accorded by last month's revision of party-standing orders.

In briefest terms—for this congeries of bills is too overwhelming to review in detail—Mr. Shinwell will get what is really a blank check to finance and organize a New Deal in the coal mines. In committee the mine owners' Tory spokesmen will haggle over the elaborate details of compensation: they hate the idea of payment in non-marketable government bonds, and they will fight the inclusion of the profitable coke ovens and by-product plants in the assets to be taken over by the state. But in the case of coal the battle for private ownership has been lost; shots from the retreating Tory rear guard will be perfunctory. They will reserve their fire for the one-clause bill repealing the 1927 Trade Disputes Act. This bill's passage, which they dare not use their majority in the House of Lords to prevent, will restore the right of civil servants to belong to unions in the T. U. C., will replace "contracting-in" by "contracting-out" as the basis of collecting contributions to unions' political funds, and will make a general strike as legal (or illegal? It was never judicially settled) as it was in 1926. Here, the Tories will proclaim, is the threat of red ruin. In truth there is a bare chance that some unions may allocate their increased political funds to the Communist Party, but save for nervous old ladies and retired colonels in Bournemouth nobody is going to get excited over the removal of pains and penalties attaching to this or that form of strike. If conditions ever recur here which lead to a general strike being declared by our constitutional-minded T. U. C., there will be a revolutionary situation in which acts of Parliament are "scraps of paper."

Needless to repeat, British Labor today is not thinking in terms of revolutions; it is thinking of social security à la Beveridge and of housing. Aneurin Bevan has introduced a bill providing a minimum subsidy of $88 a year for working-class dwellings built by local authorities. This should enable municipalities to go ahead quickly with their building schemes, which are still in many areas hanging fire, and it will bring rentals down to a manageable figure. But for every 100,000 houses built it will mean an annual cost of $8,000,000 to the Exchequer and of $2,500,000 to the local ratepayers. By this time next year, when the subsidy is to be reviewed, Bevan will have to get the present inflated costs of building down substantially, or the ultimate financial burden of the whole national program of 4,000,000 new houses, including the expense of necessary slum clearances, will be staggering.

Future cost figures, too, are a debatable element in the National Insurance bill which Mr. Griffiths is piloting smoothly through its first stages. So far as its basic principles are concerned, the measure is practically non-controversial and derives, except in minor points, from Coalition agreement. The contributions are going to make a sizable hole in wage packets, but the benefits, in unemployment, sickness, and old age, are good value. From the left there may be criticism that for unemployment, in contrast to sickness, the principle of the hated means test attached to "extended benefit" is not wholly discarded, though it is not to be applied in the immediate future. The Opposition's line will be to stress the rising cost of the scheme to the Exchequer through the prospective growth of expenditure on the $6.50 weekly pensions in an aging population. In thirty years' time the insurance account, notwithstanding a yearly contribution by the Exchequer of over $900,000,000, will be "in the red" to the extent annually of $1,800,000,000, which the taxpayer will have to find; and this takes no account of the coming cost to the Exchequer of children's allowances and the national medical service.

The scheme which Aneurin Bevan has devised for this service has not yet been presented to Parliament, but its outlines are pretty well known. Hospitals, except those attached to universities as teaching centers, will be nationalized under the control of regional boards; local authorities will be required to promote public health centers where all will enjoy free medical treatment from a pool of state-salaried doctors; doctors who prefer to go on working from their own surgeries will draw official salaries for their "public" work—that is, attendance, gratis, on nationally insured patients—but will be allowed to have private fee-paying patients, if they can find any when practically the whole population is entitled to free doctoring. This is an odd, typically British transition from professional private enterprise to étatisme, but it may work—provided always that the state salaries are liberal and sufficiently up-graded in poor industrial districts to correct the present tendency of doctors to settle, naturally enough, in well-to-do districts.

To complete this legislative tour d'horizon, there is also the Investment Control bill—not a very constructive measure. As forecast in this correspondence, it perpetuates in the main the "negative" restrictions on new issues of share capital exercised during the war by the Treasury. The Chancellor will have power to guarantee interest and principal on "development" loans up to a maximum of $200,000,000 a year. This is an innovation, but the sum is clearly inadequate to offset capitalist underinvestment in a slump. We are still a long way from having a National Investment Board as the main provider of new capital. Labor back-benchers were disappointed by the bill, but it has to be recognized that so long as such a big sector of the national economy is in the hands of private enterprise, the provision of capital exclusively by a public board would be illogical and difficult to work.

All in all, it is fair to say that the government's legislative program is regarded by its supporters both in Parliament and in the constituencies as a satisfying installment of pledges fulfilled. The increased Labor majority at the Preston by-election points to general public approval of domestic policy. It is in respect to foreign policy that there is increasing bewilderment and dismay. Concern was loudly voiced from Labor back benches last week when the Foreign Office selected Cadogan and Peterson for the United Nations' headquarters and the Moscow embassy. There is a widespread feeling that we are maintaining as our diplomatic agents in a score of capitals the type of man who is temperamentally and by training quite unfitted to speak for a British Labor movement or to gauge realities in the post-war world. But these criticisms are only a reflection of general labor uneasiness over Bevinism in the approach to foreign affairs.

Your correspondent would plead with readers of The Nation to be fair in their judgment of the British Foreign Secretary. He was utterly sincere when he told his party last summer that he thought of foreign policy in terms of the economic needs of the common man. That is still his real way of thinking, and during this session of the Assembly in London he worked hard to get the UNO to turn its attention from diplomatic sparring over sovereignties and prestige to the practical issues of food scarcity and the repairing of a shattered world economy. He can hardly be blamed for "standing up for his rights" against Vishinsky in the unedifying squabble over Greece. Having decided, as well they might, to raise the Greek issue as a tu quoque retort to British criticism of their "interference" in Iran, the Russians spoiled their case and played into Bevin's hands by asking the Security Council to convict Britain of planning deliberately to use Greece as a base for warlike operations. The real case against British policy in Greece—that we have in fact aborted a revolution and temporarily buttressed in power a reactionary, chauvinistic minority—never had to be answered. Bevin got, in effect though not in form, the "not guilty" verdict he wanted.

This, however, settles nothing—least of all the future of Anglo-Russian relations either across the stricken body of Germany or in the tangle of Middle East tensions. The real count against Ernest Bevin is that he is losing sight of the economic needs of the common man in his passionate determination that Britain shall take the lead in selling the world social democracy in competition with the Soviet version of socialism. Pursuit of that aim is leading him far in the gentle art of making enemies—by "toughness" toward the governments of Yugoslavia, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, and Poland ("I look forward to the end of these police states" will be long remembered) and by clinging to the continuity of Churchillian policy in Athens, to say nothing of Indonesia. And it is getting him involved with queer friends—monarchists in Greece, General Anders and his émigré Polish army in Italy, the discredited ragtag and bobtail of underground oppositions in Central Europe, all dreaming of a third, anti-Bolshevik, world war under the flag of the Vatican.

There is still hope that Bevin will see where his attitude is taking him. In any case, he and his Cabinet colleagues are likely to be brought sharply up against the hard facts which stand in the way of Palmerstonian policies when they meet trade-union executives at a conference on man-power schedules in early March. The unions will emphasize that if domestic reconstruction and vitally needed exports are not to be crippled by the shortage of labor, Britain's armed forces must be reduced from their present 3,000,000 to something like the pre-war figure of 500,000. The cost of foreign commitments must be cut according to the cloth available; and Foreign Secretary Bevin, be it noted, is also still chairman of the Cabinet's man-power committee.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Distributive Justice

IN ONE of the most striking passages of his statement to the House Banking and Currency Committee on February 18, Chester Bowles said: "Let me say at the outset that there is probably far more fairness of income distribution in our economy today than at any previous point in our peacetime history. Let me say further that if we strive now to work out all the unfairnesses which remain we shall only succeed in blowing up our entire anti-inflation program with resulting disaster to everybody."

Mr. Bowles went on to substantiate these remarks by examining in detail the position of the various producer groups. Labor, he pointed out, had suffered a sharp decline since V-J Day in take-home pay, and "it is take-home pay that buys the groceries and pays the rent." In most cases the new wage increases do not fully compensate for that setback and certainly do not give "a new advantage to labor. . . . They are designed rather to maintain something approaching the balance we had in war time." As for business, said Mr. Bowles, only a fraction of industry was seriously disturbed by reconversion difficulties, and with an unlimited demand for goods the outlook was very bright. He noted as significant the maintenance of dividends in the fourth quarter of 1945 at the same level they reached in the fourth quarter of 1944 and the fact that managerial salaries have suffered no cut-backs. The farmers also have fully held their war-time gains in the past six months. Contrary to expectations, there has been no falling off in the demand for farm products, prices have risen rather than declined, and allowing for seasonal adjustments, farm cash income in December was 2 per cent higher than in August.

All this seemed to me a well-reasoned and convincing plea for sharing the income pie as equitably as possible. Naively perhaps, I was therefore somewhat shocked to find the Wall Street Journal bursting with editorial indignation at Mr. Bowles's concern about a fair distribution of income. Snatching from its context the first of the two sentences I have quoted above, the paper commented: "Here, we think, is the story of Mr. Bowles and price control. He seems to conceive it is its function to operate so that income distribution will meet his ideas of fairness. . . . Mr. Bowles is chattering the language of the cult that wants to clamp on the country a managed economy and to distribute income according to its own preconceived pattern of justice. In other words, it is not price control from which the economy suffers; it is the attempt to use price control to reshape the social system."

Any unprejudiced reader of Mr. Bowles's words would agree, I think, that they afford not the slightest evidence to support the charge that he is out to change the social system. On the contrary, since his whole emphasis is on stability and balance, he appears to be seeking to save the social system from the strains that would be put upon it were the pattern of distribution to be violently disturbed, rewarding some groups in the community while penalizing others. It is the Wall Street Journal, the National Association of Manufacturers, et al. who are the real revolutionaries. They want to sweep away all controls; they want prices to be determined by what the traffic can bear; they want to cash in on the greatest sellers' market in history.

Of course they don't put it so baldly. They say that the way to bring about a balance between supply and demand, and so to restrain inflationary pressures, is to lift the controls that thwart the burning desire of industry to produce. Abolish price ceilings, they urge, give business the stimulus of increased profits, and goods will pour into the market. True, the cost of living will rise, but in the long run competition will correct the situation.

If the supply-demand situation were perfectly elastic, so that each rise in price of a commodity acted both to increase its supply and to cut off a further segment of demand, this argument would have greater validity. But such a situation exists only in old-fashioned textbooks on economics; in real life there is always some "friction" to prevent this smooth working of the market mechanism, and today that friction is a very potent factor. For one thing there is a world shortage of many commodities the supply of which cannot be rapidly enlarged no matter how high prices are raised. On the demand side, too, high prices may well prove a very inefficient brake on consumption. There is in this country a huge reserve of liquid assets in the hands of individuals; so that potential purchasing power is far greater than current income. Rising prices would cause some people to draw on their savings in order to maintain their standard of living. Others, alarmed at the declining value of their savings in terms of goods, would rush to buy whatever they could lay hands on regardless of cost.

The result would be that accumulated war-time reserves, which might play so important a part in stabilizing the future economy, would be largely transferred to those who owned the supply of goods and could exact scarcity prices for them. Eventually, of course, demand would be checked, not because consumers were satiated but because they had exhausted their ability to buy. Then there would be an appearance of abundance; plenty of butter in the stores, perhaps at $3 a pound, but none on the bread of millions. At this stage we would expect prices to begin to fall, but since falling prices discouraged production, employment would decline also. Factories would shut down, profits would be diminished, but business, particularly big business, would not be seriously harmed, for it knows how to reap a harvest from scarcity of jobs as well as scarcity of goods. It would have its liquid funds accumulated during the inflation, and as the depression deepened and prices collapsed, it would have the satisfaction of knowing that the purchasing power of those funds was being steadily enhanced.

This is the situation which Mr. Bowles is seeking to prevent, and business men who can see farther than next year's balance sheet would be wise to help him. For if they take the short view, if they insist on grabbing while the grabbing is good, if they join the editorial sages of Wall Street in crying, "To hell with distributive justice," they may find retributive justice awaiting them at the bottom of a not too distant depression.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

Paris, February 21

BEFORE we landed in France the passenger list of the S. S. Argentina had given us some advance indication of the kind of Europe we were going to find. With the tourist season on the Atlantic not yet open, there was scarcely a person aboard who was not traveling on a special mission: members of relief organizations who had already been in Austria, Poland, and the Balkans and told frightful stories of the misery they had seen there; Allied officials, more alert to the danger of a fascist revival than I had expected but with no idea of what to do about it; diplomats exchanging choice bits of international gossip; French business men angrily berating their government for too much Socialist planning and for not allowing them to invest all their dollar assets in private—and profitable—commercial ventures.

But the travelers who captured my imagination were two young Latin Americans, a writer and a painter, bound for Paris. They awakened in me memories of the day when, just out of college in Spain, I too had set out for the intellectual center of the universe. Throughout the war I had stubbornly maintained that, despite reports to the contrary, Europe was far from finished and would still astonish the world by its revolutionary, creative capacities; now I found the enthusiasm of these young artists refreshing and encouraging. Perhaps they were not as familiar with the actual situation in Europe as some of the others aboard who had all sorts of data at their fingertips about the food shortage, the lack of transport, the increase in infant mortality, the spread of crime and vice. But they had a deeper and, I believe, a truer insight into the Europe that is emerging out of the great disaster.

The first paper I bought in Le Havre headlined the results of the Belgian elections. Though the Christian Socialists won 93 of the 202 seats in the new Chamber of Deputies, the Socialists and Communists together still outnumbered them. The Communists registered a considerable gain, nearly tripling the representation they had in the 1939 Chamber. But it is not by number alone that the Belgian elections must be judged. Actually they mark a strengthening of the left's position against the return of King Leopold; moreover, it is almost certain that out of the present ministerial crisis will come a government again based on collaboration between Socialists and Communists with a popular mandate to continue the policy of nationalization begun by the Cabinet of the Socialist ex-Premier, Achille van Acker.

In Paris the future status of the press is the subject of heated discussion these days. The omission of the traditional phrase, "the freedom of the press is guaranteed," from the draft for the new constitution's chapter on the rights of man provoked furious debate, but not a single voice was raised openly in defense of the old 1939 concept of a free press. The right is attempting very subtly to sabotage the Constituent Assembly's efforts to end the scandal of pre-war years when the big dailies, in the name of freedom of the press, were selling out their country for whatever price big business or Nazi agents were ready to pay. The France of today is not so easily deceived by eloquent lip-service to the rights of man. Rights, yes, but not the right to destroy freedom, not the right of fascists to reconstitute their press and spread their poisonous ideologies again. It is interesting to watch the more conservative papers making skilful use of the argument that any restriction on freedom of the press will create an unfavorable reaction in the United States and make Léon Blum's mission more difficult. "If you go left," they intone day after day, "you will get no financial support from America; France will be condemned to starve." Yet in the face of their dire warnings, France, and with it all Europe, is moving steadily left.

Confidence in Europe's recuperative powers does not imply ignorance of the indescribable difficulties that must be overcome. The road to economic and political recovery is still a very long and a very hard one. Two world wars have stripped Europe of most of its wealth; what is much worse, they have wiped out 80 per cent of its young, strong, able men. The losses have been so enormous that the most determined efforts to repair them seem to leave the gaps as big as before.

The French miners, for instance, have done a remarkable job since last fall, and Maurice Thorez can speak with justified proletarian pride, as he did yesterday, about "winning the battle of coal." But despite the extraordinary feat of production accomplished by the underfed men in the pits, France still lacks two-thirds of the coal needed to carry out its plans for reconstruction. The food situation has, on the whole, improved in the last eight months; however, in the six weeks since the devaluation of the franc, the black market has shown a fresh burst of activity, and prices, figured even on a dollar basis, have soared to a new high. The lack of foodstuffs is so acute that even if supplies were increased as much as 100 per cent, the improvement would scarcely be noticeable.

In addition to the material difficulties, there is the ever-present anxiety about the ability of the Allies to work together in the years to come and the clear conviction that without Allied unity every major problem of reconstruction will become infinitely more complicated. In that regard the outcome of the first UNO session in London has had an encouraging effect in France. The French had been so disheartened by the failure of the Foreign Ministers' conference that the simple fact of seeing the United Nations Organization beginning to function makes them breathe easier.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

NEW GEORGIA

Sometimes as I woke, the branches beside the stars
Were to me, as I drowsed, the bars of my cell;
The creepers lumped through my blanket, hard as a bed
In the old ward, in the time before the war—

In the days when, supperless, I moaned in sleep
With the stripes of beating, the old, hard, hampering dream
That lay like the chains on my limbs; till I woke
To a world and a year that used me, when I had learned to obey.

By the piece with the notch in the stock, by the knife from the States,

The tags' chain stirs with the wind; and I sleep
Paid, dead, and a soldier. Who fights for his own life
Loses, loses: I have killed for my world, and am free.

RANDALL JARRELL

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

THOSE who were present during World War I will remember the shock of the news that the Library of the University of Louvain had been destroyed. Today, having lived through World War II, they will find it hard to believe that Louvain was the only major library destroyed between 1914 and 1918.

This fact is noted at the beginning of an extraordinarily interesting—and sobering—article in the Harvard Alumni Bulletin for January 5 on The Devastated Libraries of the World, in which Milton Edward Lord and Kenneth R. Shaffer present a survey, necessarily incomplete, of the destruction of The Book since 1933, when the Nazis lit their first literary bonfire. As the authors point out, the second destruction of Louvain in 1940, with its 900,000 volumes, was only an incident in World War II. In Poland 70 per cent of all libraries were destroyed, and here is a description, taken from the Frankfurter Zeitung, of the end of the great Jewish Theological Seminary Library in Lublin.

For us it was a special pride to destroy the Talmudic Academy, which has been known as the greatest in Poland. . . . We threw out of the building the great Talmudic Library and carted it to the market. There we set fire to the books. The fire lasted for twenty hours. The Jews of Lublin were assembled and cried bitterly. Their cries almost silenced us. Then we summoned the military band, and the joyful shouts of the soldiers silenced the sound of the Jewish cries. . . .

The irony is that the Nazi bonfires marked the beginning of a saga of destruction in which, in the end, all nations became involved. The publishing area of London was almost totally destroyed in 1941—with its millions of volumes and, more crucial, priceless plates and matrices from which new printings might be made. In 1945 another great publishing center, Leipzig, was virtually wiped out by Allied bombs. And this sequence of deliberate destruction and inevitable counter-destruction was repeated throughout the world.

In many cases libraries which were evacuated to "safe" places "were destroyed as completely by rain, mold, rats, mice, and insects as they ever could have been by bomb or artillery fire." The authors cite the story of the desperate and futile attempt of the Reverend James Edward Haggerty to save the books of two libraries in Mindanao; and the fact that it was a small and remote collection makes the tale the more significant. First the books were taken to a rectory in a mountain town, where a third of them were destroyed by Japanese bombs. The rest were thereupon conveyed by pack animals and sledges to a wooded canyon and stored in bamboo houses built for the purpose. For two years two boys tried to protect them from the elements. Later, because dampness was taking its toll, the books were placed in three bamboo houses constructed on drier ground. In July, 1944, Mr. Haggerty walked more than two hundred miles to inspect his precious hoard. Japanese patrols had found and burned two of the scattered houses. The third had collapsed from the weight of the books, and a month of sun and rain had completed their ruin.

The authors make the statement that the destruction of books and libraries in World War II probably exceeded by many times that of all previous wars and catastrophes. That statement should be inscribed in a prominent place in the permanent meeting hall of the UNO.

THE SENSE OF AMERICA, in all its variations, geographical and other, seldom rises in one's habit-dulled consciousness without a strong direct stimulus. Some years ago a friend brought me a piece of sagebrush straight from my native West. Its smell and texture evoked, with a vividness no mere memory could induce, a life and landscape so alien to the life and landscape of New York that I ended by wondering which, if either, was real.

A young relative from Iowa who blew in the other evening stirred up similarly unsettling vibrations of wonder, amusement, and mild despair. We have forbears in common and therefore a strong family feeling. For the rest we are as many worlds apart as our forbears were before they somehow got together in Western America. The fact that our family history duplicates, except for names and places, that of most Americans only makes it all the more a tall tale which will continue to seem tall and strange, I suppose, until the American consciousness has assimilated its wild assortment of heritage and history.

The young relative, who has been in the army half a year, told me with disarming gusto that his pals, whom he had momentarily deserted to pay me a visit, had never heard of The Nation and had bet him fifty cents that there was no such magazine. I furnished him with proof, and I hope he spent the fifty cents wisely.

What gave the encounter its final fillip was the news that this young soldier, who must be eighteen but looks much younger, who has had six months of basic training and orientation and speaks of both in exactly the same unengaged tone, was on his way to occupy Germany. He is bound to have a personal success; the children in whatever German town he invades will find his gifts and his good-will irresistible. He has a quite unconscious air of self-confidence, despite his youthfulness, and at the same time a readiness to be accommodating and friendly which may have their incalculable effects on Germans old and young. Still it doesn't seem quite enough.

I WAS VERY HAPPY to have a letter from a 'teen-ager seconding my remarks about mass-production entertainment in the issue of February 9.

I wish you to know that I am grateful to you for writing the article. I am only seventeen, but for the past year I have been increasingly exasperated with the condition of American culture of which you speak. . . .

Somerset Maugham said somewhere that when a writer has something bothering him, writing about it helps, and maybe that works vicariously. Anyhow I'd like to thank you again for writing the article. I was beginning to think I was a picayune snob.

Perhaps I can make a bloc with the youngest generation.

by Ella Winter

I SAW THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

"HERE are the questions one asks about Russia, and some living and personal answers."

—San Francisco Chronicle

"A report minus special pleading . . . she reports with camera-like fidelity what she saw of the Russian people . . . Hers is the sort of book we need most desperately."

—New York Post

At all bookstores • $3.00

LITTLE, BROWN AND COMPANY • BOSTON

★ Buy Bonds—To Keep ★

SEVERAL PEOPLE, I'm told, have called up the publishers of "Forever Amber" and tried to order a copy of "Always Opal," the book referred to in Elmer Rice's new play, "Dream Girl." One stone, I suppose, is as nourishing as another. . . . I am further informed that salesmen in drug-stores are occasionally asked for one of those pink tooth-brushes. Advertising is its own reward.

The Anglo-American Paradox

RIVAL PARTNERS: AMERICA AND BRITAIN IN THE POST-WAR WORLD. By Keith Hutchison. The Macmillan Company. $2.

ECONOMIC theory," says Mr. Hutchison, "is one thing; the economic facts of life are another. They include habits, conventions, psychological attitudes, and political pressures." He then proceeds to give us as clear and lucid an account of the facts of life governing the relations between Britain and America as one would ever care to see. Mr. Hutchison is in an especially favorable position to do so because he was born and educated in Britain, lives in America, is married to an American, and has two children—one British, one American. A better-balanced diet for objective reporting would be hard to find.

First he outlines the very fair degree of cooperation between the two great powers during the war. Had Roosevelt and Churchill not formed such a mutual-admiration society, would cooperation have been so good?

Then he describes with a minimum of theory and a maximum of fact the economic shape of post-war America and post-war Britain, pausing only briefly to sideswipe Professor Hayek. While the amount of state intervention and control is perhaps equally advanced in the two countries—although along somewhat different lines—the Americans feel sinful about it, and the British do not. To believe in what one is actually doing is always an advantage. The British big business man is pretty well up to date on the facts of life; among American tycoons there is a cultural lag of a good twenty years. To talk in the same day to a member of the National Association of Manufacturers and then to a member of the Federation of British Industries is an experience suitable for study in a psychological clinic. The British have been bombed. We have not. Maybe that accounts for it.

Britain is a country poor in natural resources, and she must indeed export—to pay for goods for her people, and raw materials for her factories—or die. She drained her wealth far more heavily in the war than we did. The necessity for planning her economic future is a little more immediate—but not much more. We are accustomed to even gaudier depressions.

All these comparative matters Mr. Hutchison looks into with a great deal of acumen. He makes few generalizations without cases to support them, thus keeping his communication line to the reader always clear. He then describes the post-war areas of conflict between the two countries. They are many and complicated, including rivalries over air lines, merchant marine, oil, cocoa, and other commodities. Each item is packed with dynamite.

Mr. Hutchison gives one of the clearest expositions of

LET'S SETTLE THE GM STRIKE BUT NOT BY HUNGER

THESE ARE ACTUAL CASES—

PONTIAC, MICHIGAN: There are seven children in the family of this striking General Motors worker. Sickness has depleted his savings. He faces foreclosure of his home. There is no money for food.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA: A widowed mother of three needs $10 for shoes for the children, and a minimum of $8.50 a week for food.

FLINT, MICHIGAN: An expectant mother, wife of a veteran, was refused entrance to a hospital till $56 was paid.

200,000 employees of General Motors have been on strike for more than eleven weeks. Day-to-day expenses — food, rent, medicine — are eating up their savings and their war bonds. 40,000 families have already exhausted every penny they had put by. —The need gets bigger every day. These people must have help just to live.

WHY CAN'T THE UNION HELP THEM?

William H. Davis, ex-chairman of the War Labor Board, and ex-Economic Stabilizer, told the Senate why on January 16th. No union, he said, can support families during a mass strike. $10 a week to 200,000 men means $2,000,000 a week. The union doesn't have it.

DON'T THE MEN GET GOVERNMENT RELIEF?

In 95.8% of the cases — NO. The few communities that allow relief pay about enough to feed the children — no more. Nothing for emergencies.

WILL YOU HELP US?

Will you help in care for emergency cases such as the ones described here? Experienced social workers will administer the funds you give us, direct to the hardest-hit families.

We want to see the strike settled. But starvation never settled anything. There's a human need that must be met. Help us meet it!

GM workers will receive their first pay check three weeks after they return to work

NATIONAL COMMITTEE

HAROLD ICKES, Chairman

COL. EVANS CARLSON
RUSSELL DAVENPORT
LEON HENDERSON
DR. FRANK KINGDON
FREDA KIRCHWEY
SENATOR ROBERT LA FOLLETTE
HENRY R. LUCE
ARCHBISHOP ROBERT E. LUCEY

SENATOR WAYNE MORSE
BISHOP FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL
HENRY MORGENTHAU, JR.
DR. REINHOLD NIEBUHR
BISHOP G. BROMLEY OXNAM
BISHOP EDWARD L. PARSONS
SENATOR CLAUDE PEPPER

MRS. ELEANOR ROOSEVELT
BISHOP WILLIAM SCARLETT
BISHOP BERNARD J. SHEIL
HAROLD E. STASSEN
SENATOR GLEN H. TAYLOR
WALTER WANGER
WALTER WHITE
RABBI STEPHEN S. WISE

ELIZABETH JANEWAY, National Secretary

L. G. ROSS, Treasurer

National Committee to Aid Families of General Motors Strikers
212 EAST 49th STREET, NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

I agree that HUNGER MUST NOT BE USED AS A WEAPON AGAINST AMERICAN WORKERS.

Here is my contribution of $..... to the emergency fund to feed the wives and children of the 200,000 General Motors strikers.

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY ZONE STATE

Director of Internal Revenue has ruled that contributions may be deducted from your Federal Income Tax.

Bretton Woods that I have seen. He shows how this instrument is not a return to nineteenth-century free-trade principles, that by raising government control to an international level many of the valuable characteristics of multilateral, three-corner trading can hopefully be recaptured.

He brings us right to the threshold of the British loan, now before Congress. All the relevant background for the loan is sketched in. The final terms unfortunately did not come out before the book went to press.

Will the loan, if it goes into force, be successful? Many doubt it, and Mr. Hutchison gives the reasons. Many Britons are afraid—with some reason—that it will do Britain more harm than good. Many Americans are afraid—with less reason—that it will be throwing good money after bad. There is a great paradox involved which may be insoluble.

The paradox is this: In exchange for the loan the British agree to leave the protection of the sterling bloc, give up bilateral deals and blocked pounds, and return to multilateral trading. In one sense they are glad to do this, for the British invented free trade. But in a realistic sense they are scared stiff. If the United States falls into a deep depression, world trade is bound to shrink seriously, leaving the British high and dry. London, watching the antics of the N. A. M., is terrified that after a brief boom depression will surely come. It seems that "while the idea for full employment is making progress, it remains a political football in Washington." (Witness the fate of S-380, the Murray full-employment bill.)

Many Britishers might not be too bitterly disappointed if Congress threw out the loan. The Economist might even rejoice, judging by its recent comments. Then Britain would not lose the shelter of the sterling bloc when the storm came. She would insulate herself from a depression to a degree. We would not be able to export unemployment to her shores—as we can do under the loan.

Mr. Hutchison cannot resolve this paradox. Only history can do that.

STUART CHASE

BRIEFER COMMENT

Van Doren's Dryden

ONE OF THE FEW PIECES of definitive literary criticism written in this country during the present century, Mark Van Doren's "John Dryden: A Study of His Poetry" (Holt, $3), is now reprinted twenty-five years after its original publication. The author has taken advantage of the resetting to remove the "clichés of qualification" which it seemed to him discreet to employ when the work was first composed as a doctoral dissertation. His enthusiasm for Dryden as a poet of power remains as strong or stronger than ever. Indeed, Mr. Van Doren implies that an appreciation of Dryden is a test of a sound appreciation of poetry in general, and that only when men turn away from the humanities and allow poetry to decline into a plaything of cults will Dryden be neglected. His extended discussion of all aspects of the poet's art goes far to validate his contention. He demonstrates, not that Dryden was a faultless writer, since his failings are sometimes spectacular, but that he was a great writer in that his conception of poetry began with a professional concern for the craftsmanship of verse. The artist is known by his love of the instrument. Dryden possessed among other capacities a fine ear for melodious numbers and used his command of verbal music as a source of poetic power. Out of sweetness came his strength, a strength essentially masculine.

Mr. Van Doren has explored the bases of Dryden's power with an industry steadily illuminated by good sense. His book is packed with ordered information, none of which is superfluous to his intention. An impressive number of thumbnail dissertations could be drawn from his pages on such topics as seventeenth-century aesthetics as illustrated in poetry, painting, and music, "characters" in literature, oratory and poetry, English Pindaric odes, the art of translation, poetic diction, and the like. His critical judgments tend to take the form of felicitous metaphor, as Dryden's also are apt to do. Thus in comparing the two masters of Augustan verse he remarks with neat discrimination: "Pope lurks behind his poetry; Dryden stands well forward, flush with his page and speaking with an honest voice if not always with an honest heart."

On the first appearance of this assured masterpiece of criticism T. S. Eliot declared: "It is a book which every practitioner of English verse should study." The poetry of the last quarter-century has been the poorer in that his advice has not been taken. Had it been heeded we might now be rediscovering the lost dignity of narrative verse and the lost art of poetic melody.

GEORGE F. WHICHER

H. G. WELLS— Prophet of the Atomic Bomb

Read his latest book:

"CRUX ANSATA—An Indictment
of the Roman Catholic Church"

An historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis.

Cloth Binding $1.75

Paper-covered $1.25

Also get a copy of

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS" by L. H. Lehmann

A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration.

Cloth Binding $1.75

Paper-covered $1.00

COMBINATION	Both Cloth Bound Books	$3.00
OFFERS	Both Paper Bound Books	$2.00

New Pamphlet

"VATICAN POLICY

IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR"

48 pages of Documented Facts 25¢

Free to those who return this ad with their order
for the above books

Order From:

AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. 351

229 WEST 40TH STREET

NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

The Realists and Peace

IT IS ALWAYS A PLEASURE to come across the work of Mrs. Vera Micheles Dean, Research Director of the Foreign Policy Association. "The Four Cornerstones of Peace" (Whitlsey House, $2.50) is not merely competent but distinguished in thought and style. This is an ideal compendium for the citizen—not necessarily a student of world politics—interested in security and justice. It gives a very clear and sober account of the meetings at Dumbarton Oaks, Yalta, Chapultepec, and San Francisco. Nearly one-half is devoted to the official text of the main documents.

But no book on such a subject can be wholly objective. Mrs. Dean pleads with the American voter to support a policy of peace through international organization. I agreed with her long before she was born, and every year confirms me in the faith. But the work reflects the tragic confusion of the liberal mind at the present hour. Yalta was not "a cornerstone of peace." Justified as an act of war, as part of the Allies' grand strategy, it was secret diplomacy and power politics of the most outrageous kind. If we must leave the atomic bomb behind, so must we also transcend the method of Yalta, continued at Potsdam. Between the two San Francisco appears in an ambiguous light.

The American public will not indefinitely submit to "secret covenants secretly arrived at." When we rebel, Russia will justly claim that it has been double-crossed. The sequel is easy to forecast.

Mrs. Dean uses as an epigraph a stanza from the famous "People's Anthem," by Ebenezer Elliott, the Corn Law rhymers. A hundred years ago the masses, represented then by the Chartists, wanted a "people's peace," open, fair, and fraternal. The realists had their way. The masses still feel the same; the governments and most of the intelligentsia are still realistic. Mrs. Dean properly urges us to fight on. What she does not tell us is that one of the things we have to fight and destroy is the spirit of Yalta and Potsdam, and whatever trace of it may be found in the San Francisco Charter.

ALBERT GUERARD

Tennessee Williams

"27 WAGONS FULL OF COTTON" is a collection of short dramatic sketches by Tennessee Williams (New Directions, $3.50). Like his first Broadway play they reveal an indisputable but very tentative talent which so far has proved unequal to the task of solid construction on any extended scale. "The Glass Menagerie" depended for its effect almost exclusively upon one substantial portrait study, and the short pieces in the present volume tend to be monologues made to look like plays by the simple device of providing the speaker with one or more listeners or "feeders." Considered merely as portraits, several of them—notably "The Last of My Solid Gold Watches" and "This Property Is Condemned"—are quite striking, but there is little evidence of any ability to develop a real story or to reveal a character through action. Mr. Williams seems to have an especial fondness for setting his scene in hovels, cheap boarding-houses, or brothels and for choosing as his principal figure some character just on the point of ultimate dissolution. The

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

THE Nation

- ☐ with Harpers Magazine . . $6.50
You Save $2.50
- ☐ with Consumers Union . . $7.00
You Save $1.50
- ☐ with Harpers Magazine
and Consumers Union . $9.00
You Save $3.50
- ☐ with Free World . . . $7.50
You Save $1.50
- ☐ with Saturday Review . . $8.50
You Save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself

- ☐ One Year $5 ☐ Two Years $8 ☐ Three Years $11
- ☐ Servicemen's Rate $3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

SPECIAL NOTICE TO READERS

To Subscribers:

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please cooperate by renewing your current subscription on receipt of the first notice of expiration.

To Newsstand Readers:

The only certain way of getting The Nation regularly is to enter a subscription. By doing so you will not only insure prompt receipt of your copy, but you will make a considerable saving in money over the newsstand price.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
814 ST.
80th ST.
823 ST.
837 Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL

RKO NOW

A thousand thundering thrills!

ERROL FLYNN

ALEXIS SMITH

'SAN ANTONIO'

IN TECHNICOLOR

— and —

'DICK TRACY' MORGAN CONWAY
ANNE JEFFREYS

"LEAVES YOU PUNCH-DRUNK WITH DRAMA"

—N. Y. World-Telegram

"HIGHLY COLORED TALE"—N. Y. Sun

DARRYL F. ZANUCK presents

'LEAVE HER TO HEAVEN'

By BEN AMES WILLIAMS

IN TECHNICOLOR

GENE CORNEL JEANNE
TIERNEY • WILDE • CRAIN

— Also —

"BE SURE AND SEE IT"—Walter Winchell

'HITLER LIVES?'

PARAMOUNT presents

BING BOB
CROSBY HOPE
DOROTHY LAMOUR

— In —

"ROAD TO UTOPIA"

MIDNIGHT FEATURE NIGHTLY

NOW PARAMOUNT

— In Person —

BENNY GOODMAN

His Clarinet and Orchestra with
The Famous Sextet

— Featuring —

MEL
POWELL
PAT
HENNING

TIMES SQUARE

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review

may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN copy on request

result is not only a certain monotony but also a strong suggestion of that romantic pessimism which revels in disease and degradation spiced with sexual depravity. If the pieces in this volume were written before "The Glass Menagerie," then he may be said to have made some progress in the direction of substantial achievement. If they are recent work, then there seems grave danger that his talent is merely a minor one.

JOSEPH WOOD KRAITCH

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents

MAURICE EVANS

In His New Production of Shakespeare's

HAMLET

Columbus Circle Thea. B'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
Eves. 8:30. Mts. Thu. & Sat. 2:30

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
& DOROTHY FIELDS
BROADWAY THEATRE B'way at 53rd St. Mats.: Sat. & Sun. Eve. Incl. Sun. 2:30 & 8:30

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
A NEW MUSICAL PLAY

CAROUSEL

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Reuben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
with John Raitt • Eva Wilbers
Jean Darling • Eric Mattson • Christine Johnson • Effie Afton
MAJESTIC THEATRE 44th St. W. of Broadway, Evgs. 8:30
Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT

OKLAHOMA!

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Reuben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Harold Keel • Joseph Buloff • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
ST. JAMES THEATRE 44th St. W. of Broadway, Evgs. 8:30
Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS"—Nichols, The Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present

MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
In JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway, Phone Circle 6-4636
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30 Sharp

"THE GREATEST OF ALL MUSICAL COMEDIES"—Barnes, Herald Tribune
KERN and HAMMERSTEIN'S

SHOW BOAT

Music by JEROME KERN. Books and Lyrics by OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2d.
Based on the novel by EDNA FERBER • Staged by HASSARD SHORT.
ZIEGFELD THEA., 54th Street and Sixth Avenue, Ol. 5-5200.
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Buy All the Bonds You Can...

Keep All the Bonds You Buy

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

ANTIGONE" (Cort Theater) is adapted from the adaptation made by Jean Anouilh, played in Paris during the occupation, and more or less put over on the German censors. Though acted in modern costume, the scene was left in ancient Greece, and little essential change was made in either the action or even the motives. In Sophocles's original the conflict is already that between the individual and the state, or, more precisely, between the laws decreed by a supreme secular authority and those of God and of nature. To transform it into a fable for the times, little more than a mere modernization of the terminology was necessary. Make Creon a rationalizing fascist dictator who justifies himself by arguing the need for an established order in the turbulent Greek states, make it clear that Antigone's insistence upon burying her brother springs from her conviction that necessity, the tyrant's plea, is never superior to the claims of fundamental human decency, and you get a play which the Germans could not and obviously did not fail to recognize as a discussion of the current situation.

Lewis Galantière's obviously skilful version—it is not called a translation—is acted by Katharine Cornell and Cedric Hardwicke in modern dress upon a stage bare except for its draperies and in one continuous act, which runs for a bit over an hour and a half. Horace Braham, serving as narrator-commentator, is the chorus compressed into one person, the dramaturgical method is Greek, not modern, and, indeed, even the order of the incidents follows fairly closely that of the Sophocles original; so that what one gets is something perhaps even closer to the Greek in form than it is in thought.

On the whole most of the reviewers seem not to have been very greatly pleased, and "Antigone" got a rather poor press. I find myself agreeing with many of the specific strictures made, but I seem to have been more interested and more moved by the whole than those of my colleagues whose reviews I have read. It is true, I think, that to make the guards neither like Greeks nor like S. S. men but like simple-minded American tough guys is probably a mistake. I agree that though Miss Cornell's performance is excellent—especially and as usual with her, pictorially excellent—acting honors probably go to Hardwicke, whose portrait of the icily reasonable dictator is a genuinely memorable one. Moreover, even at the risk of seeming pedantic, I might add that the modern playwright actually outdoes the Greek in decorum, since though of course Sophocles permits no deaths upon the stage he does have the body of Haemon brought in, and I wonder, difficult as such things are to manage properly, if some such presentation of the bodies might not have added the final scene which the play as it now stands does need. But all these are relatively minor matters. I found none of the play, except perhaps some of the very earliest scenes, uninteresting, and I found the interview between Creon and Antigone, which takes up perhaps a third to a half of the entire running time, both absorbing and moving. One of the boldest of the author's modifications of his text, that in which he makes Creon confess that he is using the dead brother merely as a politically useful scapegoat, seems to me very effective, and Antigone's retort at the climax of the debate is conclusive and tremendous. Creon has launched into a characteristic rhapsody in praise of vitality and the will to live. "Ah," interrupts Antigone, "if men were only animals, what a king you would be!"

Since the German censors could not have failed to recognize that the play was intended as a commentary upon the current situation one wonders why they permitted it at all. One wonders also if they would have permitted a revival of Shaw's "St. Joan," in which the same problem is discussed and in which, though the very presence of Jeanne d'Arc might have been thought intolerable, the claims of the central authority really come off rather better than they do in the American version of "Antigone." Obviously the Germans decided that they were willing to risk their case on the effectiveness of Creon's presentation of it, and a note in the present program helps make it understandable that they should have done so. The play as we now have it is not quite the play that was performed in Paris during the occupation. No Frenchman, Mr. Galantière assures us, could have come away feeling that Creon's argument was stronger than Antigone's, but, so he implies, a German might have felt otherwise, and in the American version Antigone's case has been somewhat built up, "not by taking anything away from M. Anouilh's Creon, but by adding something to his Antigone, his chorus, and his Haemon." Since a part of the interest in this American production is documentary and historical, I am not sure that Mr. Galantière would not have been wiser to give us the argument precisely as it was given in the French version.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

ANYONE who wants to make creatively interesting movies in this country today gets stuck in one of three, or at the outside four, ways, all of them too familiar to require more than mention. If he works in Hollywood, it is unlikely that he will get more than a fraction of his best ability on to the screen; and that is not to mention the liability of resignation to compromise, and of self-deceit. If he works on his own, he is unlikely to get his films distributed or even sporadically shown; and that is not to mention either the difficulty of getting the money and equipment to make the movies or the liability of self-deceit in the direction of arrogance and artiness—the loss of, and contempt for, audience, which can be just as corrupting as its nominal oppo-

SOON EVERY DAY WILL BE SUNDAY

By Charles O. Leff

As a result of many years of research about politics and political conditioning, the author, a physician, has a most interesting bear by the tail.

The political idealist and realist meets a new challenge. A new primer for the perplexed citizen, a guide to the politician and a functional approach to a universal problem. 214 pages, $3.00

Publication Division
Leff Research Institute
South Orange, N. J.

site. If, on the other hand, the would-be artist goes abroad to work, he is likely to find, in future, that the advantages are not so clear by a good deal as they were in the past; and unless he is a very specialized—and perhaps also a very limited—artist indeed, he is certain to suffer as profoundly by a change of country as he would, if he were a writer, by a change of language. The fourth possibility is paralysis, or resignation to the practice of some more feasible art. Either of these is perhaps preferable to literal suicide, but not practically so as far as the movie artist and the movie art are concerned.

Maya Deren and Alexander Hammid have made three short films on their own. These are getting no kind of formal distribution, but they were shown recently in New York at the Provincetown Playhouse, and presumably will be shown again when and as that is possible. I can only suggest that those interested keep their ears open.

Of the three films one, which I have not seen, is called "A Study in Choreography for Camera." The other two, "Meshes of the Afternoon" and "At Land," can be roughly classified as "dream" films and also approach, as Parker Tyler has said, "a type of personal expression in cinema analogous to the lyric poem." Their quality seems to me to be impaired by Miss Deren's performance in the central roles, which strikes me as showing the emotional characteristics that make so much of "modern" dancing, for instance, not only unifying to watch but radically mistaken and hostile in its relation to the nature of good art. There are many satisfactions of mood and implication and image in the movies, of kinds which are the unique property of the movie camera, and which are hardly even hinted in studio productions. Yet I cannot feel that there is anything really original about them—that they do anything important, for instance, which was not done, and done to an ill-deserved death, by some of the European avant-gardists, and especially by the surrealists, of the 1920's. At worst, in fact, they are solemnly, arrogantly, distressingly pretentious and arty. Nevertheless, I think they are to be seen, and that there is a good deal in them to be liked, enjoyed, and respected. I don't at all agree with Miss Deren that "reality," in its conventional camera sense, cannot be turned into a work of art without being turned also into a fantasia of the unconscious; but if you have to believe that in order to try to do it—which I doubt—then I am glad that she does. For I certainly believe that it is worth doing; and I know of nobody else in films, just now, who is paying any more attention to that great universe of movie possibility than to make safely conducted little tours of the border villages.

I must again postpone comment on several current films because none of them interest me as much as these. Meanwhile, with degrees of fervor ranging from able to take nourishment to unlikely to last out the night, I can recommend "Three Strangers," "Scarlet Street," and "Road to Utopia." I don't think there will be any trouble finding them.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THERE is, by now, a fair amount of understanding of what W. J. Turner calls the ambiguity of Mozart—the tensions in those delicate musical forms, the intensity and passion that are implicit in them. But there still is no comparable understanding of what might be called the duality of Schubert—the iron-like power that alternates with the relaxation. No work of Schubert is more familiar than the "Unfinished" Symphony; nothing is more obvious than the compactness and force of its first movement, the fact that it is one of the most extraordinary and effective pieces of large-scale construction in the symphonic literature; yet this does not result in as much as a qualifying clause in the prevailing idea of him as a lyricist without sustained constructive power, whose large forms are mere garrulously diffuse successions of pretty tunes. The occasional slackness and diffuseness certainly are part of the truth about Schubert; but there is little appreciation of the occasional integration and force that are the rest of that truth.

Tovey may write that the first movement of the C major Symphony has "more than Schubert's usual concentration" and its "development is conspicuously free from redundancy or digression," and that the conclusion of the work "is one of the greatest in all symphonic music." Ralph Bates, in his excellent book on Schubert, observing that "the symphony largely achieves its effects by sheer intoxication of persistent rhythms," may point out that in the first movement the opening subject liberates "a steely, racy rhythm," and "there must be no slackening of pace in pulseless transitions"; that in the scherzo "the second subject is introduced breathlessly, and at once its externals are stripped off, so that already in bar 41 the naked, scintillating ardor of string timbre is swinging up and down with enormous power," and "even this rhythmic form is later simplified so that the music rises and falls with immense suggestion of a shining piston crosshead and rod driving an exultant music through time and space"; that in the conclusion of the work "there is no slackening of pace as the triplet figure begins to create one of the most astonishing splendors of music," and "it is as if we were borne up on that pulsating atom of rhythm, above the world and out from its limits over the cold purity of universal space, as if we beheld the circling of worlds and the laws they manifest." And Toscanini may reveal similar perceptions in his performance of the work. But the prevailing notion of it is the one expressed by Brockway and Weinstock in "Men of Music": "But alas! it was again on the rock of development that Schubert foundered. After proving conclusively that he could write page after page of great symphonic music, he seems to have unfocused his attention on the extremely difficult business on hand, and to have lapsed into . . . irrelevant garrulousness. Thus, the C major concludes on a maundering, inconsequential note . . ." And Toscanini's performance has been criticized for its lack of Viennese relaxation.

An extraordinary example of the duality in Schubert's music is the first movement of the Piano Sonata Opus 78. Its tranquilly, spaciouly meditative opening statement in G major establishes the mood of the entire exposition, which, after some increased liveliness and force, quiets down to last D major references to the opening statement that give implications of complete finality to the meditative tranquility. We are, then, entirely unprepared for what happens now in the development: the meditative opening statement, with the power it acquires now from being ff in G minor, from the tensions this creates in its rhythm, from the tensions in the imitations of this rhythm by bare octaves in the bass, from the eruptions of these octaves that carry the passage to a proclamation tremendous in its fff sonority and its sustained distentions. The tension is relaxed in a quiet interlude, only to be built up again in the same way to the same climax, and to be relaxed again in the same interlude; then the rhythm of the interlude is hammered out by treble and bass octaves in imitation with increasing intensity to a point where the music subsides into a long and poignant transition to the opening statement in G major, which re-establishes the mood of meditative tranquility for the recapitulation. And what is extraordinary about this example of the Schubert duality is the power in the development that is created out of, and resolved into, the tranquil meditation of the exposition and recapitulation.

Webster Aitken's recent performance of this movement realized its duality with magnificent effect: there were the proper quiet, spaciousness, plasticity, and grace in the exposition and recapitulation, the right power in the development; moreover—to consider Aitken the pianist as well as the musician—there was the beauty of the sound that he produced from the piano, whether in the subtle gradations from p to f of the exposition and recapitulation, or in the ff's and fff's of the development. As for the subsequent movements, I will repeat what I said when Aitken played the work a couple of years ago: I feel them to be more relaxed in pace than he does; but though I have this different conception of them I can enjoy what he makes of them in accordance with his own conception, and the evidence in this of his great musical intelligence and mastery of his instrument.

What started me on the long train of thought about Schubert's duality was this paragraph in Jerome D. Bohm's Herald Tribune review of Aitken's recital: "His discourse of Schubert's G major Sonata, one of the composer's most poetic products, and one which demands a blend of inwardness, tenderness, and ingratiating charm for convincing realization of the composer's message, was planned on too austere monumental a scale, so that the music's inherent qualities were all but obliterated by the top-heavy dynamic gamut utilized."

CONTRIBUTORS

STUART CHASE is the author of "Where's the Money Coming From?" "Democracy Under Pressure," and "Tomorrow's Trade: Problems of Our Foreign Commerce."

GEORGE F. WHICHER, professor of English at Amherst College, is the author of "This Was a Poet," a critical biography of Emily Dickinson, and "Walden Revisited," a centennial tribute to Henry David Thoreau.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

On Purchasing Power

Dear Sirs: "The General Motors Reply to U. A. W.-C. I. O. Brief" is interesting. It asks innocently enough, on page 39, "... how can more purchasing power be created simply by taking it away from business and investors and giving it to factory workers?" "Such a transaction," it says, "simply accomplishes a shift in purchasing power, not an expansion."

Mr. Anderson does not seem to realize that an expansion in purchasing power is accomplished only by a shift from those who have it but wouldn't use it to those who would use it if they had it. That shift is accomplished only by higher wages. Dormant purchasing power in the hands of business and investors is no purchasing power at all, whereas when it gets into the hands of workers, it not only becomes active but also acts as a stimulant to business expansion and investments.

DAVID DIAMOND

Detroit, February 15

Congratulations

Dear Sirs: May I congratulate you on Richard Neuberger's article, What Do the People Think of Truman? in The Nation for January 19.

I believe that Neuberger's evaluation of Truman's standing with the people is very sound. I was glad to see him point out that the source of Truman's strength continues to lie with the same people who elected Franklin Roosevelt as President four straight times. It is refreshing that the common people continue loyal to the liberalism of the New Deal.

The Nation would do well to keep Mr. Neuberger actively mixing with the people and reporting their thoughts on the great problems of the day.

E. W. MILL

Mt. Rainier, Md., February 8

They Must Live to Build

Dear Sirs: Franco may be nearing the end of the road—but unfortunately so are 120,000 Spanish Republicans in France. They are all that is left of approximately half a million persons who crossed the Pyrenees in 1939. What happened to the 380,000 who are missing? They died fighting fascism wherever they could. In Narvik alone, of 1,200 Spanish volunteers who landed with the French and British forces, 800 were casualties. Spanish Republicans fought in North Africa, Italy, and France; 15,000 Spanish Republicans were in the ranks of the French maquis.

Today the survivors, veterans of a ten-year war, are the most destitute of any group in Europe: 45 per cent of the Spanish Republicans who applied to the International Rescue and Relief Committee for aid during a two-month period were partially disabled by tuberculosis or other diseases, had lost an arm, leg, or eye, or were suffering from neglected wounds; 26 per cent were seriously maimed or disabled, or had severe chronic diseases such as advanced tuberculosis. They need money, food, clothing, medicines, to live. They must live to build and guarantee a free democratic republic in Spain. More than half of the I. R. R. C. French budget is spent each month for cash relief for Spanish refugees in France. In addition the I. R. R. C. distributes thousands of packages of food and clothing a month. A special department in the committee's Paris office is devoted to Spanish Republican relief.

The I. R. R. C. wants to do twice the job it has been doing. It can, if American liberals support its program. These people acted as we hope we would have acted if we had been there. Their lives are in our hands. Help the cause of Spanish Republican relief by joining the International Rescue and Relief Committee, 103 Park Avenue, New York 17. Send clothing and food packages to the I. R. R. C. warehouse, 130 Orchard Street, New York 2.

L. HOLLINGSWORTH WOOD,
Chairman, International Rescue and Relief Committee

New York, February 1

To Study Health Agencies

Dear Sirs: The National Health Council, with the help of the Rockefeller Foundation, is embarking upon an ambitious five-year program for which it is anxious to arouse public support and community action. This program stems from an extensive study of the voluntary health agencies of the nation, issued by the council last September, which disclosed considerable unevenness and weakness in their accomplishment.

Crossword Puzzle No. 150

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 American political party which makes a coster mad
- 6 The filer produces a weapon
- 9 Birds wedded to Art
- 10 The card game for spinsters (two words, 3 & 4)
- 11 Tillers (anag.)
- 12 English philosopher with a heart of copper
- 13 "I'm glad to --- you well," as the caller remarked to the oculist
- 15 Crayon made from petals
- 17 So we go for a place in New York
- 18 He often departs by wings
- 19 A story in color
- 22 Poet William Bryant's middle name
- 25 "With a smile and a song" (hidden)
- 27 It is mean to behead a big peer
- 28 Not natives of Essen
- 30 Runs second to Waldorf in the hotel business
- 31 "The ----- round, the common task, Would furnish all we ought to ask"
- 32 Oil wells of a sort
- 33 An insincere politician perhaps, but a popular leader

DOWN

- 1 Rough sketch of a structure large enough to keep 500 afloat
- 2 What worn-out gloves tend to become
- 3 Heroine of La Dame aux Camellias
- 4 Female donkey? That's fine!
- 5 In a word, man and wife

- 6 Bird which literally leaves no stone unturned (hyphen, 3-4)
- 7 Intended
- 8 Duck for cover
- 14 One of the movie crowd
- 15 Part is answered, but only the first part
- 16 Kid
- 17 Denizen of the deep
- 20 What a big gun Thomas has become! (two words, 4 & 3)
- 21 Goes on board, where there's a bar amidships
- 23 Can't use 6 Across until you this it
- 24 Between flights
- 25 Every time the King played an ace he would trumpet
- 26 Bone in your throat? No, in your nose
- 29 Loves to clear up the mystery

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 149

ACROSS:—1 JINKS; 4 HEWER; 7 MICA; 9 UMPIRE; 10 MINCE; 12 SERB; 13 GAFF; 15 SEA VIEW; 17 STYLOS; 18 TITIPU; 19 ODE; 21 ROSSINI; 23 KICKOFF; 24 LYE; 26 GLOVES; 28 HEROIC; 31 SALUTES; 32 LIDS; 35 FOOD; 36 DYAKS; 37 GOLDEN; 38 TEAR; 39 ARDEN; 40 RUDGE.

DOWN:—1 JAMB; 2 NOISES; 3 SHELVED; 4 HAMLET; 5 WING; 6 REEF; 7 MOSES; 8 CURLY; 11 CASINO; 14 FLUFF; 15 SORITES; 16 WITCHES; 19 OIL; 20 EKE; 21 REGAL; 22 SHODDY; 25 YOUNGER; 27 SAMSON; 28 HEALED; 29 OZONE; 30 CIDER; 33 IDEA; 34 SAID; 35 FETE.

It is clear that teamwork is required. Accordingly, the National Health Council, with the generous support of a Citizens' Planning Committee of twenty-five public-spirited leaders, has just entered upon a program to weld our health societies more closely on the national, state, and local levels, and to bring about a greater unity in their health-planning and fund-raising efforts. A primary move will be to stimulate the organization of health councils in every city, representing an affiliation of all the voluntary societies doing health work in the community. This effort will be carried on in cooperation with the Community Chests and Councils.

We are anxious to reach the large number of your readers who work in or contribute to our voluntary health agencies. We shall succeed only as an informed and aroused public opinion will put through the needed changes.

LOUIS I. DUBLIN,

Chairman, Committee for the Study of Voluntary Health Agencies

New York, February 19

Atomic Parables

Dear Sirs: The conversation on the subject of atomic-bomb control seems to revolve around two points which in turn revolve about each other, neither ever arriving at any destination. These points, the value or otherwise of UNO and the search for "middle ground" between world government and national "sovereignty," are reminiscent of two very old stories which I should like to tell you, leaving the conclusion for you to draw.

Two Irishmen were witnessing their first airplane flight. Says one, "Dinny, now how would you like to be way up there with that flimsy thing?" To which Dinny replied, "A domb sight better than to be up there without it."

A Southern Negro was sent to deliver a mule a few miles away. Since it was already dark, the owner of the mule said, "Now, Sam, if you see a light coming down the road, you drive off to one side until it goes by." The next day after diligent search and inquiry, Sam was located in a hospital undergoing heavy repairs. The owner asked, "Sam, why didn't you do as I said, and drive off to one side until that light went by?" To which Sam offered, "Ah intended to do dat, Boss, but thah was two lights, and ah took aim for the middle."

H. R. HADFIELD

Los Angeles, February 2

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 9, 1946

NUMBER 10

The Shape of Things

THERE'S A WAR ON. HUNGER IS THE CRUEL and ruthless aggressor. And once more, so far as America is concerned, it is a case of "too little and too late." Surely the experts knew months ago—a great many non-experts did—that the world must be fed and that we must make up any deficiency. Yet with a light-hearted and light-headed irresponsibility that becomes more appalling with every day that passes and with every undernourished child that dies in Europe or Asia, controls were lifted and Americans were told in effect that they could eat, and waste, as much as they pleased. At last President Truman has called a conference of "civic leaders," and we are informed that an "aggressive" campaign will be waged to persuade Americans to use substitutes and eliminate waste. Ordinary Americans are more than willing, but one wonders whether the speculators and the hoarders are. Marquis Childs points out that a thousand wheat elevators in the Northwest are full to bursting, while Secretary of Agriculture Anderson has announced that commitments of wheat for Europe were short 150,000 tons in February and will be even shorter in March. Factors in the situation are the poor coordination of box-car facilities and the grain lobby's desire for higher profits and an end of price control. We hope Secretary Anderson is right in his stubborn insistence that a voluntary program will suffice. But the public should be prepared to accept rationing again when and if it appears necessary. The question is whether the necessity will be recognized by President Truman and his advisers.

✱

THE BALD ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE MOSCOW radio that Soviet forces will be maintained in northwestern Iran "until the situation is elucidated" has not, as we go to press, been followed by any official explanation. Presumably the Soviet government has some very cogent reason for taking this action, which on the face of it is a flagrant violation of the Anglo-Soviet-Iranian treaty of 1942. For this treaty provided for the simultaneous withdrawal from Iran of British and Russian troops six months after the war, a date subsequently fixed by mutual agreement as March 2, 1946. Moreover, when at the end of last year it was suggested that earlier evacuation would be desirable, the Soviet government declared that it intended to move out on the appointed day, neither sooner nor later. Now it is reported that the British troops have all gone while Red Army units are remaining in Azerbaijan, the province where a "democratic" party enjoying Russian patronage has set up an autonomous administration. This news has, not unnaturally, greatly disturbed the State Department and the British Foreign Office, and provoked bitter protests in the Iranian parliament. On the other hand a spokesman for the Iranian government in Teheran has greeted the Russian action as a sign of friendship, which suggests that the Iranian delegation now in Moscow has signed, or is about to sign, a new treaty providing for concessions or other privileges for the Soviets in northwestern Iran. In the unlikely event that such a treaty were ratified by the Iranian parliament, it might offer some legal color for continued Russian occupation. But it would strengthen rather than weaken the case for a strong British protest since the 1942 treaty was a tripartite agreement designed to maintain Iran as neutral ground between Russia and Britain. Any unilateral action to change this position must upset the Middle Eastern balance of power and increase international tension.

✱

BY NAMING J. A. KRUG AS SUCCESSOR TO Harold Ickes at the Department of the Interior, the President has made a respectable appointment which shines by comparison with some of his recent choices. Mr. Krug has an unblemished personal reputation; he is able and energetic. Trained at the University of Wisconsin, a school which has produced many of our finest public servants, he entered his career under excellent auspices. David Lilienthal employed him on the Wisconsin Public Service Commission and later made him chief power engineer for TVA. There his reputation grew as an administrator, a keen negotiator, and a firm supporter of public power. Called to Washington in 1940 to integrate power resources, so that the heavy war load could be handled, he carried out his assignment with great efficiency. Later he was pulled out of the navy to take charge of the War Production Board after the Nelson-Wilson row. There, however, his work afforded far more satisfaction to the dollar-a-year men than to the progres-

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	273
An End to Appeasement!	275
Enter Morality	276
Argentina in Suspense by Freda Kirchwey	277

ARTICLES

Germany's Hidden Assets by I. F. Stone	278
Franco's Zero Hour by J. Alvarez del Vayo	279
The Four Germanys by Vera Micheles Dean	281
In the Wind	283
Deadline in India by David Martin	284
The Menace of Rheumatic Fever by Martin Gumpert	286
Middle Eastern Munich by Eliahu Epstein	287
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	289

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Three Poems by Mark Van Doren	290
Class and Color by Diana Trilling	290
Briefer Comment	291
The Camera's Glass Eye by Clement Greenberg	294
Music by B. H. Haggin	297

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 299

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 151
by Jack Barrett 300

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:

Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 518 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

sives in his department, who charged that he gave too free hand to big business. Certainly he pleased the industrial crowd after V-E Day when he encouraged the rapid demobilization of material and other controls. This record has raised the question whether at the Department of the Interior he will stand up firmly enough to the many pressure groups he will encounter there. His job requires more than personal integrity; it calls for toughness and vigilance in defending the national estate from persistent and ingenious poaching by private interests. We hope Mr. Krug's administration of his department will prove that he has these qualities and that he will live down the acclaim his appointment has elicited from Arthur Krock, the Wall Street Journal, and the Daily News.

★

ARE WE CREATING OUR OWN "IRON CURTAIN" while protesting the barriers erected by other nations? The refusal of a visitor's visa to Tom Wintringham, the distinguished British writer on politics and military affairs, appears to set a dangerous precedent. No reason for this action has yet been given but it is clear that the Departments of State and Justice regard Mr. Wintringham as "undesirable" because he was once a member of the British Communist Party and fought in Spain as commander of the British battalion of the International Brigade. The fact that he left that party in 1938 is apparently treated as irrelevant, as are his services in the recent war when he helped to found the famous Osterley Park Training School for the British Home Guard, and wrote books on tactics which were used by both the British and American armies. We are certainly entitled to know why a man of his caliber should be excluded from this country and to have a clear ruling on the admissibility of foreign Communists and ex-Communists. If all such are to be barred a large number of European officials, including members of the present British government, will be shut out. On the other hand, if this important matter is to be left to the whim of a handful of Washington officials, what becomes of our boasted "government of laws not of men"?

★

PROSPECTS FOR UNITY IN CHINA WERE materially brightened last week by the signing of a Kuomintang-Communist agreement for reorganization of the Chinese army. Under the new plan the men under arms in China will be reduced within eighteen months from approximately six million to slightly more than one million. Of the sixty divisions in the new force, fifty will be drawn from the present Kuomintang army and ten from the Communist troops. While the Communists will continue to have most of their soldiers in North China, some will be stationed in the Yangtze valley and in Manchuria. Communist and Kuomintang divisions will in many instances be combined in joint armies, some under Communist and some under Kuomintang commanders. Expert American military observers are convinced that if the new plan can be put into effect, it will greatly reduce the danger of continued civil war. While the Kuomintang appears to have gained the upper hand in the allotment of troops, these observers point out that the tremendous area to be policed will leave it no surplus for offensive action. General George C. Marshall, whom the Kuomintang negotiator called the "midwife of Chinese unification," deserves major credit for the new management. Technically, the responsibility for carrying it out rests with a tripartite group set up at Peiping to enforce the truce; actually, all acute disagreements and problems will undoubtedly be referred to our ambassador for settlement. There may be need for General Marshall to stay on the job much longer than was originally contemplated.

✱

AUSTRIA, THE BIG-THREE POWERS AGREED at their Moscow meeting in October, 1943, was a victim of Nazi rape who, even though she had welcomed her fate with too much enthusiasm, should be given a chance of rehabilitation as a respectable member of the society of free nations. Their statement declared that they wished "to see reestablished a free and independent Austria and thereby to open the way for the Austrian people themselves . . . to find that political and economic security which is the only basis for lasting peace." Nine months after liberation Austrians are still pondering the meaning of these words. It is true that they have been allowed to participate in free elections and that a representative government has taken office, but the Allied Control Council representing the four occupying powers remains the supreme authority. What makes this intolerable is that it is an impotent authority unable to transact more than routine business because of its rule requiring unanimity. According to dispatches in the New York Times, this rule has been used by the Russian representative to block all measures to improve the economic situation, for instance, by restoring free movement and trade between the different occupation zones. Meanwhile, it is charged, the Red Army has seized control of most large industrial enterprises in eastern Austria. At Potsdam it was agreed that Russia was entitled to reparations from "German assets" in this area. The Red Army appears to have stretched this formula to cover everything that the Nazis confiscated in Austria, which means the major part of the country's scanty resources. In addition, it is reported that Russia has asked for 70,000 acres of farmland to provide its army with food, even though Austrians are being barely kept alive by UNRRA aid. We should like to know the reasons for this policy of squeeze, which seems inconsistent with Soviet ideals, long-term interests, and international engagements.

An End to Appeasement!

PERHAPS our State Department has not moved far from the position it held during the Spanish war. But it has moved. The Byrnes note calling for the three-power declaration on Spain indicates a weariness with the fascist dictator and a desire to see him out of the way. The lessons of the war are being slowly learned.

The Byrnes proposal, of course, did not carry that firm ringing note we like to hear. And it is quite possible that Franco will interpret it as the verbal reprimand he has become accustomed to expect from victorious democracies whose foreign policies are curiously tainted with past appeasement. We state that no overt steps will be taken against Franco. We speak of an interim government and make no mention of the lawfully constituted Republican government in exile. We warn that the change should not involve violence. In other words, while expressing our sharp displeasure with Franco, we give the Spanish Republicans inside and outside Spain no real assurance that we are determined to dispose of the unfinished business of European fascism. And it is precisely that assurance we should give.

Our gingerly approach to the matter of liquidating the Franco regime obviously does not spring from our fear of this faltering bully, nor yet from our concern for the Spanish people. It betrays rather the tensions and the confusion in our own official mind and in the official mind of Britain. It is part and parcel of that fatal attitude of regarding status quo reaction as safer than popular revolt. It is linked to our fear of Russia and to our belief that the challenge of Russia can be met better by bolstering shaky reactionary regimes than by strengthening the vital forces of genuine democracy. In the case of Spain, it means that we actually give serious consideration to rebuilding a throne so that we can seat thereon a Bourbon monarch and thus set the stage again for the long and bloody drama of revolution and civil war.

Our action on Spain should be determined simply by an appraisal of the Franco record and the present character of the Franco regime and by our declared war objectives to end fascism and strengthen democracy. Last week The Nation Associates, in cooperation with a group of seven other organizations, issued a memorandum calling upon President Truman to end relations with Franco Spain and recognize the Spanish Republic. (Copies of the text may be obtained by writing to The Nation.) The memorandum was signed by Reinhold Niebuhr, Raymond Swing, Philip Murray, William L. Shirer, Henry A. Atkinson, Frank P. Graham, Jo Davidson, Elmer Benson, and Freda Kirchwey. It gave a summary of the Franco record from the beginning of the civil war on July 18, 1936, down to the present time. It stressed particularly the role Spain had played in the Axis war as an arsenal of fascism and as a base for Nazi espionage. It quoted a recent report issued by the Enemy Division of the Foreign Economic Administration that placed Spain at the head of the list of countries in which Nazi Germany had captured an important economic foothold and which, like Argentina, could be used as a base for Nazi revival. The report states:

German technicians know Spanish trade secrets and in many cases control the policies of various companies. Notwithstanding a Spanish law limiting the employment of foreigners, German personnel continues to be firmly entrenched in Spanish industry. Most of the equipment recently purchased by Spain has come from Germany. Naturally, German technicians supervised its installation and often remained as technical managers.

Spain shows no sign of altering its character. Only last week it carried out a brutal execution of ten Spanish Republicans, one of whom had given gallant service against the Nazis in the French maquis. Spain today is an armed camp, with a standing army of 600,000 to 700,000 men and 50 per cent of the government expenditure going for military purposes. Franco's statement that the closing of the French frontier was part of an international Communist plot was a solemn echo of his late master's voice as he let loose the full flood of Nazi terror on Europe.

This man is the same kind of fascist we have been waging war against at the cost of hundreds of thousands of lives and billions in wealth. He and his regime must be destroyed just as completely as fascism was destroyed in Germany and Italy and Japan. It is the grimmest sort of irony to suggest that he be replaced by a monarch who, as Alvarez del Vayo points out elsewhere, is utterly unwanted by the Spanish people and who during the civil war ardently espoused Franco and his cause. The only alternative to the present regime that meets the requirements of world security is a democratic republic.

It has been suggested that the present Spanish Republican government in Paris is not strong and that its members are out of touch with and consequently not representative of the Spanish people. Both suggestions contain a degree of truth, but they must not be used as pretexts for refusing recognition. First, let us have a definite break of diplomatic relations with the Franco regime. Then let us recognize as a provisional government of Spain until such time as free elections can be held the legally constituted government in exile—if need be, reinforced by other democratic elements. Then let the issue go, as France has suggested, to the Security Council of the UNO for such action and sanctions as are called for in dealing with a serious menace to world peace.

Franco's power today rests almost entirely upon our uncertainties and confused purposes. If we take a firm stand and forget the double talk we shall be surprised to see how quickly the end of Franco will come.

Enter Morality

WHEN antagonists as far apart as Senators Pepper and Wheeler hurry to shake the hand of a colleague for his discourse on foreign policy, it may be assumed that the speaker has struck a rich vein of prevailing sentiment. That is what happened when Senator Vandenberg finished reporting on the state of the United Nations in a speech that called for "candor" on our part "as firm as Russia's always is," for a fixed limit on "compromise," and for our assumption of "a moral leadership which we have too frequently allowed to lapse." When the Republican Senator's remarks were followed the next day by an address in which the Democratic Secretary of State took precisely the same tack, the world had notice of something close to political solidarity in this country concerning American-Soviet relations.

The bedrock of this popular approach is that everything possible should and must be done to prevent the crack in these relations from widening into a disastrous breach, but that "everything possible" does not include a continuing toleration of Russian expansion through unilateral violations of either the letter or the spirit of the undertakings on which the United Nations Organization rests. Echoing Lieutenant General William Bedell Smith, our new ambassador to the Soviet Union, Vandenberg says that "the United States is willing to go a long way in meeting its international associates, but that it must be watchful of its own vital interests and 'hold to the line beyond which compromises cannot go' . . . even if we once crossed that line under the pressures of the exigencies of war."

The speeches of Vandenberg, Byrnes, and Smith are widely held to be a turning-point in American policy—and we believe they are. In the game of power politics the United States has come off none too well, and it is returning now to its historic role of moralist to the world. We are only too glad to note this reentry of political morality on the big-power level, and we rejoice over what appears to be an end to the policy of winking at Russia's didoes in Eastern Europe in exchange for Russian toleration of Anglo-American mischief elsewhere.

At this point, however, it is fair to ask whether the standards of the new integrity are to be applied only to the Soviets. Secretary Byrnes has laid down several unimpeachable principles, each of which raises a pertinent question:

1. "We [the great powers] will not and we cannot stand aloof if force or the threat of force is used contrary to the purposes and principles of the Charter." We hope and imagine that the Secretary is referring to the Soviet threat to Iran; we hope, but do not imagine, that he likewise has Indonesia and India in mind.

2. "We have no right to hold our troops in the territories of other sovereign states without their approval and consent freely given." Here again we trust Mr. Byrnes refers to Russian troops left in Iran despite the solemn promise to clear them out by March 2. Does he also refer to American troops left in Iceland despite President Roosevelt's categorical promise to remove them on the cessation of hostilities?

3. "We must not conduct a war of nerves to achieve strategic ends." We believe, with Bevin, that the Russians have been conducting just such a war against Turkey, and we think it needed to be said. But was there ever in history so colossal a war of nerves as that which we are waging by the exclusive manufacture of a weapon that gives us the power of life or death over any other nation on the globe?

In short, we favor the principles set forth by Vandenberg and Byrnes—so much, in fact, that we want them universally applied. If we lavish all our conscience on the Soviet Union, saving none for ourselves, the Byrnes-Vandenberg turning-point will merely mark a change from power politics taken straight to power politics with a morality chaser.

Argentina in Suspense

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

Buenos Aires, March 3

LAST Monday and Tuesday the active democrats of Argentina indulged in a spree of optimism. The ugly, bloody campaign was over; the election against all probability had been orderly and apparently fair; a fair election meant a sure democratic victory. Almost everyone I talked to from Tamborini and Mosca to their least important followers expressed unqualified confidence. Tamborini thought the Perón machine would "evaporate." The army was showered with democratic appreciation, official and popular. Because the election itself was carried through without fraud, the flagrant fraud of the campaign itself was generously disregarded. Confident of victory, few democrats felt like raking up past grievances. Reports were circulated that the Radical Party had reached an "understanding" with the army before the election, guaranteeing it against reprisals in return for order and an honest vote. Whether this rumor is true or false, it was evident that friendly relations had been established. Tamborini deprecated the very idea of a purge of pro-Nazi officers. Reconciliation was in the air. Only a handful of the many democrats I talked to admitted such doubts as I reported last week, and they were looked upon as over-skeptical and rather cantankerous. Even the Peronistas seemed to accept the general verdict. Their headquarters were dark and almost deserted the night after the election. Perón himself warned his followers to be prepared to "accept the results" whatever they were.

Today the change of atmosphere is sensational. Although only about 10 per cent of the vote has been tabulated, the unmistakable trend toward Perón has thrust the democrats into a depression as black as their hopes were bright. Tamborini and Mosca may win, but they will face an almost certain Perón majority in the Congress and Peronista governments in many provinces. This will mean a legislative deadlock and all kinds of trouble.

In Argentina the executive has great power: in certain circumstances—as we saw during the Castillo regime—he can declare a state of siege, dismiss Congress, and call for new elections—or postpone them. But the state of siege has been one of the chief targets of the democratic campaign. A radical President can hardly initiate his administration by dissolving a Congress chosen in elections he and his party and the whole Democratic Union had officially pronounced fair and free. Even if he wishes to, the President could act only if he knew he had the support of the army. In spite of its recent good behavior the army is predominantly pro-Nazi. Few people believe it would back a democratic President against an anti-democratic Congress, and it could marshal the best of democratic excuses for refusing to do so. On the other hand, a Perónist majority in Congress would block all measures except its own and so bring government to a standstill. The only possible outcome of such a dilemma would be a new and even more bitter struggle for power, with the democratic forces in an inferior strategic position.

The alternative, which still looks unlikely, is an outright victory for Perón. This would obviously bring new dangers, but it would also clarify the issue and force the four democratic parties to continue their campaign alliance. As a legal opposition they could carry on the fight against fascism openly, challenging Perón to honor his own commitment to the electoral result. If he abandoned constitutional methods, returning to his old tactics of street fighting and police terror—tactics freely used until a few days before the elections—the struggle would again become a revolutionary one. Bitter as this necessity would be, it might be preferable to a divided, indecisive result which left Perón in a position to throttle democratic government while posing as its defender.

These major alternatives, together with innumerable subsidiary possibilities, are being debated on street corners and in sidewalk cafes and living-rooms all over Buenos Aires. Until the last vote is counted—some time after March 10, when the re-balloting in contested districts in Buenos Aires province takes place—the political tension here will continue. The Argentine democrats face difficulties as challenging as any they have tackled in the past three years. They will need steady support and understanding from their friends in the United States.

Germany's Hidden Assets

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 28

THE gigantic diplomatic duel now under way between the Soviet Union and the British Empire has served to distract attention from the basic problem of victory. That problem is to prevent a resurgence of German aggression. Historically, Russia and Britain have always quarreled too soon after, and drawn together too late before, each German attempt at world power. The old pattern is reasserting itself, and the consequences may prove costly. The time has come to make public opinion realize that, despite defeat, the Reich still has enormous economic and political assets at home and abroad which can again be utilized for war.

I would like to call the attention of the thoughtful to several Congressional committee hearings held in the past few months and a number of documents which throw a great deal of light on this problem. Consider first the report made at the end of October by the United States Strategic Bombing Survey. This study shows that German plant capacity was so greatly expanded during the Hitler regime that it was never fully utilized during the war. Most of the Reich's industry was on a one-shift basis, while ours and Britain's worked round the clock. The key machine-tool industry had so enormous a capacity that 30 per cent of it could be diverted to direct production of munitions. "Man-power . . . was never fully mobilized," and the output of civilian goods "at a fairly comfortable level . . . was maintained virtually stable until well into 1944." This vast capacity does not lie in ruins. More than three-fourths of it is intact or readily repairable.

In two sets of hearings the Kilgore committee of the United States Senate has provided a picture of the extent to which the Germans are already succeeding in undermining the Potsdam program for the reduction of the Reich's war-making potential, the purge of Nazi influence, and the breaking up of the great cartels which have played so crucial a role in past German aggression. The most important of these cartels is I. G. Farben, and among the material submitted to the Kilgore committee by the War Department in December (published in Part 7, Elimination of German Resources for War) is a memorandum which estimates that I. G. Farben's productive capacity after three months of repair work "would reach 87 per cent."

The two Kilgore hearings to which I refer are those held December 11 and 12 and last Monday, February 25. The two witnesses in December were Major General John H. Hildring, director of the army's Civil Affairs Division, who has just been nominated as an Assistant Secretary of State, and Colonel Bernard Bernstein, until recently of the General Staff corps, where he was director of the Division of Investigation of Cartels and External Assets in the Office of Military Government (Germany). The witness last Monday was Russell A. Nixon, an official of the United Electrical Workers, who was for a time acting director of that division. The testimony indicates that despite excellent directives and much good intention in the High Command and the State Department, there is strong opposition to the Potsdam program among our military and diplomatic personnel.

I will cite but one example from Nixon's testimony. The Potsdam agreement and the original Roosevelt directive on Germany called for the purge not only of the Nazi leaders but of industrialists who had been their active collaborators. Richard Freudenberg was one of these industrialists. Yet his exemption from the denazification order was asked by some Military Government officials, and when the fight was taken to higher levels, "Mr. Reinhardt, representing Ambassador Murphy, insisted: what we are doing here through denazification is nothing less than a social revolution. If the Russians want to bolshevize their side of the Elbe that is their business, but it is not in conformity with American standards to cut away the basis of private property." The denazification board at Frankfurt voted four to one to exempt Freudenberg, but its decision had been temporarily tabled on higher orders at the time Nixon left.

Perhaps the most interesting part of Nixon's testimony dealt with the program to root out Germany's secret assets in other countries, notably Spain and Argentina. Last December the Enemy Division of the Foreign Economic Administration submitted a report on the role these assets had played in two world wars and on the importance of a vigorous program for their liquidation. They include funds, secret industrial agreements, patents, and laboratories. One vivid sentence in the report holds the imagination. "It may be as essential," it says, "to prevent Germans in other countries from making an atomic bomb as it is to prevent them from doing so in Germany." To read that report and the memorandum on Spain presented to the President this week by The Nation Associates and other organizations is to begin to understand how important the fight against Franco and Perón is to American and world security. The financial value of these secret assets in Spain, Argentina, Turkey, Sweden, Switzerland, and elsewhere is placed by the FEA at $1,500,000,000. Their future military value is incalculable. No one knows what surprises may be hatching for us in the laboratories of German-controlled chemical and electrical companies.

The program for eliminating these external assets seems to have bogged down badly. Nixon may have been wrong in saying that it was a violation of the Potsdam agreement to exclude the Soviet Union from participating in the hunt for hidden assets in such countries as Spain, but he was certainly right in terming it inconsistent with four-power unity. He provided a revealing glimpse of motivations in describing a teletype conference held on December 15 between General Clay and the State Department, in which Nixon participated from Germany.

The department argued that four-power operations in such countries as Spain "might breed conflicts with respect to foreign policy which it is strongly desired to avoid." But while it may be overstated, there is an irreducible kernel of truth in Nixon's charge that elements in the United States, British, and French Foreign Offices are "consciously maneuvering" against four-power action in the neutral countries because it would fully bare the character of the regimes in these countries "and would reveal all the elements of collaboration of certain interests in the Allied countries with these regimes."

The British government is against the use of sanctions to force the neutrals to cooperate. The American government is hedging on forceful action in Latin America, partly because of the powerful influence which certain collaborationist financiers and companies exercise in Washington, especially in the Alien Property Custodian's office and even in the White House entourage. Right now, while the State Department is asking the neutrals to throw open German patents to general use, the Custodian is fighting the application of a similar policy in this country. The hopeful developments are (1) the President's appointment of Randolph Paul as a special assistant to deal with the problem of German external assets, and (2) the growing signs of a new policy toward Spain. If public opinion can be awakened to the fact that German power is far from crushed, perhaps we can make some progress.

Franco's Zero Hour

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, March 1

THE Spanish issue has exploded suddenly this week as I have often predicted it would. It was naive to expect that the people of Europe would wait docilely six months or a year or two years until the big powers would condescend to put an end to Franco's provocations. The closing of the French frontier at the very moment the French people are desperately in need of the foodstuffs they might get from Spain shows that the time for words has passed and the time for action has come. That is why the note by Secretary Byrnes calling for a three-power appeal to the Spanish people to throw off the Franco yoke is viewed with some skepticism. That is why the French are insisting on a clear break with Franco. That is why France is prepared to carry the matter to the Security Council of the UNO and insists that steps be taken against a fascist power that so clearly endangers the peace. Nor are there many who favor the idea of a "caretaker government," since only a true republic can secure democracy in Spain.

Last Tuesday's magnificent meeting in the Vélodrome d'Hiver, Paris's Madison Square Garden, must have been a rude shock to those American correspondents who have been telling the people back home the French are so tired and hungry that they just don't give a damn about politics. Forty thousand people jammed the "Vel d'Hiv," and an overflow crowd of several thousand more filled the streets around the hall.

In the light of the French action, I think Nation readers will be particularly interested in the adventures of a Spaniard who has just come out of Spain with one of the most complete first-hand reports of many years. Last October in Mexico Juan Negrín and the rest of us who form the executive committee of the Spanish Socialist Party decided to send one of our best men into Spain, not to work in the underground but to see what was going on inside the country. Our man has just returned to Paris to meet Negrín and me. He traveled all through Spain and showed us railroad stubs that traced his journey into every corner of the country. With a knapsack of food on his back he climbed into the Asturian mountains to eat with a band of guerrillas; he dined with Spanish business men in Madrid's most fashionable restaurant; he saw prisoners coming out of Franco jails; he watched Falangists drilling.

Taking the unpleasant side of his account first, I must report that Franco is stronger than he was six months ago. The explanation is simple: the Spanish dictator has stopped taking Allied statements about his regime seriously. Perhaps the courageous decision of the French government to answer the execution of Christino García and nine other Spanish Republicans by closing the frontier may change his mind, but until now, at least, he has shown a cynical skepticism about the intentions of the democracies. Our man described in detail the evolution of Franco's thinking since the San Francisco conference. The Quintanilla resolution barring fascist Spain from the world community created a momentary panic in Madrid. Convinced that his days were numbered, Franco resumed his flirtation with Don Juan. A week or two passed—and nothing happened. The British ambassador continued to show the dictator the greatest courtesy. An American official told his friends in the Spanish Foreign Office that in America only the Communists and The Nation were against Franco; that Washington would never endanger American-Spanish relations just to see a few Moscow agents, disguised as Spanish democrats, take power. Given this sort of encouragement, Falangist wits soon began to make jokes about San Francisco and Potsdam; more recently the UNO session in London provided them with material for a fresh batch of bons mots. One day our man accompanied a Latin American to the Spanish Foreign Office, where he had a chance to hear some of these bits of "humor." But he was far more interested in listening to an official of the Foreign Office explain to the Latin American that the United States was highly pleased by Franco's readiness to let the Americans build airfields in Spain "which could later be used against Russia."

We had specifically instructed our man to sound out as many people as possible on the question of the monarchy. His report on this point is conclusive: "Don Juan's followers consist of a dozen grandees, a few of the elder army officers, a handful of prelates—the majority of the Catholic hierarchy are still pro-Franco and opposed to any change—and the few remaining members of the Monarchist Party, which by 1936 had already lost most of its adherents. Even experienced royalist leaders like Antonio Goicoechea, Minister of the Interior under Alfonso and later director of the Bank of Spain, are afraid that to attempt a restoration of the monarchy at this time would plunge Spain into another bloody war. Their doubts about the wisdom of such a move were increased when the arrival of Don Juan in Lisbon failed to produce any sort of reaction in Spain. Though the Pretender's visit to Portugal had received a great deal of advance publicity, it left the Spanish people absolutely cold." Whether there has been a real breakdown in negotiations between Franco and Don Juan or whether these rumors are merely a smoke screen to cover further negotiations, only the protagonists themselves can say.

Our reporter said that there are still a half-million prisoners in Spain. I thought his figure was too high, but he insisted that he had checked it scrupulously with representatives of all the political parties. People abroad, he explained, are misled into believing that the number of prisoners has been sharply reduced because every six months or so, on the occasion of some religious celebration or Falange ceremony, Franco issues an "amnesty" decree freeing thousands of prisoners. They really are freed—for a fortnight. Then they are promptly re-arrested on the pretext of having violated one of the hundreds of new regulations. There is no greater farce than the Franco amnesties.

Years of imprisonment have failed to break the spirit and the solidarity of the Spanish Republicans. The recent wave of executions at the prison of Alcalá de Henares which provoked such horrified protest abroad was touched off by a significant incident. One of the prisoners was punished for a slight infraction of the rules by having his head shaved. That evening all the prisoners appeared in the mess hall with shaved heads. As punishment, the director of the prison ordered that every tenth man would not be permitted to see his family on the regular visiting day. Those visits are a matter of life and death for many of the prisoners because their families bring them a little food. Yet on the next visiting day all the prisoners refused to see their families. At that point a bloodthirsty Falangist went berserk and the mass executions began.

The government has built up another lucrative racket through the state-controlled system of supply. It forces the farmers, for example, to sell their potatoes to the state at an absurdly low price and then resells them in the black market. The army, too, comes in for its share of the profits; Franco allows high-ranking officers to sell gasoline on the black market. The fact that the gasoline was bought from the United States explains why the army, now that Hitler has been defeated, is so strongly pro-American. Even death is a business proposition under the Franco dictatorship. When a Republican is executed at the "model prison" of Carabanchel Bajo, the family of the dead man is permitted to see the corpse for a nominal fee of 10 pesetas.

The rationing board at 21 San Bernardo Street in Madrid is the most hated spot in the city. Actually, the red tape of a corrupt bureaucracy makes the rationing system almost non-existent. Day after day long queues of emaciated women wait in front of the building to obtain their food cards; in the four months that our man spent in Spain he was unable to get a card. Prices are exorbitant: a liter of olive oil costs 20 pesetas; dried beans, 18 pesetas; garbanzos, when they are to be had at all, cost some 30 pesetas a kilo; a kilo of rice sells for 22 pesetas; the price of potatoes runs from 6 to 8 pesetas a kilo. Since the highest daily wage is 11 pesetas, the Spanish workers are slowly starving to death. One of the jokes that is making the rounds in Madrid these days goes like this: One worker asks another, "How do you manage to feed your kids?" "Well," answers the second worker, "as soon as we sit down to dinner, I begin to sing the Falange song, 'Cara al sol.' When I come to the point where I say, 'Franco! Franco! Franco!' my kids always answer, 'We are reds!' Then I punish them by sending them off to bed."

The hopes of Republicans in Spain ran high last fall when the Giral government in exile was formed in Mexico, but their enthusiasm began to fade as they realized its weaknesses. On the other hand, Negrín's position is even stronger than it was a year ago, and his interview with Under Secretary of State Acheson made a profound impression. The people have found a popular slogan in the initials of the state-operated railway system, the RENFE: "Regresando a España Negrín! Franco estorba!" The underground is absolutely against the plebiscite proposed by Indalecio Prieto; Prieto is very popular among monarchists and that section of the high bourgeoisie that has turned away from Franco.

During the last year we received frequent reports that there was widespread fear in Spain of the segunda vuelta, the savage vengeance the Republicans would exact when they returned to power. This has been a favorite theme of Cardinal Spellman, whose forthcoming visit to Spain is a subject of rapturous comment in the Franco press. Our man found that the only Spaniards who talk of a segunda vuelta are Franco's torturers and executioners. The rest of Spain lives in fear of the new reign of terror instituted by Franco. When my friend left Spain, thousands of Moorish soldiers were pouring in from Morocco. The Moors have always been Franco's favorite shock troops. He sent them against the Asturian miners in 1934. He will use them this time against the entire Spanish people unless America and Britain speak out now, as boldly as France has spoken.

The Four Germanys

BY VERA MICHELES DEAN

*Research Director of the Foreign Policy Association and author of
"The Four Cornerstones of Peace"*

THE announced intention of the Allied Control Council in Berlin to deal with Germany's food problem on a national instead of a zonal basis focuses attention on a fundamental difficulty of the four-power administration of Germany. At the present time the defeated country and its shattered capital are divided into four zones, each under the control of one of the four Allies—the United States, Great Britain, Russia, and France. This division had been advocated before V-E Day by the military leaders of the Big Three chiefly because the British and Americans feared the extension of Russia's influence west of the Elbe, while the Russians feared Anglo-American influence in eastern Germany. The political leaders of the Big Three had never proposed the partitioning of the Reich as part of the final peace settlement, except in the matter of assigning certain eastern provinces to Poland and Russia. Yet pending this settlement, which may not be negotiated until 1947, the division of Germany into four zones has had, in some important respects, the effect of partition—but of a partition whose duration is unknown.

At the Crimea conference of February, 1945, where the United States, Britain, and Russia decided on zonal administration of Germany, they also agreed to establish an Allied Control Council, composed of the Supreme Commanders of the four occupying powers, with headquarters in Berlin, to coordinate policies in the different zones. This council, however, did not begin to function until September, four months after V-E Day. Meanwhile existing German administrative machinery had broken down, and the combat forces of the Allies had to do the best they could to restore the basic necessities—water, gas, and electricity—and to assure minimum rations and a measure of security in their respective zones.

The zonal administration made the task of the Allied Control Council fundamentally different from that which confronted General MacArthur on the surrender of Japan. Moreover, Japan, being an island, can be conveniently isolated from the rest of the world and dealt with as if it were in an airtight laboratory, whereas Germany lies at the very heart of a continent seething with political, economic, and social conflicts, affected by events in the Reich and in turn affecting them. In addition, continuity of administration was preserved in Japan by retention of the Emperor and the governmental hierarchy, at least until successive purges decimated the official personnel. In Germany, on the contrary, the Nazi governmental system promptly disintegrated; Nazis were eliminated, with varying degrees of thoroughness in the four zones, from posts not only in government but also in industry, trade, banking, education, and other enterprises; and the German people, giving a literal interpretation to the phrase "unconditional surrender," looked to the Allies to reorganize life for them and to shoulder the political and economic burdens of defeat.

Divergent policies and practices in the four zones have been inevitable, given the well-known differences of tradition, temperament, and method of the occupying powers. The British, with their long experience in colonial administration, have used a relatively small number of well-trained officials to direct the activities of the Germans. Their zone is administered by a government agency which has always baffled American classifiers, the Duchy of Lancaster, previously responsible for displaced persons in Germany. The occupation forces, now assimilated with the home command in the British Isles, are subordinate to the civilian government. By all accounts, the British, with their dislike of paper work and desire to function with a minimum of fuss, have done the best administrative work of all the Allies. Their success in the economic sphere is not yet so clear. Since Britain needs overseas markets for its industrial products, some Britishers are prone to deplore any measures that threaten to lower the German standard of living. In the Allied Control Council, for example, the British have urged a higher quota of steel production for Germany than is approved by the United States and Russia. Production in the Ruhr coal mines, which lie in the British zone, has apparently lagged behind that in the Saar mines, which are administered by the French. This has been due in the main to a shortage of skilled man-power (at the end of the war nearly 80 per cent of the Ruhr coal was being mined by foreign slave labor, which began to disperse after V-E Day), but in part also to apathy among German workers, who might have been spurred to greater effort had the victors revealed any desire for fundamental economic and social changes.

The Americans, seeking quick results, have worked like beavers and occasionally, through overzealousness, have got in the way of such efforts toward recovery as the Germans themselves have made. It is generally admitted that the Americans have been far more thorough in rooting out Nazis than the other Allies, including the Russians, but these purges have seriously slowed down economic production, and at the end of 1945 industry in the American zone was producing at only 10 to 12 per cent of current capacity. The greatest obstacle to the revival of German economic activity, however, is the failure to treat Germany as a single economic unit, as was proposed at Potsdam. The four zones are still isolated from one another, and there is little normal movement of persons or goods. Moreover, Berlin, where the country's economic activities had been strongly centralized under the Nazis, has been shorn of its controlling role, and the country's economy has perforce been decentralized by zones.

The eagerness of our combat troops to return home has seriously diminished their authority among the Germans, and has given American occupation an air of impermanency that jeopardizes the measures of reconstruction, many of them excellent, devised by American officers. General Eisenhower indicated last autumn that the War Department would turn over administration of the zone to civilian officials by June 1, but the State Department has declined to accept the transfer of authority on the ground that it is not an operating agency, and it looks at present as if the army would be left in control by default, with the aid of such civilians as it will succeed in recruiting from among demobilized officers and men. The melting away of American forces has made it necessary for the United States authorities to employ Poles, Yugoslavs, and other European nationals who had been brought to Germany as war prisoners or slave labor and who for political reasons refused to return to their homelands. These "D. P.'s" who cannot be repatriated threaten to create a conflict between the United States, on the one hand, and Russia, Poland, and Yugoslavia on the other. At the same time, as Mrs. Roosevelt contended at the UNO meetings in London, it would be inhumane for the United States forcibly to return to their homelands men and women who fear that their lives and liberties would be endangered there. Credit should be given to the United States for being the first occupying power to hold elections in its zone; local elections took place in January, and provincial elections will be held in May.

The Russians, whose country was methodically devastated by the Germans, have removed from their zone all plants, equipment, and consumers' goods they needed, considering these as legitimate reparations for the losses they had suffered. The remaining industries have been encouraged to resume operations under German managers, and according to the reports of non-Russian observers, production in the Russian zone is far ahead of production in ours. Among other treasures the Russians took the cyclotron of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute in Berlin; they also transported to the U. S. S. R. a number of German scientists and technicians, who are said to have been given comfortable quarters and good salaries, with instructions to continue their studies of the atomic bomb and other related inventions. Although they have removed the top Nazis who had places on their war criminals' list, the Russians have allowed many members of the Nazi Party to retain technical positions, leaving the job of purging the lesser Nazi fry to the Germans themselves. At the same time the Russians have taken great pride in encouraging manifestations of German culture, and in expressing their respect for the intellectual achievements of the Germans. They were ahead of the British and Americans in reopening educational institutions with textbooks purged of Nazi ideas and in permitting the publication of German newspapers and the showing of German films. They have urged the resumption of political activity, with special emphasis on cooperation between Communists and Social Democrats in their area and its extension to other zones.

The French have not lagged behind the Russians in helping themselves to foodstuffs and consumers' goods, which they also consider legitimate reparations. They have been sympathetic toward separatist sentiment, especially in Baden, and have urged the Germans in their zone to dissociate themselves from "Prussianism" and to accept the cultural values of Western Europe, that is, of France. Stubbornly opposed to any revival of a centralized German state, they have refused to acquiesce in the formation of the five central administrative German departments—finance, industry, foreign trade, communications, and transport—envisaged in the Potsdam agreement. The French contend that the Ruhr and the Rhineland should be detached from Germany in the west, just as East Prussia and Silesia were detached in the east, before the Allies permit reconstruction of a central administration by the Germans. On this issue they are opposed by the Big Three, who would prefer, once they are satisfied that Germany has been rendered militarily impotent, to let the Germans handle their own administrative problems.

Serious as are the difficulties of the Allied Control Council, Berlin is now a most interesting and useful laboratory, where, out of the divergent ideas and practices of Russia and the Western powers, something resembling a common policy toward Germany is being slowly, if often painfully, developed. Here, for the first time since 1917, the Russians are not merely meeting the Western world on the formal level of diplomacy or military strategy but are discussing such common problems as food, shelter, the rights of trade unions, the publication of German newspapers, the revival of education and political parties—the thousand and one things that make up the stuff of daily living. The Russians are on their mettle not to be outmatched by the British and Americans in efficiency or humanity; the Westerners are learning that not all Russians are unbusinesslike and ruthless. Many of the thousands of Russian soldiers who have been stationed in Germany will return home with new ideas of the material comforts they would like to enjoy. These new ideas, translated into demands for improved standards of living, may have far-reaching repercussions on life in the U. S. S. R.

Undoubtedly the administration of Germany could have been carried out much more effectively, and its economy restored more rapidly, if control had been entrusted to a single power. This, however, was a practical impossibility at the time of Germany's defeat. In the long view, the experience of the four Allies in working together on their common problems in Germany, which are also the problems of Europe and the world, may be considered a valuable contribution to the never-ceasing process of international organization. What is essential now is to work out a formula which will permit the urgently needed unification of Germany's economic life without arousing the fear of Germany's neighbors that a centralized economic administration will ultimately develop into a military state bent once more on expansion. In the United States we have tended to think the French wrong in opposing economic centralization.

But it is difficult to see how Germany can be united economically and kept divided politically—which in essence was the contradictory program proposed at Potsdam. There is much to be said for a considerable measure of political decentralization, which would encourage the growth of democratic administrations in provincial cities that were once centers of German culture, such as Cologne, Frankfurt, Hamburg, Munich, Dresden, and Leipzig. If the Germans are to take a genuine interest in political and economic reconstruction, however, they must be given some idea of the ultimate nature of the national framework within which the Allies expect them to live. Allied policy on this point could be more readily clarified if the United States made it plain beyond the shadow of a doubt that it intends to maintain a continuing interest in Europe, and will back up its good intentions with political and economic action.

In the Wind

A WEST COAST CORRESPONDENT reports considerable confusion among the commissioned personnel at some of the smaller California naval bases. The rest rooms come in threes—one labeled Men, one labeled Women, and one labeled Officers.

THINGS WE NEVER KNEW TILL NOW: The New York Stock Exchange ran an advertisement in the Sunday Times a few weeks back which revealed: "Both your neighborhood voting place and the New York Stock Exchange provide common meeting grounds for all shades of opinion. . . . Second only to preserving the purity of the ballot is the need for preserving the integrity of the market place. . . . Truly, the voice of the people speaks more clearly and forcefully through this Exchange and the other organized markets of the country than through any other single means of expression, save the polling place."

LE JAZZ POLITIQUE: The London correspondent of the Record Changer, an American hot-jazz monthly, says, "It would appear that every jazz fan in Europe was a member of the underground movement."

A COMMITTEE OF LEADING NORWEGIANS headed by the chief justice of the Supreme Court is collecting funds to erect a memorial to Franklin D. Roosevelt in Oslo.

WORLD-GIRDLING AIRLINERS had just succeeded in convincing us that the world must be round after all, when along came Transcontinental and Western Air, trading as T. W. A., to throw the issue into doubt again. With the acquisition of European routes, T. W. A. has started billing itself as Trans-World Airways—a clear implication that, so far as T. W. A. is concerned, its planes are traveling across the world and to hell with this newfangled nonsense about going around it.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

Deadline in India

BY DAVID MARTIN

During the war Mr. Martin was in India as a pilot with the Royal Canadian Air Force. He has been a frequent contributor to the New Statesman and Nation and the London Tribune, using, of late, the pseudonym David Carpenter

IN INDIA a story is told about a conscientious American officer who undertook to find a solution for the Indian problem. He read books and clipped newspapers and interviewed representatives of the various nationalist movements. After four months his face had grown wan and his hands trembled. One night his roommate was awakened by terrified shrieks.

"Don't! Don't! You can't do this to us! We won't take it! Yes, you can have your loan interest free! Anything! But not that! Not that!"

"You had quite a nightmare last night," this companion remarked in the morning.

"Yeah," grunted the student. "I dreamed—" he choked. "Oh, God, I dreamed that the British had given us India by way of return lend-lease."

When I left India in September of last year, it was impossible to escape the feeling that something was about to happen. Beneath a thin veneer of peace and order, a mounting hatred of the English threatened any moment to erupt. Nowhere was this hatred stronger than in the army and in no section of the army stronger than among the officer caste.

Though the victory of the Labor Party in Great Britain aroused the hopes of the Indian nationalists, they were too much embittered by repeated disappointments to put their trust in any British government. "We will wait and see," they said, "but we will not wait long. If the Labor government does not give us independence, we will take it by force."

On my arrival in England I discussed the Indian problem with members of Parliament, government officials, and various Fleet Street Socialists. I expressed the opinion that in six to nine months there would be trouble, and not just from the aroused Indian population but from the Indian armed forces as well. Actually, in less than six months a strike broke out in the navy, developed into a full-fledged mutiny, and led to widespread rioting in Bombay and sympathetic demonstrations in army and air-force units elsewhere. It is significant that the British authorities found it necessary to use British instead of Indian troops to put down this latest uprising.

Although the Labor government is committed to Indian independence, the imperialist interests which oppose it are still powerful, especially in the Indian Civil Service, the permanent officialdom of the India Office, and the Imperial General Staff. The diehards still think in terms of the past. They imagine that the tide of Indian nationalism will periodically rise, exhaust itself, and recede as it has done many times before. At its apogee there will be riots in the cities and nasty comments in the British and American press—but nothing that a determined administration cannot cope with so long as it has the backing of a loyal army. They do not realize that India has undergone fundamental changes since the end of the last war. Then the British still controlled the Indian army. At the end of World War II they do not control it.

During the war it was customary to cite the splendid record of the Indian army as proof of the basic loyalty of the Indian people. But the fact that Indian army units distinguished themselves in Burma, Africa, and Italy means absolutely nothing in terms of allegiance to the British Raj. The Indian is a good soldier, with a highly developed martial pride. Against a foreign enemy he fights bravely, even when he does not understand the issues. Against his own people he will not fight—not today, because for the first time he does understand the issues.

First let us consider the officer caste. At the end of the last war only a small minority of the officers were Indians. The few natives commissioned were generally professional soldiers and political albinos. In this war the rapid expansion of the Indian army to a force of 2,500,000 men compelled the British to recruit some 30,000 junior officers from the student and professional classes. Officer candidates were very carefully screened. But to find an anti-nationalist among these classes would be like finding a dodo in Central Park. Those who got through the screening may not have had police records, but they were all ardent nationalists.

Why did they join the army? In the case of the young Sikhs and Punjabis, their martial tradition had something to do with it. But other motives entered in. As intellectuals they understood the nature of Japanese imperialism and German fascism. Though they hated the British Raj, they realized that India's fate was tied to Britain's. They enlisted not to fight for Britain but for India. That is why Indian officers are so tolerant of other Indians who answered the call of Subhas Chandra Bose and joined the Japanese-sponsored Indian National Army. I met only one officer who believed that Bose's companions should be treated as traitors. The general opinion was that they were honest nationalists who mistakenly imagined they could achieve Indian independence with Japanese aid.

Their experience in the army has if anything strengthened the nationalism of the Indian officers. First they are embittered by the promotion system. Indians commissioned as second lieutenants are in due course promoted to first lieutenant, but beyond that they find it difficult to go. Indian captains are rare, majors virtually nonexistent. Time and time again Indian officers complained to me about the subterfuges used to promote British officers over the heads of Indians with greater seniority.

Another source of friction was the exclusive attitude of the British officers. Apart from a sensitive and enlightened handful, the British kept to themselves. "If a British officer enters our mess," said an Indian lieutenant, "we do our best to draw him into conversation and make him feel at home. But if one of us were to enter a British mess, they would let him eat by himself. No one would say a word to him." It is small things like this that make men see red.

I recall a dinner attended by some twenty Indian officers and three Canadians. The subject of conversation, as always, was British rule in India. At one point I felt called upon to moderate by suggesting that the British Raj, with all its evils, could not be placed in the same class as Nazism, or the British persecutions in India compared with the gas chambers of Belsen. At another time my Indian friends would have agreed, but now their tempers were aroused and the Scotch had loosened their tongues.

"What is the difference?" demanded a Hindu lieutenant angrily. "Didn't three million people die in the Bengal famine? And weren't the British responsible?"

"I'm not defending the British administration," I answered. "But surely one can't compare British negligence in Bengal with the calculated mass murders of Belsen?"

"It would have been kinder of the British to have gassed our people!" exploded the young lieutenant. "That would have been better than a lingering death from hunger."

So much for the officers; what of the rank and file? It used to be thought that the Indian army was made up of illiterate peasants completely uninterested in politics. Indian nationalism, it was said, was confined to a handful of agitators in the cities. That may have been true twenty years ago, but it certainly is not today. While most of the enlisted men are still illiterate, they have become, thanks in the main to the radio, intensely interested in politics and surprisingly well-informed. Here and there enterprising Indian officers have obtained permission to organize discussion groups for soldiers. They told me that they were frequently amazed to hear illiterate sepoy ask detailed questions about the Wavell offer, the Simla conference, the election of the British Labor government, and similar matters.

Since September the situation in India has grown steadily more explosive. The Labor government has not kept its promise of turning India over to the Dominions Office; the people have been deeply stirred by the distressing events in Java and the riots in Calcutta; no amnesty for political prisoners has been declared, and the Congress Socialist Party is still illegal.

The British, of course, face almost insoluble problems, but they should realize that the most imperfect solution will be better than none at all. They are approaching a deadline. If they ignore it, they court disaster.

The Indian people expect the Constituent Assembly to be convoked as promised, and they expect self-government to emerge from it. They demand the right to settle residual differences among themselves, even if it means a civil war. The mood of India today has nothing in common with the passivity of Satyagraha. If independence does not come within the promised time, the now thoroughly aroused people of India will rise with a fury which will sweep the British Raj into the sea and perhaps destroy Britain as a great power.

Until recently Indian nationalists were wont to look to America and Russia for possible support. Today they are inclined to suspect America, partly because of our policy in China, partly because of their experience with the racial prejudices of American soldiers. And their feelings toward the Soviet Union have been cooled by the actions of the Indian Communist Party. They have never forgiven the party for sabotaging the civil-disobedience movement in 1942, and when the Communists came out recently for a modified form of Pakistan, which they had previously opposed tooth and nail, it was simply too much for Congress to bear. Nehru, without altogether abandoning his sympathy for Russia, has complained bitterly that the Communist Party behaves more like a Russian than an Indian national party.

In Indian eyes Britain's one great crime is that it keeps India in subjection. England's parliamentary and judicial system, its philosophy and literature are held in the utmost respect by enlightened Indian nationalists. If independence were granted, without haggling or recrimination, India's attitude toward Britain would change overnight. A liberated India would look to Labor England rather than to Soviet Russia or capitalist America for moral and political leadership. And through this leadership Britain could maintain the material connections which it is understandably anxious to preserve.

The Menace of Rheumatic Fever

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

A New York physician; author of "Hahnemann, the Adventurous Career of a Medical Rebel"

SENATOR BRIEN MCMAHON advanced an extremely sound idea when he suggested to President Truman that one of the tasks of the United Nations should be to form a group of scientists, similar to the group engaged in atomic research, "to discover causes and cures for the deadly diseases of mankind."

If a project like this should ever be realized—on either an international or a national scale—one of its first objectives might well be more knowledge about the deadly and crippling disease known as rheumatic fever. Dr. H. M. Marvin has written in a report of the American Heart Association: "It is the opinion of many leaders in medicine and public health that rheumatic fever and its complicating heart disease is the one important disease which is receiving the least adequate attention and financial support. Huge sums are contributed annually for tuberculosis, cancer, and infantile paralysis. Rheumatic fever ranks with these in importance, but up to the present time almost no funds have been raised to combat it."

Rheumatic fever ranks third as a chronic infectious disease in this country; only tuberculosis and syphilis are more prevalent. It ranks first as the cause of death and invalidism in the age group from five to nineteen, causing 4.5 times as many deaths in individuals under twenty as whooping cough, measles, meningitis, diphtheria, scarlet fever, and infantile paralysis combined, and also more deaths than tuberculosis of the lungs. No reliable national survey has been made, but it is authoritatively estimated that 500,000 school children in this country suffer from rheumatic fever. In 1943-44 the army reported 18,000 cases, the navy 15,000. The incidence of rheumatic heart disease among school children is between 0.3 and 0.4 per cent and among college students between 0.6 and 1 per cent.

Rheumatic fever is an acute infection of unknown cause; it is often of epidemic character, usually appearing in late winter and early spring. All epidemics of the disease are preceded by epidemics of streptococcal infections. Rheumatic fever begins with sore throat or bronchitis, high temperature, swelling of the joints. The arthritic and heart symptoms often do not appear until the sore throat has lasted for ten days. The heart is affected in almost every case. Laboratory and clinical tests permit the exact diagnosis of rheumatic fever once the doctor's suspicion has been aroused, but countless cases are not properly diagnosed in time. The most dangerous characteristic of the disease is its tendency to become chronic, with frequent and increasingly serious relapses.

Though rheumatic fever is known in every climate, the northern states and the Rocky Mountains are favored areas. It is more prevalent in cities than in the country. Bad housing, bad clothing, bad nutrition are contributory factors. The accepted method of treatment is prolonged rest in bed, often for more than a year, careful nursing, protection from renewed infection. All this requires money and a good deal of emotional adjustment on the part of the patient and his family. Neither facilities for the necessary medical care nor understanding of the disease among physicians is adequate at present.

Two years ago a conference of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor suggested an independent national organization for combating rheumatic fever. A year later the American Council on Rheumatic Fever was founded. It consists of representatives of ten organizations—the American Medical Association, the Public Health Association, the Rheumatism Association, and others—is advised by a dozen leading experts, and is affiliated with the American Heart Association. The council's tasks are to disseminate knowledge of the criteria applicable to the diagnosis of rheumatic fever, to plan community rheumatic-fever projects, to assist or initiate research. Unfortunately its means are pathetically small; only $25,000 has been placed at its disposal, though it hopes to get $50,000 more in the near future. An efficient fight against rheumatic fever would require but a few hundred thousand dollars, and it is a shame that this modest sum is not available.

A number of promising leads beckon to research workers. Sulfa drugs and penicillin do not cure rheumatic fever, but mass experiments with sulfa drugs have shown that they protect children suffering from the disease against dangerous new infections. During the past few years large doses of salicylates, given under strict medical supervision, have succeeded in bringing relief to rheumatic-fever patients. The search for the cause of rheumatic fever has not greatly advanced, but there is some reason to believe that the preceding streptococcal infection creates an allergic disposition of the heart tissues to the products of the germs. The role of heredity in increasing susceptibility to the disease is also an important object of research. According to Dr. May G. Wilson of the New York Hospital, rheumatic fever occurs in almost 100 per cent of the children whose parents have both had it.

New York University has an excellent sanitarium for rheumatic children; another, St. Francis Sanitarium, is located at Roslyn, Long Island, under the direction of Dr. Leo Taran. A few years ago the New York State Department of Health established a sanitarium at West Haverstraw which was intended to serve as a teaching center for physicians, but the project was abandoned because of the war. The only working community program is at Syracuse, New York. Organized on the initiative of a social-minded physician, Dr. Fred Hiss, it has received the backing of the State Health Department, the City Health Department, the local nursing associations, local clinics, the school system, social agencies, and various churches. A central registry for rheumatic-fever cases is operated, and a small hospital provides care for convalescents.

Such admirable but necessarily insufficient effort should be extended by a planned, nation-wide stimulation of research and social responsibility. Rheumatic fever is a growing public danger, worse than infantile paralysis. The funds needed to combat it should not have to be raised by charity.

[New developments in medicine and related fields will be discussed by Dr. Gumpert at frequent intervals.]

Middle Eastern Munich

BY ELIAHU EPSTEIN

Chief of the Arab Department of the Jewish Agency and a distinguished Orientalist

SOME time ago the New York Times published a conversation that took place in Beirut between its correspondent, Clifton Daniel, and Jamal Hussein, exiled leader of the Palestine Arab Party, who has recently been permitted by the Palestine government to return to that country. Mr. Daniel referred to Mr. Hussein's having been a refugee in Beirut, Baghdad, and Teheran, and said he had surrendered to the British in Iran in 1941 and been sent to southern Rhodesia. He did not, however, mention the reasons for Mr. Hussein's frequent changes of residence. The fact is that Jamal Hussein was accompanying his cousin, Haj Amin el-Husseini, the ex-Mufti of Jerusalem, on his flight from Baghdad. In Teheran the ex-Mufti succeeded, with the help of the Japanese embassy, in escaping to Italy and later to Germany. Jamal Hussein, less fortunate, was apprehended by the British when they entered the Iranian capital.

For four years before the outbreak of war the Arabs of Palestine, incited by the ex-Mufti and Jamal Hussein, had been creating disturbances against the government and the Yishuv in Palestine. The majority of them were violently anti-British, and influenced by the poisonous propaganda of these same leaders, displayed considerable sympathy for the Axis powers, especially Germany. Political contacts with the fascist countries had been established by Palestinian Arab politicians in the early 1930's. These contacts had the desired result when the Italians and Germans furnished the Arabs arms, guidance, and money for use against the British in Palestine.

After their flight from Palestine in October, 1937, the two cousins established "headquarters" in Syria, whence they continued to direct terroristic activities in Palestine and to strengthen their connections with the Axis. Two months after the outbreak of the war they moved to Bagdad. Anti-British circles in Iraq—including the government, which was then headed by the supposedly pro-British Nuri Pasha Said—welcomed the Husseinis and their entourage and treated them with every mark of respect. Financial aid from the Axis and the support of other Arab countries enabled them to continue their political machinations.

The ex-Mufti and his cousin exercised a great deal of influence on the internal affairs of Iraq. It was their wire-pulling which brought Rashid Ali al-Gilani to power in March, 1940. British agents attempted at various times to negotiate with them and to get them to change their attitude, but their pro-Axis activities were intensified. The abortive revolt launched by Rashid Ali al-Gilani in April, 1941, was designed to administer the knockout blow to Britain's position in the Middle East; it was expected that the Germans would invade Syria and Iraq at any moment. Throughout this crucial period of the war the Husseinis played a very important role in preparing and executing the plans of the Nazis in the Middle East. They were assisted in this by a number of other Palestinian politicians, among whom was Musa al-Alami, for the past two years accepted by the British and the Arab League as the representative of the Palestine Arabs. Musa al-Alami is now head of the Arab Office in Jerusalem, which has branches in London and Washington.

Only a few days ago an Associated Press dispatch from Nürnberg reported the disclosure of official records of the German Foreign Ministry on the contemplated "Battle of Suez." These documents showed clearly how Rashid Ali al-Gilani and his friends tried to stab the Allies in the back. Rashid Ali has been condemned to death in Iraq, but The Nation's readers will be interested to know that he is still enjoying his freedom in Saudi Arabia as a guest of King Ibn Saud.

After the failure of his uprising Ali's supporters, the ex-Mufti and Jamal Hussein, fled to Teheran. Jamal, as I have said, was captured by the British, but his cousin escaped. Until the collapse of Germany the ex-Mufti made regular broadcasts of an inflammatory nature from the short-wave radio station at Bari and later from Berlin. On every Moslem festival or anniversary his voice was heard pouring out invective against the Allies and the Jews and swearing allegiance to "our great, noble, loyal, and helpful ally, Germany." He promised his Arab adherents that he would soon return to Palestine at the head of the Arab-German army and enjoined them to be prepared to rebel whenever he should give the sign.

Not only in his broadcasts but in other fields also the ex-Mufti served the Germans well. He helped to establish in Athens the "Arab Parachute Brigade," which was to drop into Arab countries in advance of the German armies and get them to rise against the Allies. He was sent by his Nazi masters to make contact with Arab prisoners of war and to induce them to join the German army. Many of them were persuaded and displayed considerable anti-Allied enthusiasm. He allegedly made propaganda tours in Libya—when it was thought that the Axis might win in North Africa—and in Yugoslavia and elsewhere. In Bosnia he mobilized Moslems in a special "Moslem Mountain Division" attached to the S. S., employing force against those who refused to join, and he also formed groups to wage war against the Yugoslav partisans. Some of his adherents sought out hidden American and British pilots in order to collect the reward for handing them over to the Nazis. The ex-Mufti's photograph frequently appeared in the German illustrated papers, copies of which were distributed in Arab countries; one of them showed him with the Führer himself.

A paper now in the hands of the Nürnberg judges proves that the ex-Mufti shares the responsibility for the massacre of six million European Jews by the Nazis. In a sworn affidavit dated Geneva, January 25, 1946, Dr. Rudolph Kaszner declares that S. S. Hauptsturmführer Pieter von Wisliczeny, an associate of the infamous Adolf Eichmann of the Gestapo, made the following statement to him:

In my opinion the Grand Mufti, who has been in Berlin since 1941, played a role in the decision of the German government to exterminate the European Jews. He repeatedly suggested to Hitler, Himmler, and von Ribbentrop the extermination of European Jewry. He considered this a comfortable solution for the Palestinian problem. He was one of Eichmann's best friends and constantly incited him to accelerate extermination measures. I have heard it said that, accompanied by Eichmann, he visited incognito the gas chamber at Auschwitz.

If the efforts of the ex-Mufti and of Jamal Hussein and their followers did not produce the expected results in Palestine and other Arab countries, credit must be given, not to the Palestine White Paper, which is supposed to have kept the Arab world quiet, but rather to Wavell's successful defense of Egypt, the liquidation of the Iraq revolt, the Allies' advance into Syria, Anglo-Russian action in Iran, Montgomery's victories in Libya, and Eisenhower's final crushing of the Axis in the Mediterranean. Arab revolt against the Allies was seething everywhere in spite of the fact that Palestine was closed to Jewish immigration and that Arab leaders were being told by British agents that the Jewish National Home was a thing of the past. This assurance, far from reviving Arab loyalties, made things worse at the time, for the Arabs, in their primitive realism, maintained that only the weak abandon their friends.

The British government has now released Jamal Hussein from his detention in southern Rhodesia—instead of putting him in the dock with his friends at Nürnberg—and allowed him to return to Palestine, where he has again been installed as the leader of the Arab Party. In his conversation with the correspondent of the New York Times he expressed a desire to testify before the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on Palestine. The admission of his evidence would be a vindication not only of himself but also of his cousin, with whom he has always been in complete agreement on all matters of public policy. And it is feared that a sequel to this implicit rehabilitation of Jamal Hussein would be the release of the ex-Mufti from custody in France and permission for his return to Palestine.

Informed opinion about the ex-Mufti was well summed up by the Manchester Guardian in an editorial printed on November 26, 1945:

The collapse of the Nazis and Fascists should have put him at last in the hands of the Allies, but he performed another vanishing trick and got away to France. And the French, then smarting about the Lebanon affair, held him as a trump card up their sleeves to produce if Britain became too awkward. And there he is still, but well on the way to respectability again, for here are the Palestine Arabs electing him chairman "in absentia." If the British government recognizes him it will be a scandal and Nürnberg will become a mockery.

The acquiescence of the British in the "unanimous desire of the Arabs" for the return of the ex-Mufti to Jerusalem, to quote Jamal Hussein's words to the Times's Mr. Daniel, would be regarded by the Arab people as the final step in the reinstatement of the agents of Nazi aggression in the Middle East. One doubts that it would add much to the prestige of the British government, for during the war the brutal slogans of Nazi philosophy made an infinitely stronger appeal to the Arab masses than the British policy of appeasement, which they interpreted as indicating the political degeneracy of the once powerful British Raj.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Why France Needs Help

IN A statement to the French Assembly last week on the mission of Léon Blum to this country Premier Gouin said that the French government had asked for American assistance, "not as a substitute for our national effort but to allow our effort to furnish its maximum output." In other words, he asked help of a kind that would enable France to help itself. That in turn, he pointed out, would enable it to help other lands. With the collapse of Germany France is potentially the third largest trading country in the world—a great market for raw materials and for American machines, a producer of goods which the world needs.

M. Blum, who has been chosen to tell the French story in Washington, is the grand old man of French politics. Still active and animated despite his seventy-five years and his long imprisonment by the Nazis, he symbolizes both the tribulations and the resilience of his country. His task is not to negotiate a financial agreement—he is not an economic expert—but to appeal to American understanding and sympathy by presenting a broad picture of France, of its present struggles, of its hopes and fears for the future.

At the moment, it must be admitted, the average American's impression of France is largely unfavorable. It is influenced by G. I. reports of French inefficiency and lack of plumbing, by newspaper stories which concentrate on political bickering and economic confusion. Everything seems to be going from bad to worse, and a complete breakdown followed by either right- or left-wing dictatorship looms in the near distance. There are elements of truth in this picture, but in order to keep our perspective we might do well to recall that very similar impressions of this country were carried back to France in the years immediately after the Revolution, to the despair of Jefferson, who had undertaken in Paris a mission similar to that of Blum in Washington. France too has been undergoing a kind of revolution, and appearances are against it. But underneath the chaotic surface of affairs, signs of improving health can be found by those who care to dig for the facts. When we realize the remarkable progress that has been made by a people on half-rations to repair the enormous damage wrought by the war, we need not take too gloomy a view of the future of France.

French material losses between 1939 and 1945 were much greater than in the First World War. Some 443,000 buildings were destroyed and 1,361,000 seriously damaged. More than 900,000 acres of land were sown with 100,000,000 German mines, putting out of cultivation some of the finest soil in France. Transport facilities suffered terribly. The railroads were shot to pieces—with 3,700 kilometers of track, 115 out of 322 main stations, including nearly all important junctions, and 3,100 bridges put out of action. In September, 1944, only 2,800 out of 16,000 locomotives and only 142,000 out of 478,000 freight cars and passenger coaches were still in service. Highways and inland waterways—very important in France—were in equally bad shape. But the destruction was most total in the seaports, where the Germans hung on grimly to complete with dynamite the ruin caused by bombs and shells.

To this actual devastation must be added the loss caused by the exhaustion of the soil, for which fertilizers were lacking during the war; the reduction of herds; the deterioration of buildings and machinery which could not be repaired; the spoliation of stocks of raw materials and finished goods, which were practically at zero when liberation came. Altogether, it has been estimated, France lost 42.5 per cent of its 1939 capital assets, which compares with an estimated loss in Britain of 25 per cent. Even more serious has been the loss of French man-power. Military casualties number 200,000 dead, 330,000 disabled; and it is estimated that 450,000 civilians were killed, 355,000 disabled. These tragic figures make it easier to appreciate the French problem of mobilizing enough human brains and muscle to restore and carry on economic life.

In the face of such difficulties, what has been accomplished is truly marvelous. Traffic has been resumed on 19/20 of the railroad network, and last year 15 per cent more civilian passengers were transported than in 1938. Highways and waterways have been largely restored, and the reconstruction of port installations is sufficient to handle more than the present volume of foreign trade. The output of coal from the newly nationalized mines has been raised to pre-war levels despite obsolete equipment. Continued shortage of coal is due to lack of imports, on which France always had to rely to the extent of 20,000,000 tons or so a year. This is one reason why industrial production is lagging at about 60 per cent of 1938. However, the output of steel, which totaled only 30,000 tons in January, 1945, had increased to 207,000 tons in November, 1945—nearly 50 per cent of the pre-war rate. By January of this year cement production was 55 per cent of 1938, aluminum 99 per cent, glass, urgently needed for housing repairs, 147 per cent. Electric-power production has exceeded pre-war records even though the hydroelectric systems in the south have been badly hit by drought. Over 500,000 buildings have been repaired and thousands of emergency dwellings erected. Restoration of telephone and telegraph networks is almost complete, and half the mined land has been cleared.

This brief and incomplete record is proof, I think, that Frenchmen have not been dissipating all their energies in political squabbles and black marketeering; they have been practicing self-help. There are limits, however, to what they can do without external assistance. The Gouin government has adopted drastic economy measures, including cuts which will bring the armed services below pre-war strength. This program, which will tend to diminish inflationary pressure, needs to be supplemented by an expansion of production. Without large imports of modern machinery and the many raw materials lacking in France, industrial revival is bound to lag. And since French reserves of gold and foreign exchange are quite insufficient to finance the current trade deficit, French hopes are fixed on American credit. If that is denied, recovery will entail a degree of suffering and sacrifice hard to reconcile with democratic stability.

KEITH HUTCHISON

BOOKS and the ARTS

Moonrise Limited

The low, the large, the umber moon
That suddenly we saw was sailing,
Sailing level with the train,
Sailing leftward and unlawful,
East as we were, east to ocean;
And its tender side cut steeples,
And it sliced at trees and cables
As it raced—a rearward madness,
Renegade to west and over,
Runaway from arch's calm.
Low and dizzy it went with us,
Out of the window south ahead;
And its soft flank was flattened, pressing
Spaces where it once had slept;
Pressing with us till we shuddered,
Laughing, and pulled down the shade.

Sometimes I Believe

She loves me or she loves me not,
I am a fool, a wise man.
Sometimes I believe I know;
Then she is wild, is woman.

Some days she is worldly kind,
As to the millionth beggar.
I think it is for me she feels,
Then find I was but neighbor.

Some days when I least am looking
Love comes to my shoulder.
Sits and sings; but she has sent
Nothing, she says, from her.

There she lies, in sleepy shade,
And all her blood, I fancy,
Blesses the sharp thought of one
Who like a thief will enter.

So shall I slip and with outrage
Be winner of that warmth?
Sometimes I believe I see
She loves no one, this woman.

The Close Clan

Even from themselves they are a secret,
The like ones that dwell so far asunder:
So far, and yet the same; for gold is gold
In any earth, and thunder repeats thunder.

They are the scattered children of what pair,
What patient pair so long ago extinguished?
But the flesh lives, in certain ones that wind
And dust and simple being have distinguished.

Whatever these, and howsoever born,
They are the ones with perfect-lidded eyes,
Quieter than time, that yet can burn,
Can burn in rage and wonder and sunrise.

They are the ones that least of all the people
Know their own fewness, or the loving fear
Such lineage commands—that ancient couple,
And these their growth in grace's afteryear.

In them the world lives chiefly, as gold shines,
As thunder runs in mountains, and hearts beat.
They are the ones who comprehend the darkness,
And carry it all day, and sweeten it.

MARK VAN DOREN

Class and Color

SURELY if our literary people had their way there would be no anti-Negroism or anti-Semitism in this country. The American novelist's pen is firm, if not sharp, in defense of the minorities: at the moment I can recall only one novel of the last few years which formulated a reactionary position toward oppressed racial groups, and remarkably few instances where the instinct of intolerance showed itself even accidentally. Of patronage and condescension, of over-simplification and muddle-headedness and self-deception there has of course been an abundance; but no doubt the conscious process of reform must always be accompanied by these unattractive manifestations of missionary zeal.

In recent weeks there have been two new novels on the Negro problem—Fannie Cook's "Mrs. Palmer's Honey" (Doubleday, $2.50), winner of the George Washington Carver Award, and Ann Petry's "The Street" (Houghton Mifflin, $2.50), a Houghton Mifflin Literary Fellowship novel. I suppose I should say at once that neither of them challenges the prestige of Lillian Smith's "Strange Fruit"; indeed, neither of them is particularly rewarding as a work of fiction. But both novels have their interest, especially when they are read in conjunction. For there is as much provocation as irony in the fact that the far more cerebral of the two, "Mrs. Palmer's Honey," which undertakes to name the economic and political sources and cures of anti-Negroism, turns out to be really so simple compared to "The Street," which undertakes only to explain how its author, herself colored, feels about her situation.

There is no question that Mrs. Cook has thought hard and long in order to reach her conclusion that as labor goes, so goes the fate of the Negro. "Mrs. Palmer's Honey" is a civic-minded book not alone in terms of local affairs—housing, schools, community activities—but in terms of the large political life of the country. And Mrs. Cook is not lacking in the courage to proclaim her political preferences: a considerable section of her novel concerns the last Presidential campaign; she mobilizes her good Negroes to rally votes for Roosevelt and pleads without reservation the case for P. A. C. Indeed, it is specifically in the C. I. O. that she puts all her hopes for the solution of the Negro problem. But while recognizing such social and economic contradictions as segregation within the army and within the trade unions, she seems to will not to recognize any contradiction in Negroes themselves. Her characters, if they can be said to be motivated at all, are motivated only by positive or negative social impulses; there is no modification of feeling, no conflict of desires, once the path of action has been chosen. Thus, her heroine, Honey, is a parody of virtuousness, an Elsie Dinsmore of the kitchen, home, and trade union.

To find more human verisimilitude in Mrs. Petry's Lutie than in Mrs. Cook's Honey is not, however, to set up the one above the other as a social ideal. Mrs. Petry tells us the story of a young colored woman who, having lost her husband when the depression forced her to "live in" in domestic service, tries to make a decent life for herself and her small son in Harlem. Lutie is not only very pretty and energetic; she also has had a high-school education. The degradation she must suffer despite these advantages is symbolized by the dreadful apartment in which she must live, just as the whole of the Negro degradation is symbolized by the dirt and wretchedness of Harlem's 116th Street.

In her period of domestic service Lutie worked for a white family in Connecticut. By her own experience, her employers were a miserable family group—Mr. and Mrs. Chandler were unhappily married, Mr. Chandler drank, Mr. Chandler's brother shot himself before their eyes, the Chandler baby was a sad little youngster. But the Chandlers already had a lot of money and they were on their way to having a lot more; and Lutie had seen what a pleasant surface money can put on suffering. Her only complaint against being colored is that it denies her the opportunity to live with the cleanliness and financial ease of a Mrs. Chandler. No matter how hard she is willing to work, no matter what her talents, she is unable to rise above the Harlem ghetto.

By quite opposite routes, in other words, both novels have arrived at the economic core of the Negro problem. But to Mrs. Cook, equal economic opportunity is predicated on both Negro and white proletarian consciousness. To Mrs. Petry, equality of opportunity means a free capitalist economy in which the Negro individual, no less than the white, can gain as much as he desires and is capable of gaining.

I speak of Mrs. Cook's very thoughtful book as being, in the long run, rather simple compared to Mrs. Petry's. What I mean is that "Mrs. Palmer's Honey" fails to take into account the fact that is so frankly and unself-consciously admitted by "The Street"—namely, that class feelings are as firmly ingrained in the colored population of this country as in the white; that there is nothing inherently virtuous, from a political point of view or from any other point of view, about being a member of a mistreated minority. While Mrs. Cook's idealism on the score of class solidarity does credit to her, it asks, in the light of Mrs. Petry's straightforwardly middle-class document, to be corrected by a confrontation with our class realities. "Mrs. Palmer's Honey" also—and again, in the light of "The Street"—calls attention to a profound but common error in so much of our contemporary political thinking, the error of assuming that it is only in the degree that people are virtuous that they deserve just treatment. Basic to a great deal of our writing on minority problems, especially in fiction, there seems to be the idea that we must prove that members of minority groups—whether Jews, Negroes, Italians, or whatever—are good, even better than the rest of us, before we have the right to demand that they be treated like everybody else. Must a white Protestant resident of Westchester be certified for character before he enjoys his full rights as a citizen? As I read "The Street," I couldn't help wondering whether the author of "Mrs. Palmer's Honey" would be as exercised over the inability of a girl like Lutie to achieve her house in Connecticut and even a mink coat, if that is what she wants, as over the restrictions in the path of a girl like Honey, whose ambitions are so much nobler. Properly, even politically, she of course should be.

DIANA TRILLING

BRIEFER COMMENT

Memoirs in History

IN "COURTS AND CABINETS" (Knopf, $3.75) the historian G. P. Gooch presents brief accounts of thirteen memoir writers whose work is of high importance to historians. One of them is German, the others either English or French, and they range in time from Mme de Motteville to Mme Adam. The book is frankly addressed rather to those who have not read the memoirs themselves than to those who have, and it aims, successfully, to be interesting as well as informative. The character of each author is described, the scope of his work indicated, the question of his reliability sometimes lightly touched upon, and copious quotation given to illustrate his manner. Most persons, including the present writer, are unlikely to find time to read, for instance, all the forty-two volumes of Saint-Simon, and here is a pleasant way to find out something about those one will never read, as well as to discover, perhaps, others with which one would like to have a direct acquaintance. Like the professor who is said to have remarked that "everybody knows a little Sanskrit," Professor Gooch occasionally takes for granted a bit of knowledge which every schoolboy does not really have. Thus he speaks on one page of the Duchess of Cleveland and on another, in a quite different connection, of Lady Castlemaine. I doubt that every reader otherwise qualified to enjoy a book of this sort can be assumed to know that these are one and the same person.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Continuous Housing

ALTHOUGH LOUIS JUSTEMENT is an architect practicing in Washington, D. C., his approach to city planning in "New Cities for Old" (McGraw-Hill, $4.50) is first of all financial. He believes that the rebuilding of our cities could be an immediate and a continuous task which would be the best remedy against depressions. In economics he is an intelligent conservative who wants to preserve the capitalistic system by saving it from its own excesses. Slum clearance and the rehabilitation of blighted areas cannot be achieved solely through the profit motive. Like Henry Churchill, Justement believes that the city, condemning the land, should retain title to it, and ultimately become the sole landowner. This transformation Justement proposes to realize through a new federal agency, the Urban Reconstruction Corporation, and, in each city, through a Municipal Realty Corporation. (Note that under the prophetic Second Empire the Crédit Foncier was meant to be a URC; it has financed many civil improvements, as well as the building of private homes.)

The "time" approach is no less interesting than the "money" approach. Justement is of the opinion that—with rare exceptions—buildings should be paid for, declared obsolete, and rebuilt within fifty years. His outlook is neither the immediate gain of the profiteers—tomorrow be damned—nor the eternity of the traditional architects. He is planning for organic, healthy renewal and growth instead of the present "method" of disease and surgery.

Justement does not lose sight of planning in the literal sense—master plan, highways, building regulations, zoning, etc. His ideas are presented in very concrete form as a study of Washington, past, present, and future. We get a little weary at times of "the City" in the abstract: we like a case study of, say, London (Abercrombie), Berlin (Hegeman), Paris, or Sauk Center. The book lacks flamboyancy: no apocalypse like that of Le Corbusier or Frank Lloyd Wright. But it is eminently practical and quietly daring. "Above all, make no little plans."

ALBERT GUERARD

Menander and Murray

MOST READERS OF THE NATION, this reviewer included, have never read, in the original Greek, the plays of Menander. We need not feel too guilty about this, for the papyrus manuscripts containing such few consecutive fragments as we have were not unearthed before the beginning of this century. Scholars impatiently waited for more, but none were forthcoming; finally, tantalized beyond endurance, Professor Gilbert Murray leaped into the lacunae, and has now come up with his own translated and reconstructed versions of two plays, the "Perikeiromenê," and the "Epi-trepontes"—"The Rape of the Locks," and "The Arbitration," to you (Oxford, $3).

All this, and a good deal more about the New Comedy, Professor Murray explains lucidly, urbanely, and a little repetitiously in one general and two particular introductions to these plays. (There are also notes.) As to the plays themselves, they are interesting in various ways: for their ritual value, for their preservation of dramatic traditions, and for their corruption of the same; for their realistic observation of character in spite of the contrived observation of conventionalities of plot; for their combination of hokum and kitsch with passages that are really moving. They are dull in stretches and very funny at other times.

Except for the single phrase "Says you," Professor Murray apparently gave up learning slang long before he quit studying Greek; some of his verbal whimsy, therefore, his tossing around of the gay lingo of the Victorians, is just a little embarrassing. As to how much of these reconstructions is Menander and how much Murray, that is a subject on which the former Regius Professor of Greek at the University of Oxford prefers to be coy; he can rest assured, however, that the present reviewer, who sat in his classes on his visit to Amherst thirty-odd years ago, will never be the one to give him away.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

The "Tribune"

PHILIP KINSLEY'S FIRST VOLUME of "The Chicago Tribune: Its First Hundred Years," which was issued in 1943, derived a certain continuity from Lincoln's relationship to that paper. Volume II, published by the Chicago Tribune ($3), is for the most part no more than a compilation of news highlights for the years 1865-80 which must be read, if at all, in the manner of a gossip column. Fortunately, there is an index. Newspaper history tests the resources of any writer, but difficulties multiply when an author's information is such that he can, on page 129, report Karl Marx, "referred to as a leading spirit of the 'International Society,'" as dead in London at fifty-three years of age in 1871, and, on page 293, as granting an interview to a Tribune correspondent in 1879. The question is still: what is the Tribune, and why? Future volumes may help to answer this question. For reasons not given, Alfred A. Knopf is no longer publisher of the work.

LOUIS FILLER

Saintsbury on French Literature

TRADITIONALLY SCHOLARS ARE ALWAYS misjudging the public. Huntington Cairns, special legal adviser to the Treasury Department and secretary of the National Gallery of Art, must also be a scholar, for in editing "French Literature and Its Masters" by George Saintsbury (Knopf, $3) he has brought out a volume for which the public certainly felt no need. When George Saintsbury (1845-1933) wrote these essays he was doing so on order from the "Encyclopedia Britannica," and the assignment, as Mr. Cairns says in his excellent Introduction, provided a challenge for his critical acumen and his tight, eminently literate style. In his 150-page essay on French Literature from the Beginnings to 1900—as in the individual studies of such men as Corneille and Balzac and Joinville and Voltaire—he has achieved feats of condensation. It would be interesting to compare his long essay with the similar one that Lytton Strachey wrote for the Home University Library.

But if the editor has the scholarly attitude, he is not, unfortunately, a scholar from the right field. Saintsbury wrote his articles some years ago—it would be a help if this edition dated their first appearance—and naturally they lack the benefits of twentieth-century researches. For instance, most of our precise knowledge about Rabelais has been contributed by Abel Lefranc and Jean Plattard since the creation of their review of Rabelaisian studies in 1903. Mr. Cairns is aware of the strides made in this domain since Saintsbury wrote, but his Supplementary Bibliography—never very critical or even discerning—fails to distinguish the essential studies from the minor contributions. He is especially careless in the matter of translation, failing to list the American edition of Plattard's Life of Rabelais in 1931 or the availability in the Modern Library Giants of Le Clercq's classic translation of the five books. The Montaigne bibliography is likewise inadequate. In general the editor seems to have worked largely on the basis of the Library of Congress cards, a dangerous and confusing method. When one discovers, on page 325, that he is unaware that Thieme's important bibliography of 1907 appeared in a completely new edition expanded to several times the original size in 1933, then the cat is far out of the bag.

March 9, 1946

It would be unjust, in view of the date of composition, at which we can only guess, to cavil with Saintsbury's losing of Mallarmé and Villiers among a dozen now-forgotten poets or his classing of Gyp (anyone remember her?) above Maurice Barrès. But—and this is the editor's fault—anyone who attempted to correct such misjudgments would get but little help from Mr. Cairns's bibliography. Saintsbury has been taken out of the public domain of the Britannica and made available to scholars, who will class this book as a pious and misguided testimony to the memory of a distinguished critic.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

The Farmer's Partner

IT WOULD BE HARD to find a more important matter for long-range political thought than agricultural conditions in the United States, and yet, to judge by the columns of the political weeklies, there is hardly a subject about which the average liberal or Socialist knows less. Particularly is he unaware of the enormous extent to which government is an actual partner in agriculture. For this reason I found Ferdi Deering's "USDA" (Oklahoma, $2.50) a most useful book. The subtitle, perhaps, more clearly defines the theme. The United States Department of Agriculture is called the "Manager of American Agriculture."

The author is associated with the Farmer-Stockman and evidently has a wide knowledge not only of the confused or at least cumbersome and overlapping devices of administration but also of real conditions in agriculture and of the temper of the farmers. He is critical, and I believe that he makes out his case for reform of administrative processes, but his temper is always reasonable and his arguments are shrewd. He is not an anarchic agrarian or a state socialist. Nor is he an anti-metropolitan or a reactionary. As he sees it, the problem is a dual one: there must be such a balanced and flexible planning of production and appropriate streamlining of governmental services that measures shall be immediately adaptable to changing necessity. At present, Mr. Deering says, the state of affairs is such that "no man living understands the complex set-up."

RALPH BATES

Biography of Wilson

IT IS NOT SURPRISING that Woodrow Wilson continues to inspire partisanship. His personality, the significance of the issues with which his name is linked, and each fresh appraisal of the patterns of national and world history since 1919 contribute to that result. Today, the traditional epic tragedy of Wilson takes on the guise of a curiously painful success story. It is worth recalling that Wilson, an ardent nationalist, declared in his famous Senate address of January 22, 1917, before the United States had become a belligerent.

by Ella Winter

I SAW THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

"HERE are the questions one asks about Russia, and some living and personal answers."

—San Francisco Chronicle

"A report minus special pleading . . . she reports with camera-like fidelity what she saw of the Russian people . . . Hers is the sort of book we need most desperately."

—New York Post

At all bookstores • $3.00

LITTLE, BROWN AND COMPANY • BOSTON

IS THE LIFE OF AN ANTI-NAZI WORTH $25 TO YOU?

give more if you can, less if you can't,

BUT GIVE

to Hitler's first enemies and your best friends, the German anti-Nazis. Remember them? The first to feel Hitler's terror—and resist. German survivors of Gestapo torture and underground war are the only hope of a democratic Germany. And they are dying of hunger as you read these lines. You can save the life of a German anti-Nazi from death by starvation. Dare you say no? FOR THE FIRST TIME SINCE 1933 YOU CAN HELP ANTI-NAZIS INSIDE GERMANY THROUGH THE INTERNATIONAL RESCUE AND RELIEF COMMITTEE. An IRRC representative in Germany will distribute relief in Germany through the WORKER'S WELFARE ORGANIZATION, the Arbeiterwohlfahrt. This group, dissolved by Hitler in 1933, has now been reorganized by trade unionists who resisted Hitler for thirteen years. Every dollar, garment and food package you contribute is guaranteed to go to an anti-Nazi German. Send canned food and clothing to the IRRC warehouse, 130 Orchard Street, New York 2, New York. In the New York City area phone LEX. 2-7916 for pick-up service for bulk packages of 20 lbs. or more. And send a check now earmarked for German relief to the

International Rescue and Relief Committee
103 Park Avenue New York 17, N. Y.

erent, that "the peace that must end this war . . . must be followed by some definite concert of power which will make it virtually impossible that any such catastrophe should ever overwhelm us again. . . . There must be, not a balance of power, but a community of power; not organized rivalries, but an organized common peace. . . . Right must be based upon the common strength, not upon the individual strength of the nations upon whose concert peace will depend."

His latest biographer, Ruth Cranston, is an undisguised admirer. She knew Wilson and his family, was associated with the League of Nations, and had access to the private Wilson papers. In "The Story of Woodrow Wilson" (Simon and Schuster, $3.50) she has produced a lively, one-volume biography. While Mrs. Cranston is frequently persuasive, she is too much the champion. Her book is such a passionate paean of praise of Wilson, the warm-hearted man, the constant liberal, the great war President, the world statesman, that it has the effect of rendering its subject a disservice. So ardent is its defense of both Wilson and the League of Nations that a lack of balance is inevitable. Several items of major import in the Wilson story—among them the sources and development of his political and economic ideas, his position on loans and credits during the period of neutrality, and the question of the secret treaties—receive scant treatment or are omitted entirely.

HENRY DAVID

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

THE Nation

with Harpers Magazine	$6.50
You save $2.50
with Consumers Union	$7.00
You save $1.50
with Harpers Magazine and Consumers Union	$9.00
You save $3.50
with Free World	$7.50
You save $1.50
with Saturday Review	$8.50
You save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself

1 Year $3 2 Years $8 3 Years $11

Servicemen's Rate $1 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____

ZONE _____

STATE _____

3-9-46

The Camera's Glass Eye

PHOTOGRAPHY is the most transparent of the art mediums devised or discovered by man. It is probably for this reason that it proves so difficult to make the photograph transcend its almost inevitable function as document and act as work of art as well. But we do have evidence that the two functions are compatible.

The heroic age of photography covered the half-century or more following immediately upon its invention in the late eighteen-thirties. During this period its physical technique was still relatively imperfect in result and clumsy in procedure. However, since art is a matter of conception and intuition, not of physical finish, this did not prevent—indeed it seems to have aided—the deliberate or accidental production of a quantity of masterpieces by such photographers as Hill, Brady, Nadar, Atget, Stieglitz, Peter Henry Emerson, Clarence White, and others. Hill's photographs were conceived in accordance with the portrait-painting style of his time—he was a painter himself; Brady's documentary photographs, with the exception of his portraits, became art more or less unconsciously; Atget's likewise. In an instinctive way both Brady and Atget anticipated the modern and produced a legitimate equivalent of post-impressionism in painting; which was permitted them no doubt by a medium clean of past and tradition, through which they could sense contemporary reality naively and express it directly, untrammelled by reminiscences and precedents that in an art such as painting could be escaped from only by dint of conscious effort on the part of a sophisticated genius like Seurat. Stieglitz, for his part, absorbed impressionist influences in his early work but transposed them radically into terms proper to his own medium. And so, to a lesser extent, did Clarence White.

Since the beginning of the twentieth century the procedure of photography has been made swift, sure, and simple. Yet its results, in the hands of those who strive to render it art, have on the whole become more questionable than before. The reasons for this decline are complex and have still to be cleared up. But a few of the more obvious ones become apparent in the work of such a serious and ambitious contemporary as Edward Weston, a selection of whose oeuvre to date is being shown at the Museum of Modern Art (until March 31).

Two of the most prominent features of latter-day art photography are brilliant physical finish—sharpness or evenness of focus, exact declaration of lights and darks—and the emulation of the abstract or impersonal arrangements of modern painting. In the first respect modern photography, eschewing the blurred or retouched effects by which it used to imitate painting, has decided to be completely true to itself; in the second respect, which concerns subject matter, it takes this decision back. This logical contradiction is also a plastic one. Merciless, crystalline clarity of detail and texture, combined with the anonymous or inanimate nature of the object photographed, produces a hard, mechanical effect that seems contrived and without spontaneity. Hence the estranging coldness of so much recent art photography.

It again becomes important to make the differences between the arts clear. Modern painting has had to reduce its ostensible subject matter to the impersonal still life or landscape, or else become abstract, for a number of reasons, historical, social, and internal, that hardly touch photography in its present stage. Photography, on the other hand, has at this moment an advantage over almost all the other arts of which it generally still fails to avail itself in the right way. Because of its superior transparency and its youth, it has, to start with, a detached approach that in the other modern arts must be struggled for with great effort and under the compulsion to exclude irrelevant reminiscences of their pasts. Photography is the only art that can still afford to be naturalistic and that, in fact, achieves its maximum effect through naturalism. Unlike painting and poetry, it can put all emphasis on an explicit subject, anecdote, or message; the artist is permitted, in what is still so relatively mechanical and neutral a medium, to identify the "human interest" of his subject as he cannot in any of the other arts without falling into banality.

Therefore it would seem that photography today could take over the field that used to belong to genre and historical painting, and that it does not have to follow painting into the areas into which the latter has been driven by the force of historical development. That is, photography can, while indulging itself in full frankness of emotion, still produce art from the anecdote. But this does not mean pictures of kittens or cherubs. Naturalism and anecdotalism are required to be as original in photography as in any other art.

The shortcomings of Edward Weston's art do not usually lie in this direction, rather in its opposite. He has followed modern painting too loyally in its reserve toward subject matter. And he has also succumbed to a combination of the sharp focus, infallible exposure, and unselective atmosphere of California—which differentiates between neither man and beast nor tree and stone. His camera defines everything, but it defines everything in the same way—and an excess of detailed definition ends by making everything look as though it were made of the same substance, no matter how varied the surfaces. The human subjects of Weston's portraits seem to me for the most part as inanimate as his root or rock or sand forms: we get their coverings of skin or cloth but not their persons. A cow against a barn looks like a fossilized replica of itself; a nude becomes continuous with sand, and of the same temperature. Like the modern painter, Weston concentrates too much of his interest on his medium. But while we forgive the painter for this, because he puts the feeling he withholds from the object into his treatment of it, we are reluctant to forgive the photographer, because his medium is so much less immediately receptive to his feeling and as yet so much less an automatic category of art experience. This is why the photographer has to rely more upon his explicit subject and must express its identity or personality and his feeling about it so much more directly.

Nor do the abstract factors make up in Weston's art for the lack of drama or anecdotal interest. To secure decorative unity in the photograph, the posing of the subject and the effects of focus and exposure must be modulated just as the analogous elements in painting have to be modulated for the same purpose. (Of course, decorative unity in photography is made more difficult by the infinitely more numerous and subtle gradations between black and white.) The defects of Weston's art with respect to decorative effect flow from its lack of such modulation. In this Weston resembles the Flemish "primitive" painters, who also liked to define everything in sharp focus and who likewise lost decorative unity by their failure to suppress or modulate details—rejoicing self-indulgently as they did in the new-found power of their medium to reproduce three-dimensional vision. Unlike the Flemish, however, Weston tries to achieve decorative unity at the last moment by arranging his subject in geometrical or quasi-geometrical patterns, but these preserve a superimposed, inorganic quality. Or else they overpower every other element in the photograph to such an extent that the picture itself becomes nothing more than a pattern.

The truth of this analysis is borne out, it seems to me, by the fact that almost the best pictures in Weston's show are two frontal views of "ghost sets" in a movie studio. Here the camera's sharply focused eye is unable to replace the details left out by the scene painter or architect; and the smoothly painted surfaces prevent that eye from discovering the details it would inevitably find in nature or the weathered surface of a real house. At the same time a certain decorative unity is given in advance by the unity, such as it is, of the stage set.

Weston's failure is a failure to select; which is moved in turn by a lack of interest in subject matter and an excessive concentration on the medium. In the last analysis this is a confusion of photography with painting—but a confusion not so much of the effects of each as of the approaches proper to each. The result, as is often the case with confusions of the arts, shows a tendency to be artiness rather than art.

If one wants to see modern art photography at its best let

WHY

has the Catholic Church

Supported

Mussolini
Hitler
Tiso
Franco
Salazar
Peron

Why did the Catholic church support Roosevelt's domestic policies and oppose his foreign policy?

Why is the Catholic church anti-Capitalist as well as anti-Communist?

What kind of a political, social and economic system is the Catholic church attempting to bring about?

How has this affected your life and how may it affect the lives of your children?

READ:

"THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND ECONOMICS"

by L. H. Lehmann

Third of an important series of articles which began in our January issue, describing aspects of the Catholic Church never before revealed.

In the March Issue of

THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE

Edited by former Catholic Priests

Subscription only $1.00 a year (10 issues)

Canada - $1.25

Sample Copy 15¢

Check here if you want your subscription to begin with our January issue.

Return this ad with your order.

Agora Publishing Company, Dept. S-351
229 WEST 48th STREET NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
51st ST.
88th ST.
50th ST.
near LEX.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU

Queens
ALDEN
Jamaica
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
Manhattan
COLONIAL

RKO NOW

GRIPPING DRAMA OF MODERN PIRACY!

GEORGE RAFT

CLAIRE

SIGNE

TREVOR • HASSO

'JOHNNY ANGEL'

Based on CHARLES GORDON BOOTH'S Novel

— AND —

'ALLOTMENT WIVES' Kay Francis

Paul Kelly

A thousand thundering thrills!

ERROL FLYNN

ALEXIS SMITH

'SAN ANTONIO'

IN TECHNICOLOR

— and —

'DICK TRACY' MORGAN CONWAY

ANNE JEFFREYS

PARAMOUNT presents

SING BOB

CROSBY HOPE

DOROTHY LAMOUR

— in —

"ROAD TO UTOPIA"

MIDNIGHT FEATURE NIGHTLY

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

— In Person —

BENNY GOODMAN

His Clarinet and Orchestra with
The Famous Sextet

— Featuring —

MEL
POWELL
PAT
HENNING

The Mysterious Secret Places in a Woman's Heart.

John

Maureen

William

PAYNE • O'HARA • BENDIX

— IN —

SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY

Directed by WALTER LANG • Produced by WALTER MOROSCO
A 20th Century-Fox Picture

— GALA STAGE SHOW —

THE HARTMANS

EXTRA!

DICK BROWN • HERB SHRINER

ROXY 7th Ave. at
50th Street

him look at the work of Walker Evans, whose photographs have not one-half the physical finish of Weston's. Evans is an artist above all because of his original grasp of the anecdote. He knows modern painting as well as Weston does, but he also knows modern literature. And in more than one way photography is closer today to literature than it is to the other graphic arts. (It would be illuminating, perhaps, to draw a parallel between photography and prose in their respective historical and aesthetic relations to painting and poetry.) The final moral is: let photography be "literary."

CLEMENT GREENBERG

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents

MAURICE EVANS

In His New Production of Shakespeare's

HAMLET

Columbus Circle Thea. B'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
Eves. 8:30. Mts. Thu. & Sat. 2:30

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by Music by
& DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND ROMBERG
B'way at 55rd St. Mats.: Sat. & Sun. Eves. Incl. Sun 2:30 & 8:30

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
A NEW MUSICAL PLAY

CAROUSEL

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Joan Darling • Eric Mattson • Christine Johnson • Elia Afton
MAJESTIC THEATRE 44th St. W. of Broadway, Eves. 8:30
Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT

OKLAHOMA!

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Harold Keel • Joseph Buloff • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
ST. JAMES THEATRE 44th St. W. of Broadway, Eves. 8:30
Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS!"—Nichols, The Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present

MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway, Phone Circle 6-4636
Eves. 8:30 Sharp Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:30 Sharp

"THE GREATEST OF ALL MUSICAL COMEDIES"—Barnes, Herald Tribune
KERN AND HAMMERSTEIN'S

SHOW BOAT

Music by JEROME KERN, Books and Lyrics by OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2d.
Based on the novel by EDNA FERBER • Staged by HASSARD SHORT.
ZIEGFELD THEA. 54th Street and Sixth Avenue, Cl. 6-5200.
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mts. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp.

"A Gag-Happy-Meaningful New Hit"
—Life Magazine

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA. 45th Street East of B'way, CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40, Matinee Wednesday and Saturday at 2:40.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE rejuvenated Monte Carlo Ballet Russe is at New York's City Center for a longer mid-winter season and with additions to the repertory that it offered in September. I am writing after the first week, in which "Swan Lake" was added to the other great classics—"Coppelia" and "The Nutcracker"—that are enriched by the incomparable performances of Danilova, and Balanchine's "Baiser de la fée" was added to the group of his ballets after having been out of the repertory a few years.

Seeing "Ballet Imperial," "Mozartiana," "Concerto Barocco" after the few months' interval one is amazed all over again by Balanchine's constantly new invention of dance movement in his constantly developing style—by the inexhaustible flow of movements that are exciting in their rhythmic impetus and accent, their emotional impact, their strokes of fantasy and wit. But "Le Baiser de la fée" is one of the great works in which Balanchine's choreographic invention is the medium of his extraordinary dramatic imagination and feeling for the theater. In "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme" that imagination and theatrical sense produce delightful comedy; in "Le Baiser" we get their full range—in scenes which begin with radiant gaiety and humor and end with dark, terrifying violence. We also get wonderful examples of how that imagination uses traditional ballet materials and situations. I have spoken more than once of the new thing that Balanchine makes in each ballet of the movements and poses of the pas de deux of ballerina and male dancer: the seduction in "Le Fils prodigue"; the strange, ominous, menacing "Hand of Fate" episode in "Cotillon"; the exquisite, touching expression of the emotions of youthful lovers in "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme." In "Le Baiser de la fée" there is the tender, playful pas de deux of the boy and his bride; there is, on the other hand, the terrifyingly violent pas de deux in which the fairy takes possession of the boy at the end of the village scene. And this one is followed by a powerful stroke of the fantaisie Balanchine that is a further manifestation of Balanchine's dramatic imagination and theatrical sense: the fairy stands behind the limp body of the boy, her right arm extended forward over his shoulder to point out the direction he must go, and gives him a push that impels him forward a few steps; he stops, she moves up behind him with extended right arm that travels past his head to point before him, and gives him another push; again he stops, again she moves up behind him with extended right arm that points ahead, and gives him another push; this impels him off the stage, she follows him off with extended right arm pointing ahead, and the curtain falls.

Of the music for this detail one can say what is true of Stravinsky's entire score—that it is as though composed by Balanchine himself, in the way it lends itself to the choreographic and dramatic uses he makes of it. And there are pages which are enjoyable for themselves. Curious about my impression of the music when I first heard a concert performance of some of it ten years ago, I found that it was essentially the same as now: "This is, in my experience, the most agreeable of Stravinsky's reconstructions of musical styles of the past, largely because in this instance he has retained a great deal of the actual substance of the original, Tchaikovsky, with whom, moreover, he feels a closer affinity than with Bach or Handel, and whom he has treated with great affection. That is, he has scored the music with exquisite delicacy and inflicted on it less of his usual harmonic acerbity. Tchaikovsky does not, however, escape completely unscathed; and among other things a waltz—that most sensuous of musical styles—is scored for wind instruments." Now I am more sharply aware of the lovely and fascinating things Stravinsky achieves with his masterful craftsmanship, and on the other hand the occasional unsuitably twisted, dour, and ineffective details he produces with his rhythmic manipulation, his harmonic acerbity, his dry scoring.

In one scene—the final apotheosis—artistic conception is defeated by the realities of stage and theater. The conception is of the boy slowly making his way up through the water to the fairy; the realization of this that one sees is the boy laboriously climbing up a fishnet; and this might be effective if one saw it while still under the spell of the mill-scene; but instead one sees it after a long interval required for the change of scenery, an interval in which the chattering audience destroys the impression of the mill-scene and the continuity provided by Stravinsky's music.

The work is superbly performed by principals and corps de ballet—though in the first performances the dancing was not yet securely riveted to the music.

Franklin brings to the part of the boy a beautifully disciplined technical brilliance that serves a widened range of dramatic expressiveness; Tallchief, as the fairy, reveals, in addition to the assured precision and grace of her dancing, impressive dramatic power; Marie-Jeanne's two brief solos have the sharpness in dazzling brilliance that one would like to see again in "Ballet Imperial." As for Danilova, nothing I have been able to think of describes her enchanting performance as the bride as well as some of the things I have reread in Edwin Denby's old reviews—which I therefore quote: "In all the severity of exact classicism Danilova's dancing rhythm fills the time quantities of the music to the full; it does not, like the rhythm of lesser dancers, jab at a stress and then leave a gap till the music catches up. Stress and release in all their variety are equally vivid, equally expressive to watch. And in watching her you feel, in the sustained flow of her rhythm, the alert vivacity of her personal dance imagination, the bite and grace of her feminine temperament and a human sincerity that makes an artist both unpretentious and great." And "Danilova is not only a prodigious technician, but the way she points up a technical feat with a personal wit and distinction makes her the equal of any great actress."

Signed Original ETCHINGS and LITHOGRAPHS

by America's Foremost Artists

Only $5 EACH

Exclusive Signed Originals
by Thomas Benton, George Gruen, John Steuart Curry, other famous artists. Many already purchased by 200 leading museums. Values
$10 to $25. Your friends would never dream they cost only $5 each.

FREE CATALOGUE

Illustrates subjects available given biographical sketch of artists. Send 10c for postage, handling.

ASSOCIATED AMERICAN ARTISTS

Studio 283, 711 Fifth Av., N.Y.C. 22

BOOKS FOUND FREE/0¢

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating. Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-PAY.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

NATION READERS can again avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, postfree if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C.O.D.

Please address your orders to

The Readers' Service Division

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

SETTLE THE GENERAL MOTORS STRIKE—BUT NOT BY HUNGER

100 DAYS ON STRIKE

What does it mean to the wives and children?

Since Nov. 21, 200,000 General Motors Workers haven't seen a pay check. Most of them saved money during the war (those that weren't fighting themselves, 30,000 of them are veterans.) But that money's gone now. Who's going to feed their children? How are their wives going to get by—not just till the day the strike's settled, but till the first pay check comes, THREE WEEKS LATER? The emergency cases are mounting up. These people have got to have help!

WHY CAN'T THE UNION HELP THEM?

William H. Davis, ex-chairman of the War Labor Board, and ex-Economic Stabilizer, told the Senate why on January 16th. No union, he said, can support families during a mass strike. $10 a week to 200,000 men means $2,000,000 a week. The union doesn't have it.

DON'T THE MEN GET GOVERNMENT RELIEF?

In 95.8% of the cases—NO. The few communities that allow relief pay about enough to feed the children—no more. Nothing for emergencies. And in some places, the time-period for relief has already elapsed. RELIEF IS STOPPING.

WILL YOU HELP THEM?

We want the strike settled. But starvation never settled anything. Will you help us care for the EMERGENCY CASES—like the ones we describe? Experienced social workers, relief officials, and religious leaders will administer the funds you give us, direct to the hardest hit families.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE

HAROLD ICKES, Chairman

Col. Evans Carlson
Russell Davenport
Leon Henderson
Dr. Frank Kingdon
Freda Kirchway
Senator Robert M. LaFollette
Henry R. Luce
Archbishop R. E. Lucey
Bishop F. J. McConnell
Henry Morgenthau, Jr.
Senator Wayne Morse

Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr
Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam
Bishop Edward L. Parson
Senator Claude Pepper
Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt
Bishop William Scarlett
Bishop Bernard J. Shell
Capt. Harold Stassen
Senator Glenn Taylor
Walter Wanger
Walter White

Rabbi Stephen S. Wise

Wallace Thorsen, Pres., Elizabeth Janeway, Sec.
L. G. Ross, Treas., Maurice Davidson, General Counsel

THESE ARE ACTUAL CASES

Kokomo, Indiana: Mrs. E. M. is the sole support of her young son. He is now very ill—largely because she lacks the money to buy him nourishing foods.

Pontiac, Michigan: This GM worker has seven children. A series of sicknesses has depleted his savings. He faces foreclosure of his home. There is no money for food or medical care.

Buffalo, New York: O. H. is a veteran. A week after the strike started, he injured his leg. Investigators who went to his home found two children extremely sick, one of them dangerously so. Now the gas company threatens to cut off the family's gas.

Linden, New Jersey: W. D. has two children. The family faces immediate eviction because it is two months behind in paying rent. There is no money to heat the house or feed the children.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE TO AID FAMILIES OF

GENERAL MOTORS STRIKERS, INC.

212 East 49th Street, New York 17, New York

I agree that HUNGER MUST NOT BE USED AS A WEAPON AGAINST AMERICAN WORKERS.

Here is my contribution of $..... to the emergency fund to feed the wives and children of the 200,000 General Motors strikers.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY..... ZONE..... STATE.....

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has ruled that your contributions to this Committee are deductible from income-tax.

Letters to the Editors

A Memo to the Reader

[The following letter was addressed to Mr. Llewellyn G. Ross, treasurer of the National Committee to Aid Families of G. M. Strikers, 212 East 49th Street, New York. Mrs. Tilly is the committee's representative in Atlanta.]

Dear Mr. Ross: The check for $1,000 was received yesterday. I tried not to need it, but tragedy is stalking among these people, and it was most gratefully received.

One of the men who has been so ill died Sunday afternoon. I had stood for his special treatments with a promise through the funds and this may be $75. He had to have X-rays and skin tests and other laboratory tests. He leaves five of the most attractive little children you ever saw. The ages run from fourteen to five. The fourteen-year-old girl has been the mother to the group. Her father told her Sunday he thought he could not live and he wanted her to get in touch with me and tell me to put them in a Baptist orphanage. . . . Another one of the men committed suicide Sunday. These men have group insurance, but the Chevrolet plant here is trying to prevent the families getting the insurance. The union is prepared to make a court fight if necessary.

This union here has little funds and has reduced its food cards to $4 per week regardless of the size of the family. It has been necessary for us to supplement this for some of the families where there is illness; so we have scattered $5 for food here and there in the emergency cases. Rent has to be paid where rented from private parties as in most cases the owners are in about as bad shape as the strikers. To give you some idea of how it is going, I am sending you a copy of my emergency cases.

These men and their families are very brave and very fine people. I wish you could see them yourself. The mother of a baby who is getting over pneumonia said, "I do not know who is giving this money, but I could fall down and worship them; they saved my baby." One woman in the hospital said, "God is good and men are too—all but the G. M. executives."

We have spent about $500 of that last $1,000. Could we have another by Saturday?

MRS. M. E. TILLY

Atlanta, Ga., February 25

A Familiar Pattern

Dear Sirs: I wonder whether M. Spaak, on reading the accurate condemnation of Argentina submitted by The Nation Associates to the United Nations Assembly, did not wince at the familiar totalitarian note sounded by Colonel Perón and also, perhaps, at the embarrassing possibilities of the memorandum. . . . And I wonder what would be M. Spaak's reaction, and that of the delegates of other member nations, if some honest person similarly questioned the actions of the United Kingdom, or those of the United States. This is not to defend Colonel Perón and his cutthroat ilk. Rather, it is to consider the sincerity of each one of the UNO's fifty-one member nations. It would seem a sorry world indeed that would allow itself to be saddled with an assembly of grandiose talking but narrow, nationalistic men. . . . At any rate a general housecleaning is in order if this idea of "world security" is to flourish. . . .

CPL. LESTER D. ARSTARK

Jacksonville, Fla., February 4

Yaddo as Usual

Dear Sirs: During the war the Corporation of Yaddo, at Saratoga Springs, a non-profit foundation for artists and writers, was able to accept only a limited number of guests. This summer, however, its twenty-first season, Yaddo will resume normal operations. Writers, painters, sculptors, or composers who are interested in spending some time at Yaddo may receive full information by writing to the Executive Director, Mrs. Elizabeth Ames, Yaddo, Saratoga Springs, New York.

NEWTON ARVIN

Northampton, Mass, January 22

Another Housing Factor

Dear Sirs: Haunted Housing by Maurice Rosenblatt (The Nation, February 9) omitted an important factor in the analysis of the current housing shortage. . . . namely, the building-trades unions.

Mr. Rosenblatt refers, in passing, to home-building as "still a handicraft industry," without any hint that the strongest force keeping it a handicraft industry is the unions. As long as the unions refuse to permit their members to use mechanical screwdrivers or paint spray devices, how is it possible to call for modernized housing construction?

In the matter of subcontracting also the unions play a reactionary role. Mr. Rosenblatt mentions the extra costs caused by subcontracting but fails to say that a builder who cannot keep a full-time staff of construction workers is forced to subcontract because the unions allow their members to work only for contractors and the contractors agree to hire only from the unions.

I do not want to appear to be saying that the housing shortage is due to the building-trades unions. However, an analysis of the situation which neglects to point out the contributory role of the unions cannot give a true picture and therefore cannot lead to a progressive solution.

WILLIAM VOLK

Chicago, February 11

The Veterans' League

Dear Sirs: In a review of "The New Veteran" by Charles Bolté which appeared in The Nation (January 19), Walter Bernstein referred to the American Veterans' Committee as the only anti-Jim Crow veterans' organization in existence. Unfortunately, Mr. Bernstein overlooked the Veterans' League of America. . . . The league starts from the premise that the welfare of the veteran is inseparable from the welfare of the entire country—Negro and white, Jew and Gentile. In line with this principle, the Veterans' League of America has already committed itself on a number of

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.

MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ♦ ♦ 29 LANGUAGES

Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE

81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

THROUGH MARCH 30 6th Exhibition

ART OF THE G. I.

Drawings and Paintings of the New Veteran

THE TRIBUNE

International Bank and Art Center

100 WEST 41st ST. COR. 6th AVE.

6th Ave. Subway Arcade, downstairs in the building of Schulte Cigar Store

Crossword Puzzle No. 151

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Dear me! It will have to be done again
- 5 Begin to debate something taken up at the Olympic Games
- 9 Like Contrary Mary's pretty maids
- 11 The Willing One in David Copperfield
- 12 No bail for him!
- 13 Is 800 feet longer than a land one (two words, 3 & 4)
- 14 A corner "to lie and read in"
- 17 Twinkle
- 19 A certain winner, perhaps (two words, 4 & 5)
- 22 Sundaes after five are bad for you
- 23 Out of bed I leapt at the first alert (hidden)
- 25 The "rage" in England
- 26 A flatterer, this insect
- 27 Takes off the pressure
- 29 Bright boy
- 31 Female forger? No, a town in South Africa
- 34 Not a large branch
- 36 But this is a large knife
- 37 Might as well be out of the world as out of this
- 39 Better half as good as a mile
- 40 Greek islands which might slightly electrify a Scot
- 41 Motives
- 42 Design (anag.)
- 43 A couple of G's are offered for the animal (hyphen, 3-3)

DOWN

- 1 Birds who bump off their parents
- 2 Conrad wrote it of the sea
- 3 Ida's elevated
- 4 Not here? Then where else could it be?
- 5 Pushed out the pasteboards

- 6 As a painted ship upon a painted ocean
- 7 "I'm afraid it's a hit," he remarked, after the first act
- 8 Infantry air transports
- 10 G.I. packs 'em in
- 15 A wolf turns up in the issue
- 16 Circular assembly gadget for locking devices
- 17 Where 100% Americans hold their political conventions?
- 18 Net wage (anag.)
- 20 The perfect type
- 21 What some may still call a hot coal
- 24 Describes the primrose path
- 25 They are not window drapes
- 29 A licking does them no harm
- 30 Type of British army hut
- 32 Politicians would prefer this to an outing, any day
- 33 Slang for a German
- 35 Leveled to the ground, but doesn't sound like it
- 37 A good servant but a bad master
- 38 May ravage a rose with impunity, said Wordsworth

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 150

ACROSS:—1 DEMOCRATS; 6 RIFLE; 9 ARTEMUS; 10 OLD MAID; 11 TRELLIS; 12 SPENCER; 13 SEE; 15 PASTEL; 17 OSWEGO; 18 ACTOR; 19 RELIED; 22 CULLEN; 23 HAS; 27 IGNOBLE; 28 ESSENES; 30 ASTORIA; 31 TRIVIAL; 32 SUMPS; 33 DEMAGOGUE.

DOWN:—1 DRAFT; 2 MITTENS; 3 CAMILLE; 4 ASSESS; 5 SPOUSE; 6 RED-LEGS; 7 FIANCEE; 8 EIDERDOWN; 14 EXTRA; 15 PARTISANS; 16 LAD; 17 ORC; 20 LONG TOM; 21 EMBARKS; 23 UNSLING; 24 LANDING; 25 HERALD; 26 SEPTUM; 29 SOLVE.

The NATION

vital issues. To name some of the important ones:

We have indorsed labor's efforts to gain a substantial wage increase and we are cooperating with labor wherever possible.

We are working for the continuation of rent and price controls to prevent the pauperization of the veteran and the country.

We are cooperating with the Committee for a Permanent FEPC to gain the passage of this vital measure.

We are opposed to compulsory military training.

We support the 65-cent minimum-wage bill and the full-employment bill as passed by the Senate.

We are working for a democratization of the army and a complete renovation of the army system of military justice, including taking the review of sentences already handed down out of the hands of the military and placing it under the jurisdiction of a civilian committee.

We support a program to feed the starving abroad as a humanitarian responsibility and as a practical program of international good-will.

We support a program of training in democracy in our schools and in the armed forces.

The league has its headquarters at 45 Astor Place, New York, 3.

ANTON LEVY,
Chairman, Anti-Discrimination
Committee, V. L. A.

New York, February 8

"Hate . . . Fury . . . Brutality"

Dear Sirs: I came away sizzling from the movie "Cornered," to read Margaret Marshall's essay on art in democracy (The Nation, February 9). I could only agree with her use of the words "brutalizing" and "vicious" in describing much of our entertainment today.

Recently a movie was banned from New York for immorality. Yet a story which portrays and justifies a man-hunt for hate alone is given top reviews. . . . Such hate feelings underlie the acts of violence we read about every day in the papers. After seeing "Cornered," anyone harboring a red-hot fury would feel justified in giving way to his anger. To disguise brutality under the cloak of the fight against fascism is not just poor taste; it is misrepresentation of the most dangerous sort. It makes a mockery of the courage of men who died because they really understood the meaning of freedom.

LOIS KIDDER
New York, February 17

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 16, 1946

NUMBER 11

The Shape of Things

THE SOUTHERN DEMOCRATIC-REPUBLICAN coalition in Congress is up to its old tricks. Too vote conscious to reject outright proposals which have popular appeal, its members have developed a slick technique for cutting the vitals out of forward-looking measures. The latest victim of their reactionary surgery is the Patman emergency home-building bill, which has been passed by the House minus authorization of subsidies required to relieve material bottlenecks and minus provision for fixing prices of old houses, speculation in which is rampant. Not content with this mutilation, a diehard minority sought to freeze the bill to death by sending it back "without instructions" to the Banking and Currency Committee. Most legislators, however, were not prepared to go to these lengths, being aware that a million or more homeless veterans were watching them. Having satisfied the building-material and real-estate lobbyists by rewriting the bill into ineffectiveness, they came out for housing in general with an easy mind.

✱

SOMETHING VERY SIMILAR IS LIKELY TO happen to the bill prolonging the life of the OPA unless consumers join in a mighty shout of protest that will drown the clamor of the special interests. Gallup polls and other expressions of public opinion have shown that a large majority of the electors want the OPA continued after June 30. Congress will not flout this demand, but the conservative majority there will do its damndest to cripple the bill. Already the Senate has slashed appropriations for the agency—an effective method of hampering its overworked staff. In the House plans are being concocted to procure exemptions from price ceilings for certain categories of goods, such as dairy products. Another amendment now being canvassed would require removal of price controls from any item when its production reaches pre-war levels. This would immediately remove ceilings from a number of essential products—meat is an example—supplies of which are in excess of pre-war volume but which, nevertheless, remain scarce because of the much greater effective demand at this time. If amendments of this nature are carried, the OPA, though nominally saved, will in fact have been doomed to futility.

OUR INTENTIONS IN THE MATTER OF SPAIN remain obscure. As we study the words and actions of our State Department we can hardly blame other nations for wondering what, if anything, is American foreign policy. The three-power statement was tough double-talk, and we ought not to be surprised that the Giral government received it with dismay and Franco with arrogant unconcern. Our subsequent coyness to the French proposal to submit the matter to the Security Council fully justifies both reactions. In one of the documents recently released with the three-power statement Hitler writes to Franco: "Only in the case of our victory will your present regime continue to exist." Hitler knew what he was talking about. Franco was his junior partner, wholeheartedly devoted to him. Franco's Spain was a useful supplier to Nazi war needs, a useful base for Nazi espionage. More than that, Franco's Spain, as Professor Sanchez Sarto demonstrates on another page, during the war became completely integrated into the colonial order of Nazi Germany. When that order and its leaders went down in utter destruction before the Allied arms, it seemed logical, inevitable, that Franco too would go. For there was nothing to hold him up. Nothing, that is, except the props supplied him by the faltering voices of the victorious democracies. Surely the time has come now to blast out those props. The loud, stern voice of democracy, which has been silent too long, would have a cleansing effect in the confusion of power politics today.

✱

WE DON'T BLAME R. J. THOMAS FOR PUTTING up a fight to retain the presidency of the United Automobile Workers against a strongly backed challenge by Walter Reuther. But we are sorry to see him resorting to tactics which play into the hands of General Motors. Addressing a meeting of presidents of union locals called to pass on the Ford contract, Mr. Thomas went out of his way to make an unfair attack on Reuther. "Where is my opponent today?" he asked. "Is he trying to settle the General Motors strike? . . . That's what he should be doing. He's more worried about taking my job." These words are sure to be picked up with avidity by the General Motors vice-president, Harry Anderson, as justification for his recent charge that union politics were

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	301
Churchill's "Union Now"	303
Hold the New Line!	304
Strengthening Congress by Maxwell S. Stewart	305

ARTICLES

U. S. and U. S. S. R. by I. F. Stone	306
Spain—a Nazi Colony by Manuel Sanchez Sarto	307
Sons of the Wild Jackass—1946 by Richard L. Neuberger	309
Ersatz Orchids for UNO by Aylmer Vallance	311
The Myth of World Government by Reinhold Niebuhr	312
Japan's Press Revolution by Andrew Roth	315
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	316
The People's Front by Del Vayo	317

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

What They Missed by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.	318
Two Poems by Robert Lowell	318
Seven Women Poets by Mildred Adams	319
Briefer Comment	320
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	324
Records by B. H. Haggin	324
Books in Short	325

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 326

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 152 By Jack Barrett	328
---	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchway

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart
Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey
Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building, Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $5; Two years $9; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Librarians: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

delaying a settlement of the strike. Mr. Anderson told reporters that a return to work probably would not take place until after the Atlantic City convention of the union beginning March 23 because candidates for office, jockeying for position, were unwilling to take responsibility for coming to terms. Actually, if Walter Reuther could go to the convention with a satisfactory contract in his pocket, his chances of victory over Thomas would be greatly enhanced. Aware of this, General Motors executives appear to be playing union politics themselves, holding up a settlement with a view to defeating Reuther, whose ability, courage, and drive they rightly fear. At least it is hard to explain otherwise their refusal to arbitrate the few remaining points of disagreement between the company and the union.

✱

SOME OF THE FINEST WORDS IN FREEDOM'S vocabulary grace the new constitution proposed for Japan, but before becoming too optimistic, we should be wise to remember that the document is the product of a government absolutely lacking in democratic elements. The proposed constitution is merely one more concession which Japan's "old gang" has had to make under pressure from the Japanese people and the occupation authorities. And while the people have seized their opportunity to establish a democratic press and begin rebuilding their shattered political and labor organizations, the old order still retains the substance of power. The vitally important Home Ministry, for instance, which controls the police and has sole responsibility for the conduct of the coming elections, as well as for passing on candidates, has been virtually unchanged by General MacArthur's well-publicized purges. While top military fascists have been arrested as war criminals, they have almost invariably been succeeded by former subordinates with similar outlook but less conspicuous records. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that the fine words of our directives have been sabotaged. The new constitution will receive the same treatment so long as the present Japanese bureaucracy remains.

✱

AMERICANS CAN NOW SEND AID DIRECTLY to anti-Nazi survivors of the resistance inside Germany and their families. The miracle is that they are not all dead. Gestapo records show that they were being arrested at the rate of 3,000 a month as late as the first six months of 1944. Since V-E Day the survivors have been quietly dying of hunger. Infant mortality rates are a significant index: one out of four children in Germany dies in its first year. Last week a Presidential order created CRALOG (Council of Relief Agencies Licensed for Operation in Germany) and designated the International Rescue and Relief Committee as one of eleven member agencies authorized to give relief in Germany.

All funds, food, and clothes contributed to the IRRC will be distributed by its representative in Germany to proved anti-Nazis and their families only. The address is 103 Park Avenue, New York 17, New York.

✱

AT GENEVA, HOME OF THE REFORMATION, a group of Protestant churchmen recently held a conference which was crowded off the front pages by the highly publicized consistory in Rome. The resolutions passed by the provisional committee of the World Council of Churches had a direct bearing on the very problems lately faced by the United Nations Assembly in London. The approach was somewhat different. People rather than powers were the main issue—the incalculable misery and want of the homeless millions in Europe and Asia; the inhumane treatment of the German populations transferred out of Poland and Czechoslovakia; the particular claims of Europe's Jews rotting in the displaced-persons camps; the muddled policy of the Allies on Germany, which pointed toward no rebirth of freedom. These problems, declared the committee, are not only the responsibility of governments and the United Nations Organization but must press upon the consciences of the people of the more fortunate lands, the people of the great churches which long ago professed the faith that the world is one. It is a satisfaction to know that the provisional committee set up a Commission of International Relations which will seek "to stimulate the churches of all nations to a more vigorous expression of the demands of the Christian conscience in relation to the political policies of government." The Nation is particularly glad that its associate, Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, has been named one of the American representatives.

Churchill's 'Union Now'

NEXT to the remarkable ineptness of President Truman's apparent sponsorship, the most painful aspect of Winston Churchill's speech at Westminster College was its timing. Coming on top of the get-tough-with-Russia sentiments expressed by Senator Vandenberg and Secretary of State Byrnes, the Churchill blast at the Soviets has been widely interpreted as a logical extension of the Americans' approach, the more so because the President saw fit, as Churchill said, "to travel a thousand miles to dignify and magnify" the occasion. But the sober and reassuring truth is that there is a vast gulf between the Churchill and the Byrnes-Vandenberg positions. The differences should be sounded like a foghorn in the murky atmosphere that is settling down over the Big Three.

The two Americans, to begin with, focused their attention on the United Nations Organization, its successes to date, the hopes for its future, the need to strengthen it, and the absolute necessity of dealing solely through its machinery with the waywardness of any one power. Churchill, in contrast, told the world that he lacked "the same confidence or even the same hopes" in the UNO that he had entertained for the sterilized League of Nations back in 1920. Second, where Byrnes emphasized that "in this world there is room for many people with varying views and many governments with varying systems," Churchill raised to the status of an international menace the activities of Communist parties "seeking everywhere to obtain totalitarian control." Above all, Byrnes opposed any change in the "power relationships" of the great states for fear of "profoundly disturbing the whole structure of the United Nations," while Churchill would weld the Anglo-American world into a solid unit of power. Byrnes pledged that "we will gang up against no state," but Churchill's whole thesis for a "fraternal association of the English-speaking powers" was a bold call for a military alliance. Byrnes, in short, talked like a man determined on peace, Churchill like a man committed to war.

To Churchill, fighting for the continued greatness of England, a junior partnership with the United States undoubtedly holds out hope, and if the question could be threshed out in a vacuum, he could make an excellent case. The empire is in flames—in Egypt, in India, in the Near East—and is challenged at its most vital spots by the rising power of the Russians. A Western bloc has been ruled out by pressure on France and the Scandinavian countries from the Soviets, which would look upon such an arrangement with fear and belligerent antagonism. The only way out, to a Tory mind, is the kind of link-up with the United States that Churchill has proposed. But not all Englishmen are Tories, and the best of Britain's leaders surely see that their country's hope lies in converting the empire into a genuine commonwealth of free nations—a union ready-made, in which Britain's 40,000,000 people could count on the raw materials they need through the preferential treatment accorded by equals rather than the exploitation of colonial subjects. Only in this way can England undermine the Communist influence of which Churchill complains, and only in this way can England assure the welfare of its population without altering those "power relationships" which Mr. Byrnes sees as the foundations of world peace.

Apart from the nature of his motives, Churchill has adopted a strategy and a tone that will serve neither the good of Britain nor the cause of world peace. He has added a sizable measure of poison to the already deteriorating relations between Russia and the Western powers. He has given the Soviets ground to intensify their unilateral pursuit of security, and at the same time "confirmed" the Wheelers in their shrill contention that the war to save democracy was in reality a war to spread communism. He has undermined faith in the UNO at a moment when it is struggling to assert its first dignity and strength. He has stiffened the necks of those ostriches who think to keep the atomic bomb a secret. And, ironically, he has prejudiced the chances of the loan to Britain by arousing once again the suspicions of those who fear to be drawn into a defense of the British Empire.

Altogether a bad day's work, and one that can be undone only if Messrs. Attlee and Bevin make it clear to the world that the policies of Britain are determined at Westminster on the Thames, and not at Westminster College, Missouri.

Hold the New Line!

TO JUDGE by press comments, the Administration's new wage-price policy is doomed to failure. Both the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. have attacked it for requiring government approval of wage increases, and John L. Lewis has indicated that the United Mine Workers will demand increases considerably in excess of the maximum set by the Administration. In Congress the farm bloc threatens to go on the warpath again with a demand for a new method of computing parity which would prevent stabilization of prices and wages on the new level. Big business is uncompromisingly opposed to the whole program; reflecting the disappointment of speculators who had envisioned an era of unrestricted profits like the lush '20's, Wall Street suffered its sharpest relapse in more than five years. Leading financial papers such as the Wall Street Journal have launched a non-stop campaign of abuse against Mr. Bowles and price control of any kind. The National Association of Manufacturers is combating extension of the Price Control Act beyond June 30.

It is easy to point out flaws in the Administration's new formula. Since it represents a middle course between the views of those who want to see the price line rigidly held and of groups hell bent for inflation, it really satisfies no one. In opening the door to price increases throughout industry and coupling them to wage increases, Mr. Truman has set in motion a chain of events that will be extremely difficult to stop. Marriner Eccles, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, was merely uttering an economic platitude when he declared that in the present economic situation wage increases are justifiable only if paid out of profits without price increases. And there is considerable evidence to confirm his estimate that as a result of the new policy living costs will rise 10 per cent, even though Mr. Bowles hopes to limit the rise to half that amount.

But this is no time to hold out for perfectionism in our economic policies. Although wages and prices are fundamentally economic matters, it is idle to pretend that the Administration could be guided by economic considerations alone. In labor's demand for take-home pay comparable to that earned during the war were psychological factors that could not be ignored. And while the most recent corporation-earnings reports do not indicate any general squeeze on profits, it is obvious that, in many instances, meeting labor's demands would cut into earnings sufficiently to cause considerable mental distress on Wall Street. Although we regret that Mr. Truman gave way as much as he did to these pressures, some sort of retreat from the war-time price line was inevitable. Now that the retreat has started, only one course of action is open to public-spirited citizens. That is to rally to the support of Mr. Bowles and his new Price Administrator in their efforts to establish and hold a new line.

Despite the outcry of business and farm groups, we believe that Mr. Bowles has the backing of the overwhelming majority of the American people. The C. I. O. has come out strongly for the continuation of strengthening of price controls. Among the more independent business groups, the Committee for Economic Development has urged the extension of the Price Control Act, and Henry J. Kaiser, head of twenty-five industries operating fifty plants, has not only asked Congress to continue price ceilings but has urged a reinstatement of war-time allocation controls. If housewives and ordinary consumers were organized half as well as the dominant business groups, Congress would be feeling the effect of their insistence on more vigorous measures to control inflation. But because consumers are largely unorganized, there is grave doubt whether the OPA will receive sufficient funds to do its job. Last week the Senate cut $1,677,000 from the agency's budget. Yet its task has been immensely increased by the necessity of reviewing virtually all its existing price schedules and enforcing its decisions against widespread business hostility.

Strengthening of our price-control machinery, however, is only one of the important steps that must be taken if inflation is to be prevented. We must be on guard against additional tax cuts, against a further relaxation of controls on raw materials which are in short supply, and against liberalization of the present restrictions on credit expansion. Although the safeguards which must be maintained are of war-time origin, it is well to recall that they were imposed not against an external enemy but against people in our midst who would have taken advantage of emergency conditions to inflict untold injury on their fellow-Americans. The conditions which prompted these emergency measures will not disappear until normal production has been restored and the cost of living stabilized.

COMING IN THE NATION

P. E. Corbett.....UNO—A Trial Balance
Ignazio Silone.....Remember How Freedom Died
Robert Lasch.....Homes from the Assembly Line

Strengthening Congress

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

NOTHING would be more erroneous than to judge the importance of the report of the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress by the meager amount of newspaper space given it. This is no ordinary Congressional committee report. Nor is it a run-of-the-mill proposal for Congressional reorganization. It is in many ways an extraordinary document. Recognizing that a "grave constitutional crisis exists in which the fate of representative government is at stake," the committee made a valiant, and unique, attempt to come to grips with fundamentals. While many of its proposals necessarily deal with superficial details—such as the raising of Congressional and staff salaries, the creation of a stenographic pool, and the improvement of restaurant facilities—the bulk of the report is given over to issues that are undeniably central in any program for forging Congress into an effective legislative instrument. Some of its recommendations were unexpectedly good; there were few to which serious exception should be taken; but in many instances the committee stopped just short of proposals that would eliminate the defects that it clearly recognized.

Few will care to dispute, for example, the committee's proposals for streamlining legislative procedures. Recommendations are made for lifting many non-essential burdens from Congressional backs—such as governing the District of Columbia—for strengthening the control over expenditures, for expediting legislative business, and for requiring that every bill be accompanied by a readable, non-technical digest so that it may be readily understood. So far, so good. But in speaking of speeding up legislative procedures the committee is strangely silent on the two most defenseless of all practices for delaying and perverting the legislative will—the filibuster and the restrictive powers of the House Rules Committee. Nor does it come to grips with the practice that is the greatest of all Congressional time-wasters—the use of Congressmen as errand boys for their constituents. Each Congressman, it is true, is to be given an $8,000 administrative assistant, together with other research and technical aid, which is supposed to relieve him of a large part of his non-legislative load. Yet this merely gives legal sanction to the Congressman's dubious function of lobbying for his constituents in the administrative agencies.

The proposals for a reorganization of the standing committees of the House and Senate are in many ways better than was expected. The Senate's thirty-three committees are to be merged into sixteen, and the House's forty-eight into eighteen. House and Senate rules are to be amended to avoid overlapping or conflicts over the jurisdiction of the various committees. Unfortunately, however, the proposed House and Senate committees are still not entirely parallel, thus precluding the economy of joint sessions. No effort seems to have been made, moreover, to plan the new committees in such a way as to correspond, wherever possible, to the administrative departments. Had this been done it would have greatly simplified the task of reviewing administrative operation, which is to be lodged, under the Joint Committee's recommendation, in the standing committees.

Regarding the most glaring evil in the present committee system—the seniority rule—the Joint Committee is conspicuously silent. Although it would trim the authority of the committee chairmen in several respects, it makes no suggestions for improving the quality of chairmanship or for a more democratic method of selection. Its failure to come to grips with this problem is particularly distressing because a reduction in the number of committees would tend to put more concentrated power in the hands of the remaining chairmen, thus making it easier for a small group of undefeatable representatives from the poll-tax states to exercise effective control over all legislative matters. Seniority rule is one of the chief obstacles to the creation of an effective system of party responsibility in the United States. This has been evident time and time again in recent years, when committees that were theoretically dominated by the majority party have held up or emasculated essential parts of the Administration's legislative program.

In an effort to assure greater party discipline and provide the mechanism for a system of party responsibility, the Joint Committee proposed the establishment of majority and minority policy committees in the two branches of Congress. In order to escape the dead hand of seniority, these committees would be chosen by party caucus at the beginning of each Congress. And to provide the badly needed teamwork between Congress and the Executive, the majority policy committees of the House and Senate would meet regularly with the President and members of the Cabinet to formulate basic national policy. This is by far the most significant recommendation in the Joint Committee's report; yet its significance has been almost completely overlooked by the press. If put into effect, this country will have for the first time a machinery for working out a coordinated legislative program for which the majority party would be clearly responsible to the public. The program of the opposition could be similarly clarified and tested by public opinion.

It is unfortunate that the promise of this proposal should be so largely nullified by the Joint Committee's timidity in dealing with issues like the filibuster and seniority rule. Fortunately, it is still possible to raise these issues on the floor of both houses when the program comes up for Congressional consideration.

U. S. and U. S. S. R.

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 10

THE past seven days have been a kind of war-with-Russia week in the capital. Before plunging, much beyond my depth, into the complexities of Iranian, Bulgarian, Turkish, and Manchurian politics, I should like, to set down a few tentative observations which may provide a framework for understanding what is going on.

It seems to me that there are three basic problems involved in our relations with the Soviet Union. The first arises from the fact that every great war upsets the balance of power; a new balance must be established and stabilized to maintain peace among the victors. The second arises from the fact that the Russians, having suffered severely in the war, are acutely conscious of their security needs; some peaceful means for meeting them must be found. The third arises from the fact that we are the possessors of the most frightful weapon yet discovered by man; we should be uneasy if it were in the U. S. S. R.'s exclusive possession.

The adjustments required must be made with due consideration for the needs of our other major ally, Great Britain. Means must be found to allow for the Soviet Union's legitimate needs in a way which will not harm the equally legitimate security requirements of Britain. This requires changes in the status quo ante, and such changes are naturally painful for a great world empire like Britain's. The preservation of peace also requires another sacrifice on Britain's part, and that is the development of a genuinely progressive colonial policy which will satisfy the aspirations of its subject peoples for self-government. They will otherwise look to Russia for inspiration, and add to the forces making for war.

In such a context one would say that the Soviet Union had a legitimate security interest in the Dardanelles and in the Dodecanese Islands, which command the approach to them; these are as much the U. S. S. R.'s "lifeline" as Gibraltar is Britain's and Panama our own. But one would also say that the Soviet Union had no legitimate security interest in Tripolitania, which lies athwart Britain's own lifeline to the Suez. In such a context one would also recognize that the Soviet Union had a legitimate interest in the Middle East. Britain no longer has the power to bottle Russia up in the Black Sea or to keep it out of the Middle Eastern oil preserve. Nor does it have the right to do so, in a truly international system. One can also recognize that, given a willingness to make the concessions indicated, Britain would have a right to some special guaranties from the United States. One could also say that the British might be wiser to make these adjustments on their own, to avoid becoming an American dependent and to be in a position to play an independent role vis-a-vis both the United States and the U. S. S. R. It need hardly be noted that there were no such perspectives in the Churchill speech at Fulton, but only a naked call for an Anglo-American alliance against the Soviet Union in defense of the status quo.

It is not Britain alone which must make concessions if a new world order is to be stabilized. The United States must recognize that to talk in implicit terms of "democracy" in Eastern Europe, in the Middle East, in the Far East, and in much of Latin America is usually to support small reactionary upper classes against a mass of ignorant and miserable people. The latter are certain to swing toward communism, and thus to poison relations between the West and the Soviet Union, unless we are willing to make our vast capital resources available for the development of these areas in conjunction with our Allies and with the people who live there. It need hardly be noted that as yet we show little willingness to participate in such a program; on the contrary, even the loan to Britain may pass only because Churchill has made an ingratiating appeal to rightist elements more interested in fighting Russia than in helping England. He antagonized old friends like Pepper and won the applause of old enemies like Wheeler.

The financial sphere is not the only one in which the United States must shoulder new responsibilities. It is quite true that the United States cannot, if peace is to be preserved, give in to unlimited expansionist demands by the Soviet Union. But the question to be answered is whether they are unlimited, and where we draw the limit. We must consider each dispute on its merits, adopt concrete policies, and be prepared both to negotiate compromises and to stand firm. The difference between Churchill's speech and those of Vandenberg and Dulles is that the former shuts the door on such negotiation. The difference between the speeches of Vandenberg and Dulles and the address made by Secretary Byrnes at the Overseas Press Club is that the latter invites peaceful discussion. It promises that we will "gang up against no state," that we will seek to do more than "to defend the dead hand of reaction," that our diplomacy will not be "inert," that it will develop "constructive proposals."

Unfortunately, there is as yet no sign here that this aspect of the Secretary's address is being carried out. The other aspect of it, the firm line, is evident enough. There is little doubt that our protests on Iran and Manchuria are justified, though our protest on Bulgaria would be improved if our representative in Sofia, Maynard Barnes, had not been working so openly with reactionary elements. But it is not enough to protest infractions of agreement; it is necessary to sit down and discuss grievances concretely and to leave no justification for such infractions. For as long as the Russians feel that in effect we have no policy on the Dardanelles and on Iranian oil other than to preserve the status quo, as long as they feel themselves menaced by the atom bomb, as long as they feel that America and Britain have ganged up on them, they will put security ahead of treaty obligations.

The incredible naivete and clumsiness of the President in involving himself with the Churchill speech and the savage undercover campaign against Secretary Byrnes as an "appeaser" make it very difficult for the Russians to believe that we really desire to live in peace with them. These developments and the atom bomb overshadow all else. But there is another question to which I sought an answer during the past week in many quarters of the State Department and the government—the question of whether on such key issues as Iranian oil and the Straits we did, in fact, have a policy, whether we had worked out a program, whether we had discussed any concrete compromise proposal with the Russians. I got the impression that there was no such program and that the State Department was still the same kind of uncoordinated place in which the Secretary proposes but the little career clique disposes.

The alternative is not war tomorrow or the next day, but the assumption that war must come sooner or later. And that assumption will throw its shadow over every aspect of foreign and domestic policy. Abroad it must affect our policies toward Germany, Japan, and Spain, for all may be needed as allies. At home, as indicated by the new army orders barring the "subversive" and "disaffected" from "sensitive" military matters, it must curtail civil liberties in preparation for war. And war, with the atom bomb, will mean Finis for all of us.

Spain—a Nazi Colony

BY MANUEL SANCHEZ SARTO

Formerly professor of political economy at Barcelona, now at the Mexican School of Economics; author and translator of numerous works of economic history

IN ITS issue of September 22, 1940, the Deutsche Bergwerke Zeitung of Düsseldorf carried an article entitled The Basis of Spain's Economic Prosperity. Among other things this article said: "As the authoritarian powers consolidate their political rule in Europe, their influence on the economy of this continent will increase and economic liberalism will correspondingly decline. This tendency will particularly affect the character of the Spanish economy, which before the national revolution of July, 1936, was the object of systematic exploitation by the Western democracies." Expanding this idea, it said: "Germany is in an excellent position to contribute to the economic development of Spain, because the similarity of its political system to that of Spain excludes the suspicion of a sinister political motive. German industry can to a large extent satisfy the needs of the Spanish market and will be well compensated by receiving in exchange the riches of the Spanish soil and subsoil."

Two days later the Frankfurter Volksblatt hailed the arrival in Berlin of Serrano Suñer, whom it described as "a typical representative of the new Spain, now undergoing the economic, social, and political transformation experienced earlier in Germany and Italy." Spanish imports quickly became a theme for Nazi propagandists. The success of their campaign is revealed in the following table showing Spanish exports to various countries in 1935 and 1941:

1935 (Figures in millions of pesetas)		1941
England	127.4	Germany	161.7
Germany	74.8	Italy	49.4
France	68.9	U. S.	42.4
U. S.	55.9	England	40.1
Argentina	31.7	France	16.3
Italy	19.6	Argentina	5.0

England, it will be seen, which once headed the list of importers, had dropped to fourth place, while the two Axis partners were taking more than half the total and more than twice as much as England and the United States combined.

A specific example of how the Franco-Hitler economic alliance operated is provided by the figures for Spanish orange exports:

1935 (Figures in millions of pesetas)		1941
France	28.8	Germany	81.8
Germany	27.1	England	6.9
England	23.2	France	3.7
Belgium	7.2	Switzerland	3.1

In conformity with an agreement between the German Bureau for Vine and Garden Products and the Spanish Citrus Growers' Association, almost the entire Spanish crop from 1941 on was consigned to Germany. This transaction was financed in part by a semi-official group headed by the Citrus Growers' Association and the Spanish Export-Import Bank and including a few private banks, such as the Banco Central. The total credits involved amounted to 50,000,000 reichsmarks. Payments, instead of being made directly to the Spanish exporters, were deposited in a special "clearing account" of the German Reichsbank; the legitimate creditors never received more than a part settlement in depreciated pesetas.

Another example is offered by the olive-oil industry. Before World War II Spain produced about 40 per cent (360,000 tons) of the world's annual supply of olive oil. After the needs of the Spanish domestic market were met, about 80,000 tons remained for export; this went chiefly to Italy, where the oil was further refined and then reexported. In 1939, however, under the aegis of Germany, Spain set out to corner the world market both as exporter and refiner. The Franco government that year authorized the construction of some 200 new refineries, the expansion of existing facilities, and the construction of another 30 plants where new German techniques for making glycerine and lubricants and for hydrogenizing oils could be tested. Curiously enough, the Spanish government has issued no figures on olive-oil exports for several years, stating only that in 1943 exports to European countries—read Germany—were stabilized while exports to America had sharply declined. Though trainloads of oil were rolling toward the Pyrenees, the cars marked Sobran de España (Spanish surplus), domestic supplies were ruthlessly curtailed. Hindered by the shortage of oil, the fish-canning industry turned to conserving in salt and Ersatz liquids.

While German warehouses were bursting with Spanish foodstuffs and the Spanish people starved, Franco was putting the finishing touches on a grand "ten-year plan" for the transformation of industry, by which he aimed to avoid the necessity of importing Allied products and to create favorable conditions for German enterprise. In 1941 and 1942 new industrial installations costing 911.6 million pesetas were authorized by the government; this amount was topped in 1943. In consequence Spain became increasingly dependent on Axis industrial techniques and patents, the government was obliged to impose new taxes on an already suffering people, and semi-official enterprises and private banks reaped staggering war profits.

The greatest development occurred in the chemical industry. The government's aim was to improve the balance of trade by manufacturing nitrogen products and other materials which had formerly been imported, such as mineral oils and their derivatives, wood distillates, and the like. Early in 1942 the Spanish Nitrogen Company drew up plans for two new fertilizer plants at Valencia and Murcia. The 1941 report of the National Industrial Institute stated that equipment for the manufacture of fertilizer had been promised by Germany and would arrive shortly.

Hidro Nitro España, a company operating at Monzón, Huesca, had a capital of 85 million pesetas at the end of 1942; by 1943 it had risen to 125 million pesetas. Hidro Nitro favored nationalization of the nitrogen industry because of its key role in the manufacture of explosives. A government decree of December 27, 1942, declared the nitrogen industry to be of national importance. New machinery was furnished by I. G. Farben, and production of ammonium sulphate rose to 400,000 tons a year. Another company, Ibérica del Nitrógeno, produced 10,000 tons of ammonium sulphate in 1942. Ibérica had formerly had a contract with a French company, Air Liquide; now it entered into a financial arrangement with a German firm.

Other firms participated in the government's so-called Nitrogen Plan: Sefanitro Baracaldo, with a capital of 150 million pesetas in 1943, utilized gas from the coke furnaces of Altos Hornos de Viscayao and produced about 120,000 tons of ammonium sulphate annually; Nicas of Valladolid, with a capital of 100 million pesetas in 1943, used power from the Duero dams and produced 64,000 tons of nitrates annually. Government subventions already granted or under consideration totaled more than 1,000 million pesetas by 1943. Yet despite the enormous expansion of the nitrogen industry, harvests, especially the cereal crops, suffered from a lack of fertilizer.

The Spanish textile industry concentrated mainly on the production of synthetic fibers used in the manufacture of rayon and cellulose wool. In addition, it experimented with cereal, rice, esparto, and genista grasses in the hope of obtaining a fiber which would enable it to eliminate the importation of artificial fibers and reduce cotton imports by a third. In 1942 Spanish trade papers were describing "glass stockings" and parachute cloth made out of synthetic fibers produced from coal, and reporting on new developments in the use of German perluran, the equivalent of the American nylon.

Under the government's textile plan as outlined in a decree dated March 14, 1940, a number of new factories were built. Machinery and considerable capital were supplied by Germany. Patents came from Germany, Italy, and—in the case of the extraction of fibers from rice grasses—from Japan. One of the large concerns with a capital of 172 million pesetas worked with eucalyptus wood from Santander; its annual production of 3,500 tons of rayon and 3,500 tons of staple fiber surpassed the combined production of all its Spanish competitors.

And so we could go on, telling of developments in numerous other industries by which the Spanish economy was firmly welded to that of the Reich. The public debt of the Franco government and Spanish export credits frozen in Axis countries constitute another fascinating aspect of this picture—the Condor debt of 230 million marks to Germany, the Italian war debt of 5,000 million liras, settled in May, 1941, by the issuance of 5,000 Spanish treasury bonds of a million liras each, and the 500 million marks frozen in the clearing house of the Reichsbank. Franco Spain—number one Axis colony!

Sons of the Wild Jackass—1946

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Magazine writer and journalist; author of books on the social and political problems of the Northwest

Seattle, February 28

GEORGE H. MOSES'S derisive reference, during the halcyon days of Old Guard rule, to a plucky little group of Senate progressives as "sons of the wild jackass" became a name that stuck. Eventually the progressives gloried in the title, for it meant champions of the people at a time when privilege and corruption were politically triumphant.

Moses originally applied the phrase to farm-belt Senators from the northern Great Plains, led by the illustrious Norris of Nebraska. Today he would have to look 20 degrees of longitude farther west, to the Columbia River Basin, to find a similar group. The Middle West is no longer the habitat of sons of the wild jackass; it now produces some of the most reactionary men in Congress. Revolt is bred today in the country's upper left-hand corner, in the Pacific Northwest. No other region sends such consistently liberal delegations to Washington.

The support that valley authorities find in Congress is a case in point. The Missouri Valley Authority is bitterly opposed by Senators of that valley, whereas the Mitchell bill for a regional authority in the vast watershed of the Columbia is favored by a majority of the Northwest's representatives. "Cowboy Glen" Taylor, the singing Senator from Idaho, also illustrates my thesis. When he arrived in the capital last year with a guitar and a ten-gallon hat, correspondents thought he was another Pappy O'Daniel. But Glen is the exact opposite of his yodeling colleague from Texas. During his first year in the Senate he advocated public power, fair employment practices, fewer tax rebates to industry, international control of the atomic process, and the confirmation of such men as Aubrey Williams and Henry A. Wallace.

The resurgence of liberalism in the Northwest is most marked in the Democratic Party and the state of Washington but is not the exclusive possession of either of these. Senator Wayne L. Morse of Oregon, a Republican, is waging a heroic fight against the Tories in his own party. Senator James E. Murray of Montana, a Roosevelt Democrat, has been in the forefront of nearly every liberal crusade undertaken in recent years.

A number of factors are responsible for the progressivism of the Northwest's delegation on Capitol Hill. One is the people's general acceptance of the idea of public ownership of electric power after long years of agitation by Homer Bone, Jim O'Sullivan, Clarence Dill, and the late J. D. Ross. The influence of these men was far-reaching, for the Columbia River has 42 per cent of America's water-power in its rocky canyons. The Grange nationally is a conservative organization; in Oregon, Washington, and Idaho it has led the demand for public ownership. At Spokane last week representatives of the Grange, the A. F. of L., and the C. I. O. formed a league to promote the Columbia Valley Authority. Opposition in the Northwest to a CVA is confined largely to the utility companies and their confederates.

Another reason for the Northwest's tendency to send liberals to Congress is found in its enthusiasm for Roosevelt. Outside the solid South F. D. R. received his largest proportionate majorities in this region. In 1936, for example, he got 60 per cent of the vote in New York and 64 per cent in Virginia, but he got 66 per cent in Washington and 67 per cent in Oregon. Mon Wallgren, an Everett jeweler; John Coffee, a Tacoma lawyer; Jim Murray, a Butte multimillionaire; and Glen Taylor, a Pocatello yodeler of "Oh, Susanna!" all got their political start as last-ditch supporters of Roosevelt.

Of the Northwest's eight Senators, five can be relied on to perform with consistent liberalism. They are Murray of Montana, Morse of Oregon, Taylor of Idaho, and Warren Magnuson and Hugh B. Mitchell of Washington. Wheeler of Montana is progressive on many domestic issues, although his bitter personal grudge against Roosevelt led him astray in 1937. Charles Gossett, the junior Senator from Idaho, is a pussyfooting Democrat who probably will support Truman a good part of the time. Only one Northwestern Senator is an outright reactionary—Morse's colleague, Guy Cordon, an ally of Taft on most critical issues.

The region has also done well by the House of Representatives. No Congressman displays greater courage on perilous issues than John M. Coffee of Tacoma, who has fought a lonely fight for nearly ten years against Spanish fascism, both in Spain and south of the Gulf of California. Coffee has three colleagues who support him in vital matters—Henry M. Jackson of Everett, Hugh De Lacy of Seattle, and a logger from the Cascade woods named Charlie Savage. These men all voted against continuing the infamous Dies committee.

Montana is ribbed by the Continental Divide. East of this towering wall the state has Republican representation in the House. West of it, on the Columbia River watershed, the people have elected Mike Mansfield, a forty-two-year-old university professor who fought in the last war at the age of thirteen and wore a marine sergeant's gold chevrons in Shanghai when he was only sixteen. Mansfield was twice sent by Roosevelt to observe the muddled Chinese situation. The Murray forces hope to run him against Wheeler this year, but Mansfield has not committed himself to the race.

Utah, whose upper left-hand corner is in the Columbia's watershed, also contributes a valuable liberal delegation. The Mormon state, once dominated completely by the pious Reed Smoot and his confederates, has two New Dealers in the Senate—scholarly Elbert Thomas, who fills Smoot's seat, and Abe Murdock, up from the House's liberal bloc. Utah's two Representatives, J. W. Robinson and Walter Granger, are also liberals. Granger roundly scolded his fellow-Democrats for abandoning the Senate's full-employment bill for a pale House substitute.

Just as Congressmen from the South have a way of turning out to be reactionary, regardless of their antecedents, those from the Northwest prove happily progressive.

In 1945 Mon Wallgren, just elected Governor of Washington, chose his thirty-eight-year-old secretary to fill his place in the Senate. Many persons had doubts about Hugh Mitchell. He had never occupied public office before. He was shy, and full of "book learning." Wallgren was bombarded with protests. But Mitchell has silenced the skeptics.

Senator Morse

He has led the fight for the Columbia Valley Authority, taken up the cudgels against allowing Alcoa to monopolize the aluminum industry on the Columbia, and voted liberally on all major questions.

No list of the Northwest's liberals is complete without the name of Edward L. (Bob) Bartlett, the first graduate of the University of Alaska ever to occupy public office. Bartlett was elected delegate from Alaska in 1944 with the backing of Governor Ernest Gruening. He has used his voteless seat in the House to assail the shipping and cannery monopolies in the Territory.

The political upheaval in the Far West has received less attention than that along the Atlantic seaboard, but it has been more complete. The states beyond the Continental Divide were once the happy hunting ground of the Republicans. The G. O. P. was supreme there during the administrations of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. Twenty years ago the Democrats had only these offices: in Arizona, the governorship, one senatorship, one House seat; in California, two House seats; in Colorado, one House seat; in Idaho, none; in Montana, the governorship, two senatorships, one House seat; in Utah, the governorship, one senatorship; in Oregon, none; in Nevada, one senatorship; in New Mexico, two senatorships, one House seat; in Washington, one senatorship, one House seat; in Wyoming, one senatorship.

A generation later, this is how they fare in the same states: in Arizona, the governorship, two senatorships, two House seats; in California, one senatorship, sixteen House seats; in Colorado, one senatorship; in Idaho, the governorship, two senatorships, one House seat; in Montana, two senatorships, one House seat; in Utah, the governorship, two senatorships, two House seats; in Oregon, none; in Nevada, the governorship, two senatorships, one House seat; in New Mexico, the governorship, two senatorships, two House seats; in Washington, the governorship, two senatorships, four House seats; in Wyoming, the governorship, one senatorship; in Alaska, the one delegate.

The most conspicuous failure of the Democrats has been in Oregon, where a group of anti-Roosevelt die-hards has kept control of the party. There the liberal mantle has been worn by such Republicans as Wayne Morse and the late Senator Charles L. McNary. The leading Democrats in Oregon are opposed to public power and the FEPC; they cater to local hysteria against Japanese Americans. As a result the Republicans have kept the inside track, and although Roosevelt carried Oregon four times, Democrats in the state have been denied political victories.

No other Presidential candidate in history was so popular in the West as Franklin D. Roosevelt. In the eleven Western states, in his four races, he won forty-one of forty-four contests. He failed to carry Wyoming in 1944 and Colorado in 1940 and 1944. Elsewhere west of the Continental Divide he was always victorious.

Roosevelt was not unaware that Democratic nominees do not win unless they carry the West—it was California that gave the victory to Woodrow Wilson at the eleventh hour in 1916—and Mr. Truman and his associates should take this to heart. If they are not consistently liberal on such issues as power, timber conservation, and labor they stand to lose the West. Without the West they cannot retain the Presidency. Mr. Truman's recent letter to the National Reclamation Association, an organization opposed to valley authorities, in which he failed to mention the word "power," has not found favor in this region. Franklin Roosevelt told the same organization that "when power is possible of development, it is not to be overlooked or underestimated."

Wayne Morse has been writing progressives in Oregon urging them to withdraw from the Democratic Party and prepare for independent political action. Morse's Presidential favorite is apparently Harold Stassen. Western liberals will want to know more about Stassen's views on domestic problems before they abandon the party of F. D. R. Governor Wallgren of Washington, Truman's closest friend in the West, insists that eventually the President will stand precisely where Roosevelt stood with respect to public power. Wallgren is an active advocate of the CVA, and his opinion will be accepted until proved wrong.

A candidate's attitude toward public power has often been the decisive factor in national election campaigns out West. In 1940 Willkie was running strong along the Pacific slope until George Norris visited Bonneville and Grand Coulee dams and urged the voters to stick by the man who had kept his pledged word to build these projects. After the election Senator McNary, Willkie's running mate, told me that "Norris's public-power speeches won for Roosevelt on the Pacific Coast."

Ersatz Orchids for UNO

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

The Nation's London correspondent

London, February 25

IN PARLIAMENT and press London has sped the United Nations Organization on its westward journey with encomiums which reflect either indomitable optimism or a high degree of insincerity. Orchids in profuse bunches for Miss UNO—but to the honest eye they have an artificial, papery look. If the peoples of the world are led to believe that this first session of the United Nations has done much toward laying the foundations of durable peace, they are being cruelly deceived.

The mechanism, it is true, has begun to take shape. The Economic and Social Council is in being, and will prepare the way for next summer's International Conference on Trade and Employment. An International Health Organization is well on the way to being launched. The Commission on Atomic Energy has been appointed, and the Military Staff Committee has begun to examine the problem of giving the UNO "teeth" in the dubious form of contingents of national armed forces earmarked for service under the Security Council's orders.

But set aside, for the moment, the proceedings in the Security Council. Can it be said that the Assembly in its approach even to the world's economic and administrative problems encouraged high hopes for the future? It passed resolutions expressing a desire that UNRRA'S resources should be augmented and that member states should collaborate to alleviate the famine which looms over half the world. But it took no step toward the one real solution for food shortage—the appointment of an International Board with executive powers to allocate and distribute resources. Nor was there any approach to agreement on the one practical issue which was tackled—the fate of Europe's host of emigrant refugees. Moreover, the existence of a large unfilled gap in the UNO's mechanism—the absence of the projected and vitally important Trusteeship Council—is due to the fact that the Big Five preferred to leave the whole mandate question in abeyance rather than expose their profound disagreement on every facet of that thorny issue.

It was not to be expected that the Assembly, in its first session, would burgeon into an embryonic parliament of man. The supremacy of the Big Five, enshrined in the charter, precluded any such hope. But fears that the UNO would be rendered impotent in the big-power stranglehold have been depressingly confirmed. The divisions among the Big Three in the Council permeated the whole Assembly; already the United Nations are grouped in blocs and maneuvering in the spirit of traditional power politics.

The situation is too tragic for there to be much fun in heresy hunts. Both Bevin and Vishinsky used the Council for airing national animosities. Of the two, Bevin was the more adroit. Though the use of the veto made nonsense of the Council's entire proceedings, Bevin got—in effect, though not in form—a verdict of "not-guilty" in Greece and Indonesia; and Vishinsky, though he scored in securing a free hand for Russia in bilateral negotiations with Iran, left the Foreign Secretary tactically the victor in the field. It is a singularly barren victory. Bevin may claim that he had the better of the day in this new technique of "secret diplomacy openly pursued"; but he has left the whole Russian bloc in the Assembly under the impression, not perhaps that Britain is planning war on the U. S. S. R.—there are limits even to the imaginings produced by "encirclement neurosis"—but that hostility to communism is the mainspring of British policy, and that Britain stands, wherever it can exercise influence, for reaction and capitalist exploitation. That, perhaps, was the picture which Vishinsky wanted to paint for the benefit of the Balkans and, particularly, the Middle East. He may not have troubled greatly about accuracy of aim in his charges: some mud would stick.

To say that the embittered and inconclusive wrangles between Bevin and Vishinsky in the Security Council have "enlightened the peoples" or improved international relations is grossly dishonest. What they have done is to empty the Anglo-Soviet alliance of all real content and to reveal the extent to which Britain is dependent on the United States if it is to cling, as Bevin desires, to the whole of its imperial heritage. Whether America is prepared unconditionally to underwrite British policy on these lines appears—on the showing made by Byrnes and Stettinius in the Security Council—to be a moot question. It was difficult to distinguish a sharp American "line"; but the United States delegation displayed a tendency to play the part of neutral "mediator"—a role which has aroused uneasy recollections of how British "mediation" was once applied in Czechoslovakia.

For the British public, now that the flags have been taken down at the Central Hall in Westminster, a grim postscript to the UNO's meeting is the government White Paper indicating that, even at the end of this year, we shall have 1,200,000 men in the armed forces, with another 500,000 engaged in making munitions for them. A cynical comment going the rounds in Parliament is that Hitler was cheaper: he, at least, produced unity among the Allies.

The Myth of World Government

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Professor of Christian Ethics at Union Theological Seminary and author of "The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness: A Vindication of Democracy and a Critique of Its Traditional Defense"

THE French observer André Siegfried thought several decades ago that America was coming of age. One hopes he was right; though it is worth noting that there are many stages of maturity and we seem hardly to have reached one commensurate with the responsibilities which have been thrust upon our very powerful if very young nation. At every turn we face decisions requiring us to use our power creatively to stabilize an inchoate community of nations in a civilization which can achieve stability only in global terms.

Our hesitations and ambiguities reveal that we have not yet overcome our adolescent pride of power or our inner insecurities. It would be the rightful function of a "liberal" movement in such a situation to furnish the nation with mature counsel, assuming that liberalism, whatever else it may be, represents a measure of detachment from the shortsighted collective impulses of a community. It must be regretfully recorded, however, that the liberal movement of America has not risen to the occasion. It is, if anything, more infantile than the nation. It proves its lack of maturity by trying to solve the complex problems of our global existence in purely logical and constitutional terms. We do not yet have a world community—only halting and hesitant beginnings toward one. American liberals, however, insist that one be brought into being by legal, constitutional, and governmental means, disregarding the fact, which history attests on every page, that governments may perfect the order and justice of a community but cannot create a community—for the simple reason that the authority of government is primarily the authority of the community itself. If the community does not exist in fact, at least in inchoate form, constitutional instruments cannot create it. The authority of law as such is slight, and the fear of police power is useful only to suppress incidental recalcitrance against the will of the community. The community cannot be coerced into basic order; the basic order must come from its innate cohesion.

These obvious facts are obscured in almost all the educational propaganda on the problems of world government put out by our international organizations. They are rightfully concerned about the fact that unabridged national sovereignty is a principle of anarchy in an interdependent world. Their answer to this problem is to call for a constitutional convention of the world or to try to persuade the new United Nations Organization to pass a law which will abridge the sovereignty of nations. This solution takes legal symbols for social realities. The principle of national sovereignty is the legal expression of the fact that national communities regard themselves as morally and politically autonomous. They have become increasingly conscious of the claims of other nations upon them and of the necessity of a larger degree of mutual accord, but they will have to reach a much higher degree of implicit abridgment of their moral freedom before it will be possible to fix and extend this moral and social gain by law.

The present accord between the nations, as expressed in the United Nations Charter, contains a "veto" provision by virtue of which no great power can be voted down in the council of the nations. This fact fills our liberals with moral and political disgust. It does of course prove that the great powers are not ready to submit unreservedly to the authority of a world organization. But this merely means that in the present state of world affairs peace cannot be maintained by a majority imposing its will upon a minority. When the minority is not a group of individuals but a nation or a group of nations, it will use its social and military power to defy a decision which has not been reached with its consent. We have, therefore, no real security against war. But there is no reason to think we could gain this security by constitutional means after having failed to establish the minimum basis for it by political means.

All the great nations insisted upon the veto power, and the United Nations Charter would hardly have passed the United States Senate without this provision. Russia is more insistent upon retaining the veto than we are because it is in greater danger of being voted down in the United Nations Assembly or Security Council. This fact does not deter our constitutional idealists from bombarding the ear of the Administration and the conscience of the nation with proposals for abolishing the veto. Here the constitutional answer to the problem of world peace obviously threatens the delicate and tentative degree of accord which has been achieved politically. We are professedly interested only in establishing a universal sovereignty, and we refuse to admit that we can afford greater devotion to the principle than Russia because we run less danger of being in the minority. This taint in our idealism is obvious enough to the Russians.

It must be observed in this connection that a great deal of enthusiasm for world government is explicitly anti-Russian—for instance, that of ex-Justice Owen Roberts and Clarence Streit. The theory is: let us set up a real world government; if the Russians fail to adhere so much the worse for them. These idealists are ready to bring on another world war in the name of world government. As consolation for the dire effects of so ironic a policy, we are assured that if we must have another world war it would be spiritually thrilling to fight it for the principle of world government. Some of the enthusiasm for world government is not explicitly anti-Russian but merely too naive to recognize that the effect of demanding a constitutionally perfect world order in the present situation must be to destroy the very tentative degree of mutual trust which has been achieved between the two great centers of power.

To say that there is no way of guaranteeing the peace of the world constitutionally is not to say that there are other ways of guaranteeing it. There are none. We are living in a very unsafe world; and it will be unsafe for a long time. To note the difficulty of bringing Russia into a world community does not imply that Russia's policies based on its fears are all justified. Some are; some are not. Some are reactions to our own policies, which are prompted by our own fears. Some seem to be derived from Marxist dogmatism. But there they are. They cannot be overcome by constitutional means unless they are first mitigated by a great deal more common counsel and common experience.

The excessive devotion to constitutional answers for world problems in America seems to be a dubious inheritance from the whole "social-contract" theory of government with which the liberal democratic movement began. According to this theory men and nations create communities by the fiat of government and law. That all human communities had a long history of organic cohesion before they ever began explicitly and consciously to alter or extend it is ignored. One reason why the idea of the social contract has special prestige in America is our belief that we created a nation by constitutional fiat; and we think it our special business to ask the world to do in macrocosm what we so successfully accomplished in microcosm. This analogy fails to consider that the cohesion of a national community is so different from the organization of a universal community that the difference is one of kind rather than degree. It also leaves out of account an important aspect of our history. If our Constitution created a "more perfect union," the union which the Constitution perfected had already been established. The fear of a common foe, the shared experiences of the battlefield, a very considerable degree of similar culture—these and many other factors provided the cohesion of the American colonies. The Constitution could not have created a unity which it had to presuppose.

Emory Reeves in his "Anatomy of Peace," which has become a kind of bible of American constitutional idealism, declares that the way to "prevent wars between nations once and for all" is to integrate "the scattered conflicting national sovereignties into one unified higher sovereignty capable of creating a legal order in which all peoples will enjoy equal security, equal obligations, and equal rights under the law." The "once and for all" gives one pause, for even our own Constitution could not prevent the Civil War. But a brilliant defender of pure constitutionalism recently explained that difficulty away. The Civil War, he declared, was caused by certain ambiguities in our Constitution which left some doubt whether we were in fact a nation or a loose federation of states. It is now our business to profit from the experience of the past and eliminate similar ambiguities from the world constitution. Unfortunately, to assume that the tortuous processes of history can thus be controlled by the power of constitutional logic is an infantile illusion.

American liberalism refuses to face the fact that there is a tremendous difference between the problem of community on the national and the global level, a difference which no constitutional magic can overcome. National and imperial communities all have ethnic, linguistic, geographic, historical, and other forces of social unity. The universal community, however, has no common language or common culture—nothing to create the consciousness of "we." Modern democratic communities may be culturally and ethnically pluralistic, but they all possess a core of common spiritual possessions which the world community lacks.

The world community does, indeed, have some compelling motives toward unity. Technical civilization has created an economic interdependence which generates insufferable frictions if it is not politically managed. There is in the culture of every nation, moreover, a religious and philosophical sense of world community waiting to be actualized, and of moral obligations extending beyond the national community. There is, finally, the fear of mutual destruction. It is the thesis of the proponents of world government that the atomic bomb has so intensified the fear of mutual destruction that hitherto impossible constitutional goals now appear possible.

Undoubtedly fear may be a creative force. The scared man can run faster from the pursuing bull than he ever thought possible. But the creative power of fear does not increase in proportion to its intensity. Fear finally becomes paralyzing. Furthermore, the fear of mutual destruction easily degenerates into the fear of a particular foe. Even now it must be regretfully recorded that fear of Russia in the West and of the West in Russia seems more potent than the common fear of destruction.

These are tragic facts, and one could wish that they were not true; but it is hardly mature to deny what is so obvious. The world community lacks, in short, the potent elements of "togetherness" which national communities boast. Neither law nor police power can supply this defect. If one trusted to police power alone, the amount required by a universal state to maintain order in a community which did not cohere naturally and organically would be so great as to amount to tyranny. This was Thomas Hobbes's answer to the problem of community; the similarity between his answer and that of many of our modern constitutional idealists is instructive. Fortunately, national communities had a more organic unity than Hobbes supposed. Unfortunately, the international community corresponds at least partly to his picture.

These simple lessons must be spelled out to American idealists, not to induce a mood of defeatism, but to get them to direct the impulses of their idealism to real rather than imaginary objectives. Many creative acts are required of America that are more difficult, though more immediate and modest, than espousal of world government. Will the British loan agreement pass? If it does not, America will have proved that it does not know how to relate its wealth to an impoverished world. Shall we find a way of transferring our dangerous knowledge of the atomic bomb to some kind of world judicatory? If not, we shall have proved that we know how to resent, but not to allay, the world's fear of our power.

These immediate steps toward achieving a higher degree of mutuality among nations may be too modest to guarantee peace. But they are in the right direction. It would be intolerable if we again presented the world with a case of American schizophrenia, allowing our idealists to dream up pure answers for difficult problems while our cynics make our name odious by the irresponsible exercise of our power.

SLEEPLESS BEAUTY

Copyright © 1946 LTM

Japan's Press Revolution

BY ANDREW ROTH

Author of "Dilemma in Japan"

ONE of the most important changes in Japanese life since defeat is hidden in the flimsy, two-page, ideograph-crowded newspapers now being published. In the past few months Japanese journalists have succeeded in converting their newspapers from pillars of the old order into spearheads of the movement for the country's democratic renovation.

The most dramatic story is that of the Yomiuri-Hochi, which was the worst of Tokyo's three principal papers, larding rabid militarism with vulgar sensationalism. Its owner, Matsutaro Shoriki, a former police official, had started the paper with the help of a group of aggression-minded industrialists, including Chikunhei Nakajima, the airplane tycoon. Shoriki's yellow journalism, combined with the scandalously low wages he paid his newsmen and printers, brought him rich profits, and his fervent support of aggression won him a seat in the House of Peers and a position as Cabinet adviser.

Soon after the American forces landed and occupation policy became fairly clear, the journalists and pressmen of the Yomiuri demanded higher wages, a change in editorial policy, and Shoriki's resignation. When he refused their demands they went on strike, but this was a strike of a peculiar kind—a lockout in reverse. Instead of shutting down the paper, the strikers continued to run it but excluded Shoriki and his top henchmen from the editorial rooms.

Drastic changes in editorial policy were made by the strike leader, Tomin Suzuki. Suzuki had been the paper's foreign editor but had lost his job, partly as a result of German Embassy pressure, when he played up items critical of the Nazis as an indirect means of criticizing Japan's fascists. With Shoriki out of the way, Suzuki went to town. The Yomiuri dared to take up the question of the Emperor and thus forced other newspapers to do the same. It initiated discussions of war criminals, insisting that the Japanese must purge themselves. It gave publicity not only to the demands of its own strikers for a living wage but to the needs of other sectors of the slowly emerging labor movement. While hitting hard editorially, the strikers managed to improve the paper's format and type clarity. Public response was tremendous. The Yomiuri's circulation outstripped that of all its competitors. It topped 1,500,000 and could have gone farther but for the shortage of paper.

As the strike went into its third month last December, the pressure on the workers—both economic and political—became tremendous. Some of the newsmen began to waver but were shored up by the pressmen and by evidence of wide public support. On December 3 the strikers were given a tremendous boost when Shoriki was named as a war criminal by General MacArthur. A week later a settlement was concluded assuring considerable gains for the strikers. Shoriki agreed to sell all but 30 per cent of his stock, and a liberal, Tsunego Baba, was named president of the Yomiuri corporation. The Journalists' Union won recognition, and wage increases were granted. Most interesting of all, it was agreed that the paper should be run by a joint labor-management committee. Strike-leader Suzuki is now editor-in-chief.

While the fight on the Yomiuri was going on, the employees of the other two big papers—the Asahi and the Mainichi—obtained improvements without striking. Top editorial personnel was cleaned out, and the Journalists' Union was allowed to participate in shaping editorial policy. During this period Domei, the monopolistic official news agency, was scrapped, its head was arrested as a war criminal, and in its place two new liberal agencies were formed, Kyodo and Jiji.

Despite the difficulty of securing newsprint and press facilities many new publications have made their appearance in the past few months, and almost without exception they are leftist in outlook. The Socialists have two excellent organs in the daily Jiji (Times) and the weekly Minshu (Democracy); the Communists have the daily tabloid Minpo (People's News) and the weekly Akahata (Red Flag). Akahata has had a remarkable growth, its circulation reaching 90,000 in December and 250,000 at the end of February. Part of its success is due to its attempt to reach the semi-literate masses. Though Japan boasted of 97 per cent literacy before the war, recent tests have shown that only some 15 per cent of the people can read with ease the 2,500 intricate ideographs used by newspapers, while the great majority are familiar with only 1,000 to 1,500. By substituting phonetic symbols for the complicated ideographs wherever possible, the Communist weekly has been able to tap a huge new audience in the very economic brackets it wishes to influence.

These drastic changes in the press are making a deep impact on the thinking of the Japanese people, particularly in the metropolitan areas, where the papers have their greatest circulation. If the world is surprised by a left-of-center majority in the April elections, it will be because few people know of the press revolution which preceded it.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Churchill and the British Loan

ON THE very day that Winston Churchill cut loose with his blast against the Soviets and his plea for an Anglo-American alliance, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee opened hearings on the Anglo-American trade and Financial Agreement, which includes provision for a $3¾-billion credit for Britain. It was not a happy coincidence.

This page is not the place to discuss the political implications of Mr. Churchill's address, but I may be permitted to observe that it is likely to weaken rather than buttress British security. For on the one hand it is bound to strengthen the Soviet Union's suspicion that the capitalist world is plotting against it; on the other it has aroused new fears in this country of entanglement in British quarrels and is apt to encourage a demand for the reduction rather than the extension of foreign commitments. Thus reaching for the shadow of an alliance Mr. Churchill may have risked the substance of practical Anglo-American cooperation in the economic sphere, for which the starting-point is the British loan.

Ratification by Congress of the loan agreement is very far from assured. Ernest Bevin's toughness with the Soviets has won him commendations from diehards in America as well as in Britain, and this, together with Churchill's bellicose speech, may have turned a few conservatives votes. But the head and front of the Congressional opposition to the British loan is the group of iso-nationalists. These men, as bitterly Anglophobe as they are Russophobe, view friction between their pet hates with malevolent neutrality. Churchillian eloquence has not the power to win over such enemies, but it may have alienated friends among the Congressional liberals, who as a group are inclined to support the loan but who are susceptible to the argument that it involves underwriting British imperialists.

This argument, I believe, is fallacious. In Britain itself the most ferocious propaganda against the loan, and the trade agreement in which it is wrapped up, is being emitted by Lord Beaverbrook, who, I suspect, understands its implications better than Americans who oppose it on anti-imperialist grounds. Beaverbrook, owner of Britain's most widely circulated newspaper, has for years been plugging the doctrine of imperial self-sufficiency. He was one of the leading advocates of the Ottawa Agreement of 1934, but the scale of preference duties it set up did not satisfy him. He wants to employ a system of discriminatory tariffs which will turn Britain's trade as far as possible into empire channels, and the present plight of his country appears to him a glorious opportunity to accomplish this end. For if Britain is not allowed a breathing spell to rebuild its war-lost trade—and only financial assistance from America can provide that—its one alternative is to fall back on barter methods to obtain the imports which it must have or perish. Thus it will have to confine its purchases of goods as far as possible to those countries which will accept equivalent quantities of British goods or be willing to take payment in inconvertible sterling. Naturally, the empire would form the nucleus of a trading system of this kind, but other countries which depend largely on the British markets would be under pressure to link up with it. That the economic results of imperial autarchy would be as beneficial as Beaverbrook claims may well be doubted; that the political results would be deplorable is certain, for Britain could not afford to loosen the bonds of an empire on which it was dependent for its daily bread.

More than that, a Britain driven to organizing an exclusive economic bloc would soon find itself involved in commercial conflict with the United States, which, as Secretary Vinson pointed out to the Senate committee, would be compelled to form a competing bloc of its own. "Two rival blocs," he added, "would mean economic warfare. Probably we would win, but it would be a Pyrrhic victory. World trade would be destroyed, and all countries would suffer. . . . The consequences to world prosperity and even to world peace would be disastrous."

It was in the hope of avoiding such a situation that the American negotiators of the loan made it conditional on a commercial agreement which commits both Britain and the United States to fighting commercial battles in accordance with what may be called economic Queensberry rules. That is to say, their business men will compete in foreign markets on a price, quality, and service basis. But their government seconds undertake not to give them unfair aid by manipulating tariffs and rates of exchange, or by concluding deals which give better terms to the goods of some nations than to those of others.

If Britain had been offered a loan without being asked to pledge itself to work toward the expansion of world trade on free international lines, there would be some substance in the complaint that Uncle Sam was giving all and receiving nothing. But this commercial agreement promises to be of substantial benefit to the United States, which is likely to become increasingly dependent on foreign trade both to dispose of its surplus production and to secure supplies of raw materials. Neither of these objectives could be easily achieved by barter or bilateral trading methods, for the countries which are America's best customers are not for the most part those from which it wishes to buy. Consequently, in order to trade effectively it must be able to turn the proceeds of a sale to country A into a form of payment acceptable to country B. That in essence is the multilateral system which would have no chance if Britain stood outside it. Yet without the loan Britain could not accept the obligations this system involves.

Congress, then, is faced by a momentous choice: ratification of the loan agreement and cooperation with Britain in rebuilding world trade; non-ratification and an Anglo-American economic conflict. Its vote will determine the future pattern of both the world economy and Anglo-American relations. That is why Mr. Churchill's speech, apart from all other objections, was a prime example of putting the cart before the horse. So long as the United States hesitates about giving Britain the helping hand it so sorely needs, it is not much use discussing long-term political relations.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The People's Front

Paris, March 7

FRANKLIN ROOSEVELT'S Four Freedoms are undergoing their first real test in a world at peace. And already people are beginning to wonder whether the fourth freedom—freedom from fear—will weather the trial. Here in Paris one has the impression of reliving the days just before Munich. The big question on many lips is, "Can a third world war be averted?" Churchill's speech unleashed all the pent-up hysteria that has been accumulating steadily in the months since liberation. The other day a Frenchwoman told a friend of mine that "next June General Zhukov's army will be in Paris." And this neurotic woman's nonsense about red troops on the Champs Elysées is no isolated phenomenon; many Frenchmen are seriously discussing the possible or probable alignments of the different powers when Russia invades Turkey this spring and Great Britain comes to Turkey's aid.

In the midst of the gloom created by the speech at Fulton, the only encouraging sign for the French has been the report that Churchill's invitation to war had an unfavorable reception in the United States. Last night I went to a dinner given by the president of the French Constituent Assembly, Vincent Auriol, in honor of José Giral, Prime Minister of the Spanish government in exile. Premier Gouin and other Socialist members of the French Cabinet attended the dinner, and all of political Paris met at the reception which followed. During the course of the evening I heard the same remark repeated at least a dozen times: "What a crazy proposal! It's a good thing the Americans gave it a cold shoulder." Even the right-wing Socialists, whose feelings toward Russia are far from warm, promptly repudiated the speech.

The Churchill headlines recalled to mind a discussion I had not long ago with an influential Russian friend. I had found him in a state of mind which made me think of another conversation with Soviet Foreign Minister Chicherin in 1924, when for three hours he expounded the thesis that the leading capitalist powers would not stop until they had forced the world into a war against Russia. Now my friend was expressing exactly the same view. I tried to convince him that his fears were exaggerated. It seemed clear to me that what Russia was doing in the Balkans and elsewhere to extend its zone of influence was dictated not, as many claimed, by the desire to become the most powerful empire on earth, but purely and simply by fear of attack. So the duty of everyone who cared for peace, I told him, was to try to dispel that fear. After reading Churchill, I feel I no longer have any moral justification for speaking as I did.

But it is not only the Soviet Union that distrusts the curious kind of peace we are enjoying. The French position on the Ruhr and the Rhineland is also based on fear. "France could not survive another invasion," a spokesman for the Quai d'Orsay told me last night. "Even if the United States and the whole world came to our aid this time, they could not help. The mere fact of an invasion would finish us."

And he added: "We do not want to annex the Ruhr or the Rhineland. We are prepared to accept any solution America and England consider just. But on one condition: that their solution does not leave Germany in a position to attack France again. We cannot forget that the Ruhr has always been the arsenal of the German armies and the Rhineland the springboard from which every invasion of France has been launched."

The Quai d'Orsay spokesman summed up the French attitude in this way: "The important thing is to know the geographic limits of the territory in which the proposed central German administration would be permitted to act. Those limits must be fixed before the peace treaty is signed." In other words, Paris fears that unless the question of the Ruhr and the Rhineland is settled now, the Germans, as time goes by and the Allied occupation bogs down, will gradually extend their control to these two decisive regions. Fear almost turned to panic recently when American G. I.'s in Germany raised the cry, "We want to go home." In the United States none of us quite realized how terrified the French were by those soldier demonstrations.

This view corresponds more nearly to the position of the M. R. P. than to that of the other French parties. The Quai d'Orsay man was quite positive that any inter-Allied committee that may finally be set up in the Ruhr and the Rhineland must be headed by a Frenchman. The Socialists and Communists are not so rigid; following a meeting last Thursday the Communist Party came out again for internationalization of the Ruhr without insisting on any indirect or predominant French control. But in the last analysis every group reflects the same deep-rooted fear that a new, aggressive Germany could use the Ruhr and the Rhineland to prepare its revenge; all insist that the solution of the problem must exclude the possibility of Germany's ever rearming again.

The uneasiness of the French has been aggravated in recent weeks by Allied differences which they believe are encouraging the surviving Nazis inside Germany. Imagine, they say, the excellent use the Nazis will make of Churchill's speech; no matter how strongly the British Foreign Office disowns his views, the Hitler underground will whisper mit Freude that President Truman had seen the text of the speech before it was delivered. What better way to encourage the Germans in the belief that sooner or later they will be chosen as companions in arms for the effort to turn the balance of power.

Fear dominates the international scene. At this moment the Spanish Republicans fear that the three-power note suggesting a "neutral" government for Spain may lead to a coup d'état by the generals—who knows, perhaps even with Franco's approval—or to the restoration of the monarchy by the grace of Britain and under the sacred slogan of non-intervention. Freedom from fear has yet to triumph on this earth.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

What They Missed

WHILE YOU WERE GONE: A REPORT ON WARTIME LIFE IN THE UNITED STATES. Edited by Jack Goodman. Simon and Schuster. $3.50.

THE IDEA of "While You Were Gone" is to give returned service men what is apparently now called a "fill-in" on life in the United States during the war. It is a good idea, carried out here with no system or consistency, but at its best with results both entertaining and illuminating. One trouble with the idea, of course, is that some of us were gone four years and some four months; some read pony editions of the American magazines, some read Stars and Stripes and Yank, some just listened to the radio, some did nothing at all. There is no standard margin of ignorance. Jack Goodman's sensible solution has been to have his contributors write as if they were writing for people who stayed home; and I should think that people who stayed home might well enjoy reading the book.

Twenty-six writers contributed to this report on war-time life. Mr. Goodman gave them pretty free rein, thereby creating a pleasant atmosphere of home-front contention and confirming the impressions we used to get from the pony Time. Henry Pringle, for example, estimates advertising's contribution to the winning of the war somewhat less enthusiastically than does Raymond Rubicam. Lester Markel (of the New York Times) says that the war showed the newspapers to be the basic source of information, while Eric Hodgins (of Time) says that the war finally vindicated the news magazine; this argument ends up with the boys swinging in the footnotes. Lewis Gannett describes the attack on Steinbeck's "The Moon Is Down" as "an echo, in a new form, of the foolishness of 1917"; so Wolcott Gibbs in the next essay echoes the foolishness, and a little later on Bosley Crowther takes a safe middle course.

The best pieces are very good indeed. Paul Gallico's essay on What We Talked About is a fine, fast, and funny job of writing. Allan Nevins furnishes a sober summary of How We Felt About the War. The three pieces on How We Were Governed are all excellent, with Jonathan Daniels supplying an appealing sketch of Mr. Roosevelt, Tom Stokes a caustic but not unsympathetic account of Congress, and Henry Pringle performing a marvel of condensation on the war agencies. Russell Lord's essay on agriculture is distinguished, though this city slicker wishes he had said something about "Plowman's Folly." James Thurber is himself on What the Animals Were Up To. Milton Caniff brings us up to date on the comics—or, as he suggests they be called, the tragics—and adds a number of penetrating remarks about this important part of our popular culture. Wolcott Gibbs and Lewis Gannett cover their familiar beats with their familiar expertise. The appendix tells How Your Congressman Voted. 1

Even the bad pieces are not too bad. Though Raymond Rubicam says much that is pompous about advertising, he also sets down a unique collection of the most horrible wartime inspirations of the copy writers. Bosley Crowther is pleasant on the movies, but for my money quite without any real idea what they are all about. Norman Corwin trots out some more of that revolting combination of archness and high-powered "political" emotion which won him a reputation while I was gone which I cannot understand now that I have come back. Senator Ball is pretty routine on post-war plans.

The book has considerably more than the usual share of petty errors. The head of the Fortune poll, for example, and the prototype of Flip Corkin, the losing finalist in the 1943 tennis national singles and the husband of Ginger Rogers, all have their names misspelled. George Norris becomes a Progressive, and Arthur Koestler an Austrian. But reference isn't the point of "While You Were Gone." In a curious manner the book calls to mind the inquiries sponsored by Harold Stearns into civilization in the United States. "While You Were Gone" has no theses or pretensions, but it presents the views of a number of humane, intelligent, and well-informed observers concerning the main preoccupations of American life in recent years, and the result is a surprisingly rich and readable commentary on the state of American civilization.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

The Exile's Return

There mounts in squalls a sort of rusty mire,
Not ice, not snow, to leaguer the Hotel
De Ville, where braced pig-iron dragons grip
The blizzard to their rigor mortis. A bell
Grumbles when the reverberations strip
The thatching from its spire,
The search-guns click and spit and split up timber
And nick the slate roofs of the Holstenwall
Where torn-up tilestones crown the victor. Fall
And winter, spring and summer guns unlimber
And lumber down the narrow gabled street
Past your gray, sorry, and ancestral house
Where the dynamited walnut tree
Shadows a squat, old, wind-torn gate and cows
The bristling podesta. You will not see Strutting children or meet
The peg-leg and reproachful counselor
With a forget-me-not in his buttonhole
When the unseasoned liberators roll
Into the Market Square, ground arms before
The Rathaus; but already lily stands
Burgeon the resurrected Rhineland, and a rough Cathedral lifts its eye. Pleasant enough,
Voi ch'entrate, and your life is in your hands.

To Peter Taylor on the Feast of the Epiphany

Peter, the war has taught me what you know:
 All wars and rumors are designed to show
 Not even Armageddon will suffice,
 Or turn the hero skating on thin ice,
 When Whore and Beast and Dragon rise for air
 From allegoric waters. Fear is where
 We glitter: where the little minds recall
 How wisdom trailed the star into a stall
 And knelt in holy terror to confer
 Its fabulous gold and frankincense and myrrh:
 And where the lantern-noses scrimmage down
 The highway to the sea below this town
 And the sour barker rigs his baby planes
 To lift old Adam's dollars for his pains:—
 There on the thawing ice, in red and white
 And blue, the bugs are buzzing for the flight.
 December's six thin hours have shot their round
 Of sorrows with the sun into the sound,
 And still the grandsires battle through the slush
 To storm the landing pilot with a rush—
 Until their cash and somersaulting snare
 Fear with its fingered stop-watch in mid-air.

ROBERT LOWELL

Seven Women Poets

MODERN WOMEN POETS OF SPANISH AMERICA.

By Sidonia Carmen Rosenbaum. Hispanic Institute. $4.

THE same academic organization which, twenty years ago, first put Gabriela Mistral's poems into book form has now come out with the first serious study in English devoted to modern women poets south of the Rio Grande. In it Miss Mistral appears, not as the central figure, but as one of three successors of a poet less known in the United States, Delmira Agustini of Uruguay, whom the author calls "the first woman who can truly be called a modernist." Those summoned to carry flowers before her are Maria Enriqueta of Mexico (wife of the distinguished historian Carlos Peyreya), Juana Borrero of Cuba, Maria Eugenia Vaz Ferreira of Uruguay. Those who follow in her train, successors if not disciples, are Miss Mistral herself, Alfonsina Storni of Argentina, Juana de Ibarbourou of Uruguay. The latter three may be read in scattered recent translations here.

To those inclined to raise an eyebrow at what may appear a somewhat arbitrary choice of figures, ranged in a hierarchy that stirs immediate questions, it should be explained that Miss Rosenbaum, born in Guatemala of European parents, brought up in the United States, and well known at Columbia University for bibliographical work in the field of Latin American literature, has telescoped two possible books into one—a volume of literary essays and a doctoral thesis devoted to exploring certain technical points. Both books suffer somewhat from the compression. So may the casual reader, but the loot therein is worth the effort. Books in English that give a picture of what it costs to be a woman poet in Latin America are very rare.

Those costs must apparently be assessed in terms of individual suffering rather than of community disapproval. Latin America, like Saxon America, may prefer that women's voices be still, but it is far more generous when they turn out to be the voices of poets than is its northern neighbor. Juana Borrero, the "tormented adolescent" of nineteenth-century Cuba who poured out three volumes of passionate verses before her early death, could hardly have achieved an international reputation had she been born in Cedar Rapids. Maria Eugenia Vaz Ferreira, tragic and difficult sister of a famous Uruguayan philosopher, who refused to let any of her verses be published while she lived, is in that a counterpart of our own Emily Dickinson, but the fame of a repressed and self-frustrated genius was hers from the time her first poems were read to interested friends. That she seems not to have enjoyed it must be blamed on neurosis rather than on lack of recognition or approval. Only Alfonsina Storni, in many ways the most interesting of the seven pictured here, felt the sting of social disapproval, and that was not so much because of her poetry as because of the kind of life she led. A hard-driven journalist and teacher, with an illegitimate child to support, she made her friends where she could find them, and her ways are said to have been as free as her speech.

Whether they are precursors or followers of the modernist tide which Ruben Dario initiated and which did so much to sweep away the rubbish of a dead romanticism from Spanish poetry, it must be admitted that there is still plenty of romantic illusion about these women. They find little satisfaction in reality. Life is sterile, men are stupid, aspiration outruns achievement, desire for escape haunts their dreams—escape into a better world, into the arms of a lover who is the composite ideal of a dozen fictional heroes. Of the seven, Gabriela Mistral and Juana de Ibarbourou have the keenest sensory appreciation of nature, and the latter, who was brought up in the wild country of northern Uruguay, is enchantingly aware of sight and sound and smell and taste. Miss Rosenbaum makes much of her "chaste impudicity" and of the freedom of erotic expression which marks her poetry as well as that of Miss Storni, but there is little shock left in it in 1946, and no reason to give it a mystic connotation which seems, from the northern point of view, as unnecessary as it is unwarranted.

It is the author's thesis that her seven chosen poets mark the emergence in Spanish American letters of a group of women too numerous to be considered exceptional. "This flowering of feminine literature in Hispano-American coincides with the triumph of feminism everywhere," but the literature is by no means feminist in character, nor has it any political connotation. What came forth, when the South American thus found her voice, was the primitive woman hitherto hidden behind the early nineteenth-century wrappings of church prudery and romantic drapery. That woman yearned to be loved, burned to be loved, screamed to be loved, but the love she demanded seemed to have little connection with what she could get from the men about her. Delmira Agustini fled back to her mother's arms after two months of marriage to a handsome horse trader, escaping from "vulgarity." Less than a year later they were found dead together—a highly colored public scandal bearing little resemblance to the ideal love which formed the theme of Delmira's poems.

That this was tragic for Delmira no one doubts, but was it evidence of the feminist drive? It would be interesting to explore farther the manifestations of that drive, and the reasons why feminism—if feminism it was—took this particular form in South America whereas it found its way into political channels here. Certainly the fact that women now feel free to speak where they had previously remained silent marks a change. Certainly the criticism of South American men implied in their defining of the kind of love they want, and presumably do not get, indicates a sense of what they consider women's rights in one important field. That it happens to be a field in which, since the end of the romantic era, few North American women poets have shown signs of being balked makes one wonder if there is not a confusion here between feminism and a delayed romanticism masked in the trappings of modernism.

This book is an interesting beginning. One hopes it will be followed by comparative studies of pairs of Northern and Southern poets which will bring the latter into clearer focus and set them in proper proportion within our frames of reference. Behind the somewhat stilted form and academic phraseology to which Miss Rosenbaum has subjected her material are incandescent spirits and a depth of poetic devotion which must be completely grasped if we are to continue to explore Latin American culture with any real benefit to ourselves or them. It is a marker of the distance we have already come along that road that a bilingual study like this, written in English about material in Spanish which is not translated, should be sent to The Nation in the expectation of finding sufficient public so that it would be reviewed.

MILDRED ADAMS

BRIEFER COMMENT

Shakespeare as Historian

THE ROMANTIC CRITIC of Shakespeare concerned himself especially with the uniqueness of his subject, whom he tended to regard as a pure genius and therefore outside time or social setting. A little later scholars sought for light by studying playwrights contemporary with him and also the theatrical practices of his epoch. Today it is the general intellectual background of Shakespeare's age which is being most elaborately investigated, and Professor E. M. W. Tillyard's "Shakespeare's History Plays" (Macmillan, $3) is an ambitious contribution to the work being done in this field. Arguing that the author of the so-called chronicle plays was familiar with the leading ideas of his time even though he was not, technically, a learned man, Professor Tillyard surveys the orthodox Elizabethan conception of the meaning of history and concludes that Shakespeare almost inevitably accepted the usual view—namely, that history is an account of the deviations from and returns to that right social order which is not arbitrary or man-made but established by nature. He rejects the contention that the historical plays are to be regarded as mere preliminary attempts to develop Shakespearean tragedy. Instead, he divides them into three groups, with the second, which includes "Richard II" and the two parts of "Henry IV," representing the achievement of a form that is "entirely successful and presents not even a parallel to the form of tragedy." "Henry V," on the other hand, begins a development which leads to a concern with the tragedy of the individual rather than with the health or sickness of society. Professor Tillyard's book is hardly for the casual reader, but it is certain to be widely discussed by students of Shakespeare.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Loving Pen in Hand

EXPERIENCE SUGGESTS that the one course of true love which runs smooth is the correspondence course. When two people, partly yielding to circumstance or principle, choose to give vent to their mutual love solely through letters, the world usually gains a happy-ending story, and sometimes a batch of missives worth rereading. The widowed Jefferson, American minister in Paris in the late 1780's, and Maria Cosway, the pretty and accomplished wife of an English hack painter of repute, lived and wrote out such a story, now for the first time in print ("My Head and My Heart," Putnam's, $3) under the editorship of Helen Duprey Bullock.

The small volume is good reading for fanciers of the eighteenth century, with its many amiable celebrities and its faded yet ingenious rhetoric of sentiment: notice how Jefferson works in je t'aime in a passage of the most formal and unadulterous effusiveness. His letters generally are

H. G. WELLS— Prophet of the Atomic Bomb

Read his latest book:

"CRUX ANSATA—An Indictment
of the Roman Catholic Church"

An historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis.

Cloth Binding $1.75

Paper-covered $1.25

Also get a copy of

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS" by L. H. Lehmann
A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist
collaboration.

Cloth Binding $1.75

Paper-covered $1.00

COMBINATION OFFERS	Both Cloth Bound Books	$3.00
	Both Paper Bound Books	$2.00

New Pamphlet

"VATICAN POLICY
IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR"

48 pages of Documented Facts 25¢

Free to those who return this ad with their order
for the above books

Order From:

AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. T-351

229 WEST 48TH STREET

NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

shorter than Mrs. Cosway's, he being the busier and the more spied upon, but they continue warm and faithful through forty years of private and public achievement. Hers lose nothing in affection either, but they depict, through one distressing detail after another, a life denied to love and filled with minor good works and a few songs. For Maria Cosway was something of a composer, and the introducer of the present volume, Carleton Smith, promises us the scores when Europe is once again accessible to the inoffensive.

Judging from the number of persons engaged in similar tasks, editing Jefferson has become a popular pastime. But on the basis of this latest effort, I should like to point out one constant difficulty constantly overlooked: Jefferson had a habit of spelling by ear, especially foreign words. When he writes "conveiance" in English, no editor thinks of adopting the spelling for his own editorial matter. It follows that when Jefferson goes astray on French or other place names, persons, or local expressions, the editor must look them up. That is what he is paid for, in glory or in cash. Mrs. Bullock follows a wretched tradition in taking her hero as orthographer, for what is merely eccentric in him becomes misleading in her and irritating at last to the alert reader.

JACQUES BARZUN

The Navy's Story

GILBERT CANT, author of "The Great Pacific Victory" (John Day, $3.50), is a contributing editor of Time, and has written other books on the war in the Pacific. This volume takes up the story with the conclusion of the Guadalcanal campaign in February, 1943, and carries it through to the end of the war and the Japanese surrender. It is not a critical analysis of the operations but a narrative history of the last two and a half years of the war, told clearly and concisely, and as such it can be recommended without qualification.

Although the army's campaigns are sketched in, this is primarily the navy's story. MacArthur and the Southwest Pacific command receive secondary attention: it is plain that the author regards Nimitz as the outstanding figure of the Pacific war. The Commander-in-Chief, Pacific Ocean Areas—sixty-four million square miles of water with infrequent islands to vary the monotony—is pictured here as a modest, unpretentious man who did not, to begin with, wish to accept the Pacific command after Pearl Harbor. Nimitz "had come to the conclusion that diplomatic, political, and other considerations being what they were, he might have had the fleet sunk under him just as had Kimmel." He therefore suggested that Vice-Admiral Pye—one of Kimmel's subordinates—be appointed to succeed Kimmel after the Pearl Harbor disaster. But Knox would not have it, and Nimitz went out to take over. Nevertheless, it is clear that the new Commander-in-Chief did not consider Kimmel and Short culpable, and Nimitz continued to use Kimmel's Pearl Harbor staff, indifferent to the pointed criticism which this policy aroused.

Occasionally the reader encounters statements about which some questions might be raised. For example: "Most of the admirals exercising important commands had had more ex-

USSR ★ FOREIGN POLICY

by Victor A. Yakhontoff

Author of Russia and the Soviet Union in the Far East,
The Chinese Soviets, Eyes on Japan, etc.

"A valuable record of the Russian point of view toward international affairs."—Foster Rhea Dulles,
New York Herald Tribune

"A very clear and precise record... delivered with exceptional clarity and consistency... a thoroughly competent and illuminating performance... displays the entire political process with cool factuality that is wholly convincing... an admirable and important book."—Arthur Upham Pope, in Soviet Russia Today.

At all bookstores • $3.50

Coward-McCann, Inc.

You may again buy BOOKS through The Nation

Because of government restrictions on wrapping material, book publishers, for the past two years have refused to accept orders for less than five books. For this reason The Nation was obliged temporarily to discontinue its Readers' Service Department.

Now that these restrictions have been dropped Nation readers can again avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, postfree if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to
The Readers' Service Division

THE NATION

10 Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

A Call to President Truman: Recognize The Spanish Republic!

ON February 26 a Memorandum on Spain was submitted to the President signed by Freda Kirchwey, president, The Nation Associates; Raymond Swing, chairman of the board, Americans United for World Organization; Reinhold Niebuhr, president of the Union for Democratic Action; Frank P. Graham, chairman of the Advisory Council, The Nation Associates; William L. Shirer, chairman of The Friends of the Spanish Republic; Philip Murray, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations; Jo Davidson, chairman of the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions; Henry A. Atkinson, secretary of The Church Peace Union; Elmer Benson, chairman of the Executive Committee, National Citizens' Political Action Committee.

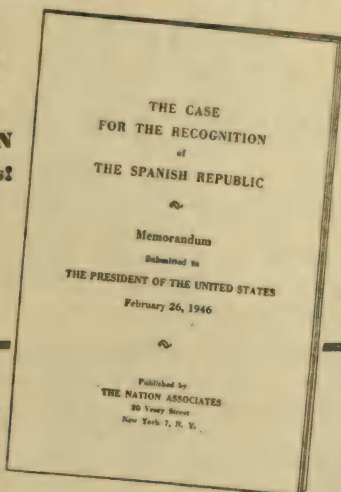

The program proposed by these leaders of eight national organizations assures the liberation of the Spanish people and security for the world. Support their program by writing or wiring President Truman and Secretary of State Byrnes.

The joint statement issued by the United States, Great Britain and France places impossible conditions upon the Spanish people. There is great danger that unless we act now Franco will be replaced by a military regime or a monarchy.

Nation readers may obtain full text of the Memorandum, free, by filling out and mailing the coupon below.

free
to
NATION Readers!

THE NATION
ASSOCIATES,
20 Vesey St.
New York 7
N. Y.

Please send me at once a free copy of the 28-page Memorandum "The Case for the Recognition of the Spanish Republic."

NAME

STREET

CITY ZONE & STATE.....

perience than their equivalents in the army ground forces or air forces. Their record is better in about the same proportion as their experience!" It must be remembered that while the war of 1917-18 was a major test for the army, it provided little in the way of combat for the navy, which had not been seriously engaged since 1898. Indeed, it is much to the credit of the admirals that they were able to achieve so notable a record in spite of their almost complete lack of previous battle experience. Again, it may be supposed that many critics will be unable to agree with the author's complacent verdict on Okinawa.

The book as a whole, however, seems certain to find general acceptance and approval. And few will quarrel with the author's concluding paragraph: "Whether or not the organization of the United Nations succeeds in preventing further outbreaks of hostilities, it is virtually certain that there can never be another war fought along the same lines as that which swept across the Pacific."

HARVEY S. FORD

Literature and the Good Earth

IT SAYS ON THE JACKET of "God Made the Country," by Edward Townsend Booth (Knopf, $2.50), that "lives of great writers from Hesiod to Tolstoy prove that literature, like life itself, is rooted in the soil of the good earth." The author makes no such claim, nor does his book prove anything of the sort. What Mr. Booth's essays do illustrate is that some writers have sometimes enjoyed the country very much, and written productively there. Moreover, if the individuals cited are fair samples—it is a little startling to think of Mme de Sévigné, Lady Montagu, Pope, Voltaire, and Walpole as farmers, or even rusticators—their enjoyment of the country seems in direct relation to the amount of money and fame they took with them, to the possibility of congenial visitors, and to the number of hired hands they could find to do most of their work. Even the relatively poor—Cowper, Wordsworth, Carlyle, Hawthorne—managed, it seems, to have some woman to wait on them hand and foot. Mr. Booth is well read; he is in favor of old-fashioned virtue and against false urban sophistication; he sincerely likes the country; and he writes a rather heavygoing prose.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Pamphleteer

LEO HUBERMAN is in my opinion the best pamphleteer in America. I know of no one who has a greater capacity for the clear and graphic explanation of complex economic and social issues. His latest, "The Truth About Unions" (Pamphlet Press, Reynal and Hitchcock, $1), will not disappoint those who remember "Man's Worldly Goods." "The Truth About Unions" is an unpretentious exposition of the basic facts about trade unionism, simple enough for anyone to understand and comprehensive enough to be useful even to those who think they already know enough about the subject. It is to Huberman's credit that he does not duck the hard ones. His chapters on jurisdictional disputes, feather-bedding, and racketeering say the unpleasant things that must be said in any honest complete view of the labor movement.

Flash! Book Values: All new, original editions; W. Seagle, Quest for Law, $5 Knopf, only $2.00; L. Adamic, My Native Land, $3.75 Harper—$1.50; M. Ernst, Best Is Yet, $3 Harper—$1.00; H. L. Ickes, Autobio. of a Curmudgeon, $3 list—$1.25; J. Steinbeck, Cannery Row, $1.00; Pertinax, Gravediggers of France—$1.50; Lester Cohen, Coming Home, $1.00. . . . Downtown Book Bazaar, 212 Broadway, New York 7, N. Y.

I. F. STONE

Ocean to Ocean

EARLY IN 1778 Captain Cook's Resolution dropped anchor in Nootka Sound. John Ledyard was the only American in the crew. Here this Connecticut Yankee, scion of seafaring stock, had the vision of a nation which would extend from ocean to ocean. It was a vision which led him to friendship with Jefferson, Robert Morris, and John Paul Jones, across oceans and continents, and to an early and unmarked grave in Egypt. Helen Augur has told the story of John Ledyard in "Passage to Glory" (Doubleday, $3). Based on scholarly research, written with imagination and sympathy, this is an interesting and rewarding book about a too little-known American.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN

MOTION PICTURES

JOHN PAYNE	MAUREEN O'HARA	WILLIAM BENDIX	— ON STAGE — THE HARTMANS Liberace DICK BROWN — EXTRA! — HERB SHRINER
---------------	-------------------	-------------------	--

SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY
A 20TH CENTURY-FOX PICTURE
ROXY, 7th Ave. and 50th St.

PARAMOUNT presents BING CROSBY BOB HOPE DOROTHY LAMOUR — In — "ROAD TO UTOPIA" MIDNIGHT FEATURE NIGHTLY NOW PARAMOUNT	— In Person — GENNY GOODMAN His Clarinet and Orchestra with The Famous Sextet — Featuring — MEL POWELL PAT HENNING
---	--

TIMES SQUARE

Brooklyn BUSHWICK DYKER GREENPOINT KENMORE MADISON ORPHEUM PROSPECT REPUBLIC TILYU Coney Island	RKO NOW GRIPPING DRAMA OF MODERN PIRACY! GEORGE RAFT CLAIRE TREVOR • HASSO 'JOHNNY ANGEL' Based on CHARLES GORDON BOOTH'S Novel — AND — 'ALLOTMENT WIVES' Kay Francis Paul Kelly
---	---

Queens
Kith's
FLUSHING
Kith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
Manhattan
COLONIAL

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD Presents
MAURICE EVANS
In His New Production of Shakespeare's
HAMLET
Columbus Circle Thea. B'way at 59th St.—CO. 5-1173
Eves. 8:30. Mts. Thu. & Sat. 2:30

UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT Lyrics by Music by
A DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SAUL ROSENBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE B'way at 53rd St. Mats.: Sat. & Sun. Eves. incl. Sun. 2:30 & 8:30

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
A NEW MUSICAL PLAY
CAROUSEL
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Jean Darling • Eric Mattson • Christine Johnson • Edie Afton
MAJESTIC THEATRE 44th St. W. of Broadway, Eves. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT
OKLAHOMA!
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Harold Keel • Joseph Buloff • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
ST. JAMES THEATRE 44th St. W. of Broadway, Eves. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"DESERVES ITS GREAT SUCCESS"—Nichols, The Times
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S
I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account"
with JOHN TETZEL • ADRIENNE GESSNER • RICHARD BISHOP
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway, Phone Circle 6-4636.
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:35 Sharp.

"GREAT STUFF"—Kronenberger, PM
KERN AND HAMMERSTEIN'S
SHOW BOAT
Music by JEROME KERN. Books and Lyrics by OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd.
Based on the novel by EDNA FERBER • Staged by HAGGARD SHORT.
ZIEGFELD THEA., 54th Street and Sixth Avenue, Cl. 5-5200.
Eves. 8:30 Sharp. Mts. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp.

"A Gag-Happy-Meaning-ful New Hit"
—Life Magazine
MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA. 45th Street East of B'way, CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:40.

The New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

THE only new plays to reach Broadway during the two weeks just past were two ambitious failures. Robert Ardrey's "Jeb," another melodrama about the return of a Negro veteran to the South, closed after a few performances; Maxwell Anderson's "Truckline Cafe" is scheduled to withdraw before this piece can get into print. "Jeb" died quietly, but "Truckline Cafe" has been made the occasion of a minor hullabaloo. First the producers and then Mr. Anderson himself bought space in some of the daily papers for an attack upon the critics, who were accused of frivolity as well as incompetence and compared, in a general way, with the members of the Jukes family. I do not usually review defunct productions unless they seem to me of very unusual importance, and though I was certainly not bored by "Truckline Cafe," I do not think either it or "Jeb" an outstandingly good play. Nevertheless, since a controversy has been started, I should like to say a few words both about current criticism and about Anderson's latest drama.

The charge that most of the critics now practicing have standards and tastes markedly at variance with those of the general public and that this public is therefore unable to learn from the reviews whether or not it would be likely to enjoy a given production seems to me difficult to reconcile in that sweeping form with the further charge that these same critics can, nevertheless, kill a play. If the public stays away when the critics turn thumbs down, that probably means that the public has learned that it does not usually enjoy what the daily papers have unanimously or almost unanimously condemned. Indeed, I should be inclined to argue that the real weakness of current journalistic criticism of the drama lies in the fact that it is so little more than a reflection of the current fashions in thought and taste and opinion. Ideally a critic should at least influence the judgments of his reader, and very little current dramatic criticism makes any real attempt to exercise that sort of influence. Your critic today is too little more than merely a man who shares the taste of his public and therefore can tell it what it will or will not like.

There are, nevertheless, two kinds of plays in connection with which the generalization just made seems to me to break down. I have gathered no statistics, but I think it safe to say that certain critics working on the important dailies may be trusted to put in at least a few qualifying good words for any play which in obvious journalistic fashion treats of some social or political question. That they always actually like every such play I am not sure, but a somewhat befuddled conscience compels them to praise it, or at least its "intentions," and they there part company with a public which rather resents being preached at unless the preacher is a really good one. On the other hand, the newspaper critics seem to me to be almost without exception less predisposed than audiences to look with favor upon plays which are essentially serious in subject matter and in general treatment but which either are non-political and non-economic or approach political and economic questions by indirect or oblique routes. Most of Mr. Anderson's serious plays belong in this latter class. He is essentially serious, but only once, in "Gods of the Lightning," did he attempt the method of didactic journalism. His latest play is rather simpler than most, and it is direct in its approach to a rather sensational aspect of the soldier's return. But its theme is moral rather than political, and that probably explains why, though "Jeb" got mixed notices, "Truckline Cafe" was set upon with extraordinary violence.

The scene is a chili cafe attached to a group of tourist cabins near a California beach. Briefly, the story is concerned with three young women who have been long separated from their husbands. One of them has been absorbed in the care of a child now three years old; one has had a casual love affair during her husband's absence; the third, now working as a waitress, had run away when her supposedly dead mate turned up. When he finds her she tells him that, thinking him dead, she too took up with another man and that any possible resumption of marriage would be a failure. But when the husband of the loosest of the three shoots her and then wishes he hadn't, the heroine comes to agree with her husband's thesis: we cannot expect life after the upheaval of a war to be what it was before, but we should go on as best we may with what is left of marriage as well as with what is left of everything else—many men have died to give us the opportunity to do just that.

Now this, though probably a sensible conclusion, is not an especially original one. Mr. Anderson has chosen to tell the story somewhat more straightforwardly than he usually tells his stories and has left it relatively bare of the comments which he usually inserts. Only two moments—one when the child talks over the phone to his father in Hawaii, the other when the murderer asks the waitress to give him a cup of coffee before she notifies the police—are as tense as they might be. Even the attempt to make the atmosphere of the cafe seem real on the level of literal fact is not always successful. And yet, for all that, I found myself nearly always interested, and I see no justification whatsoever for treating the play as though it were merely incompetent and contemptible. I saw it after the protests of Mr. Anderson and his producers had already been published, and it may be that the audience which saw the play with me was a special one. But for the record I should add that this audience gave a hearty curtain call.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

WITH Toscanini's performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony in Victor's catalogue you would think there was no need of a performance by Stokowski; but you would be concerned with Beethoven's symphony, whereas Victor is concerned with the sales of Stokowski recordings. Victor would undoubtedly tell you these recordings make possible the recordings which do not sell that many copies; and you could then ask where were the recordings for whose sake Victor claimed to record Stokowski's performances and worse—where, specifically, were the new recordings by Schnabel of sonatas by Beethoven and Schubert, concertos by Mozart? As a matter of fact Victor is not only issuing Rubinstein recordings of Beethoven but withdrawing Schnabel's recording of the C minor Concerto, so that if you don't want the Rubinstein or the Iturbi performance of that work you will either have to pay a prohibitive price for an imported copy of the Schnabel (if you can get it), or do without.

In this performance of the "Pastoral"

BOOKS FOUND FREE/0

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books OLD or NEW mailed POST-PAYABLE.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION

22 East 17th Street, New York City

Stokowski uses the New York City Symphony (Set 1032; $5.50), which plays and sounds very well. Listening to the first movement I was agreeably surprised by Stokowski's simple treatment of it, which continued all the way to the coda, where there were the first erratic inflections and changes of pace. I was, therefore, not surprised at all by the perversely slow tempo and sentimental phrasing of the second movement; the slow beginning and sudden acceleration of the fourth movement; the sentimental slowing down of the end of the last movement. It might be worse; but it is bad enough. The performance is well-recorded.

If there are Stokowskiisms, there are also Koussevitzkyisms; and one of them occurs near the end of a Boston Symphony performance of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture (11-9008; $1), where Berlioz's effect is a decrescendo and crescendo without any loss of momentum, but where Koussevitzky slows down the decrescendo to a slow and gradually accelerating tempo for the crescendo. Up to that point the performance is excellent, and the playing of the orchestra a delight to the ear—which is to say that its beautiful sound is well-reproduced, though with some blurring reverberation in loud passages.

I have listened several times to the single (10-9010; $.75) with Haydn's "My Mother Bids Me Bind My Hair" and "She Never Told Her Love," sung by Marian Anderson with Franz Rupp at the piano, but haven't been able to get much pleasure from it. Anderson's singing is uneven, with tones that are produced with freedom and are very beautiful followed by others that are tight and metallic and that even, occasionally, sag in pitch. No replacement has arrived for the cracked single (11-9009; $1) with Brailovsky's performance of Chopin's Nocturne Opus 15 No. 2; nor have I received a copy of the newly issued shellac pressing (Set 1029; $2.50) of the Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony recording of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," so that I haven't been able to hear what differences there are between the sound of the recording from shellac records and its sound from plastic records. And the set (1031; $5.75) of the first volume of Debussy's Preludes performed by E. Robert Schmitz I will discuss later.

Columbia, with Beecham's and Weingartner's performances of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in its catalogue, has issued another by Reiner with the Pittsburgh Symphony (Set 597; $4.50). It is very good, and would be even better without Reiner's tendency to intensified dynamics—to explosive crescendos and sforzatos, and sudden drops from ff to pp where Beethoven asks for a drop to p with a decrescendo to pp. It is recorded with admirable spaciousness, distinctness, and brightness.

Bizet's Symphony, which Rodzinski has recorded with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set 596; $4.50) is a work that he composed at the age of seventeen. It has some engaging melodies, is neatly put together, and is pleasant to listen to. The lighter portions are well-performed; but a melodic passage for violins in the second movement is played with inflated tone and expressiveness that are unsuited to this music, and other passages stagger under the over-muscular treatment they get. The recorded sound on some sides is clear, bright, and agreeable; on others it is unpleasantly sharp; on the fifth it is suddenly deafening.

The performance of the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" by Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra (12269-D; $1) seems good, but comes off the record with its sound dull and indistinct.

Books in Short

"Steelways of New England," by Alvin F. Harlow, Creative Age Press, $3.50, is the first volume of a sixteen-volume series on the Railroads of America planned by the Creative Age Press. This highly readable book presents a summary of railroad beginnings, the story of New England railroads and railroad wars, and a brief account of many Yankee railroaders who played leading roles in other sections. Though not well organized, it contains a wealth of interesting incidents and personalities, much valuable social and economic history, and excellent photographs.

"International Cartels," by Ervin Hexner, University of North Carolina Press, $6. Should international cartels be prohibited or socialized or subjected to controls through governmental agreements? Professor Hexner, who combines immense academic knowledge of the subject with practical experience of cartel operations, does not attempt to answer this question. Instead, believing that information should precede policy, he provides a broad survey of private international marketing arrangements as they developed in the inter-war period. More than a hundred case studies, together with the complete texts of a number of cartel agreements, make this an invaluable sourcebook.

"Meet Your Ancestors," by Roy Chapman Andrews, Viking, $3. Dr. Andrews's invitation is addressed primarily to young men and women in the hope of stimulating some of them to seek adventure in hunting for the bones of primitive man. He succeeds in conveying the thrills of anthropological field work while providing a useful, up-to-date summary of our knowledge of our human and subhuman ancestors. The record is still full of gaps which, until more material can be unearthed, must be flimsily bridged with hypothesis. For young scientists with patience, luck, and daring there are vast opportunities waiting.

CONTRIBUTORS

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, Jr., a veteran of the war, is the author of "The Age of Jackson."

ROBERT LOWELL is the author of a book of poems entitled "Land of Unlikeness."

MILDRED ADAMS has been for many years a student of Spanish and Hispano-American literature.

JACQUES BARZUN, associate professor of history at Columbia University, is the author of "Teacher in America" and other books.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES is the author of several books of verse.

Courses in MAGAZINE WRITING fiction • non-fiction

The Magazine Institute, a private school owned and operated by successful writers and editors, offers practical, up-to-date training in story and article writing. You work in your own home. Every assignment you send in is returned with detailed criticism.

EXPERT INSTRUCTION. An experienced writer or editor takes you in hand, answering all your questions, helping you find the type of work for which you are naturally suited. Before long you are writing in your own home fiction stories, essays, short sketches, whatever you are best fitted to do.

Send coupon today for free catalog which tells about opportunities in magazine writing.

The Magazine Institute, Inc., Dept. FI-8
Rockefeller Center, New York 20, N. Y.

Please send catalog, without obligation, to:

NAME

ADDRESS

(Confidential. No salesman will call.)

Letters to the Editors

Amnesty for C. O.'s

Dear Sirs: In December the American Civil Liberties Union released a statement which reported that more than sixty prominent citizens, all of them non-pacifists, had petitioned President Truman for a Christmas amnesty for conscientious objectors. There were still several thousand conscientious objectors, including Jehovah's Witnesses, Hopi Indians, and Puerto Rican War objectors, in federal institutions. So far the petition has not been granted. Full amnesty, including restoration of civil rights, is essential because without that, conscientious objectors, being legally felons, will find it extremely difficult or impossible to get civil-service jobs or to qualify for medicine, dentistry, or law.

A Committee for Amnesty (for all objectors to war and conscription) has now been formed. It includes persons identified with a great variety of organizations, including the Federal Council of Churches, the American Civil Liberties Union, the Prison Committee of the New York Yearly Meeting of Friends, the National Service Board for Religious Objectors, the Socialist Party, and various pacifist organizations and groups.

The committee, of which Evan W. Thomas, M. D., is treasurer, is appealing to the public for $5,000 to launch a nation-wide campaign. This is a small sum. We are confident that many will wish to make an immediate contribution. Remittances may be made payable to Committee for Amnesty, Room 1029, 5 Beekman Street, New York 7, New York.

A. J. MUSTE,

Temporary Chairman

New York, January 14

Mr. Powell Objects

Dear Sirs: I have before me a clipping of a book review by one E. Franklin Frazier on my recent publication "Marching Blacks."

I cannot in any way object to those critics who do not like the book, or me. That is the prerogative of a critic. I do, however, want to point out one thing in Mr. Frazier's review that is not in keeping with The Nation's policy. I quote, "In championing the cause of the black masses against the talented tenth of lighter complexion, the Reverend Mr.

Powell indulges in much rabble-rousing, claiming that he is a descendant of the black field Negroes."

First, Mr. Frazier's untruthful assumption that the talented tenth were of lighter complexion is not only dangerous but proves the very point of the book. Second, saying that I indulge in much rabble-rousing is another untruth because all of the section dealing with light-versus-dark and house-versus-field Negroes comes almost word for word from Dr. Buell Gallagher's treatise on The American College on American Caste. Dr. Gallagher, as you know, is white and a former president of Talladega College in Alabama.

The third untruth is that I claim to be a descendant of black field Negroes. This I never stated. I am the son of a former share-cropper and the grandson of a branded slave.

In these three misstatements your reviewer proves the point that I was making: that too many Negroes of the reviewer's type—lighter-skinned, privileged, educated—use their supposed qualifications to divide and hold back the Negro man.

ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR.

Washington, D. C., February 23

Mr. Frazier's Rebuttal

Dear Sirs: In my brief review of Mr. Powell's "Marching Blacks," a book which contains many errors and unwarranted generalizations, I attempted to be generous. Since, however, the author charges me with untruthful statements, it will be necessary to document some of the defects of the book.

Despite much ambiguity in his statements, one point of his book is that Negroes were formerly divided on the basis of caste. The "upper caste" included some one million free Negroes, slaves and mulattoes. The alliance of the light-skinned Negro with the house Negro was one of the most disastrous forces retarding the progress of the race" (p. 13). Mr. Powell also states, "My folks were field Negroes for countless generations. That's why I belong to the masses. I am proud to consider myself a new Negro—a marching black" (p. 15). In Chapter 5, The People's Man, he tells how Harlem Negroes were divided on the basis of color until he came along and united them. All this is reminiscent of Garvey, who tried to draw a line between the lighter and darker Negroes.

In my reference to the talented tenth I merely used Du Bois's term, and in describing them as of lighter complexion I was simply stating a well-known fact. Every study that has been made of the American Negro has revealed that the majority of professional men and intellectual leaders were of mixed blood. This is not due to any innate inferiority in blacks or to an "alliance" against the darker masses. It represents a social process which is observable in Brazil and other countries.

Mr. Powell fails to explain why he said (p. 39), "The leader of this group, Thomas Jesse Jones, was the first Negro to emerge in this century as an educated, subsidized Uncle Tom." Dr. Jones as everyone knows is a white man. This is typical of the errors upon which Mr. Powell bases his interpretative history of the rise of the black common man. Finally, he proves my charge of rabble-rousing when he, indistinguishable from white, points to me, a decided Negro type, as an example of the light-skinned Negroes who are dividing and holding back the Negro man.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

Washington, D. C., February 28

Longo's Defense

Dear Sirs: Only the unselfish motive in this request and the urgency of its nature overcomes the embarrassment that I would otherwise feel in asking you for aid once more.

Our defense committee is in need of additional funds for expert examinations of Longo's voting records, for court stenographic work, and for witnesses which will be necessary for his coming trial on March 4 in Jersey City. Even at this moment the Hague forces . . . are desperately striving to prevent a trial and were before the State Supreme Court today not as prosecutors or "interested parties" in the litigation but rather as "citizens" and, of all things, "in the interest of justice." Should the Supreme Court uphold the ruling of Judge Ziegner in granting a new trial, that will mean more hearings, more delay, and continued expenses.

In any event, we must have money. Our bills for work prior to this time are all but paid. And bear in mind that not a cent has gone to any individual.

As a matter of fact, Raymond Chasan voluntarily gave his valuable services, and money besides! Your readers were exceptionally responsive once before and might welcome another opportunity to help. Those who have not already contributed may be willing to this time. The appeal now is not for a "lost cause," as "protest"; money spent now can actually give one man his freedom and for the first time in our state drive a blow at a corrupt system that has weakened the foundation of democracy—the true administration of justice.

GEORGE G. HOLLINGSHEAD

Treasurer, Longo Defense Committee
Jersey City, N. J. February 14

To Put It Briefly

Dear Sirs: This should be a statement of the times: The trouble with private industry is, it's too damned private.

ELI SIEGEL

New York, March 5

Pepsi-Cola vs. Salon

Dear Sirs: I have a slight suspicion that your Clement Greenberg is a bit of a snob. His resentment against the Associated American Artists is typical of the academic and darned near esoteric attitude that many art critics demonstrate when it seems that art is getting nearer to the people and farther away from the upper brackets and salons.

I have no interest in the business success of the Associated American Artists, but I think thousands of people like myself would not have had the pleasant contact with art if this project had not made a great deal of it available in mass-production form.

I don't see why the million of Pepsi-Cola drinkers should not also be patrons of the Pepsi-Cola art exhibit which Mr. Greenberg finds slightly on the Kitsch side. Is there any reason why talented artists cannot develop properly merely because they pick up a few extra bucks through the Associated American Artists and Lucky Strike cigarettes, who were smart enough to buy a series of paintings from Associated for an advertising campaign.

I don't think we'll ever have any improvement in the public's taste for art as long as critics like Mr. Greenberg advocate a new cultural élite "to counterbalance the pressure of the new mass market." Everytime I go to a stuffy museum to look at a painting I realize it's snobs like Clement Greenberg who are responsible for taking art farther away from the people and bringing words like "Kitsch" nearer to the phonies who have the dough to buy the kind of paintings that are beyond both the comprehension and the pocket-books of the masses.

One more word: Benton and Grant Wood were popularized by the Associated American Artists. That's enough to justify Associated American Artists.

TONI GALE

New York, February 25

Cultivation, Not Concession

Dear Sirs: It is one of the tragedies of our time that solicitude for any of the arts forces one to be a snob. The mass public of industrial countries, wittingly or unwittingly, asks for such concessions to the limitations of its taste as cannot but debase the arts. The real trouble lies deeper, of course—in the causes of these limitations rather than in the limitations themselves. The fact is that most people in our society lack the security, leisure, and comfort indispensable to the cultivation of taste; and only a socialist society can provide security, leisure, and comfort.

Whether the Associated American Artists justified itself by popularizing Benton and Wood is a question I cannot decide. What I do know is that Benton is and Wood was among the notable vulgarizers of our period: they offered us an inferior product under the guise of high art.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

New York, February 28

A Bad State of Affairs

Dear Sirs: A few days ago I remarked that we should get some nice Americans over here to counteract the anti-American feeling which is now so apparent in England. The answer was, "Are there any nice Americans?" That is a very bad state of affairs, and I think we ought to face up to it, and try to see, without prejudice, what has caused it.

We all know about the misunderstandings that arise when two peoples, speaking more or less the same language, do not observe the same behavior patterns. But what is happening now is special. I want to try and explain our side, not to say it is right, but simply in order that the bad situation may have a chance of healing.

I have talked with a number of people who would by any standards be considered intelligent and progressive. Many of them, like myself, find themselves in the grip of anti-American feeling which they know is irrational and therefore wrong, but which none the less tends to influence their actions. It is partly due, of course, to the continued presence of an American army. No armies ever behave as well as would their constituent members acting as individuals. The American army was no worse than other armies; probably it was better than some. The difficulty was that there was more of it, and it certainly attracted some of the silliest and worst of our own population who had taken Hollywood films at their face value. I think the Poles were fully as unpopular, but I doubt whether the Norwegians or Czechs ever were. However, there were many fewer of them! Apart from the obvious bad feeling caused by higher pay in a country where shortages have sent up the prices of minor unrationed luxuries, country people and British soldiers living near the camps have been very much upset by the waste of what is, to us, precious food in the American camps.

But that is not the immediate cause of the sharp fall in friendliness toward the United States. It started, I suppose, with lend-lease. It was not that we were unprepared for the end of lend-lease, or indeed that any of us supposed that it ought to go on, but the manner of ending was rather a shock, and followed too closely on the coming of the Labor government for us not to be suspicious that there was some connection between the two events. The real thing, however, was Bretton Woods. I wonder whether you realize in America that we have a particular historical reason for our unwillingness to be tied to the gold standard. All of us in the Labor movement remember only too clearly the summer of 1931 when the crash came. Ramsay MacDonald betrayed his own people for the sake of sticking to the American gold standard, and split the Labor movement so deeply that the Tories were in for eight years, and the last hope of peace for Europe vanished. All that left a scar on us, and we felt that the latest proposals were a preparation for the same thing happening again. I know you had the same slump, but it did not involve betrayal by a trusted leader and the ending of very bright hopes.

Intellectually I admitted, after talking the thing over, that the proposals were really very reasonable, and yet I felt sore about them. Our dollars were apparently going to buy tobacco, films, and wheat. I don't smoke; I grow oats;

Crossword Puzzle No. 152

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Bird which makes pin lace
- 5 Old weapon with which you might fell a tree without getting too close to it (hyphen, 4-3)
- 9 A rich piece of furniture
- 10 Never-mind-Who suggested that we should hate them, but love their wives
- 11 A frock coat is not part of it (two words, 5 & 4)
- 12 "A -----, hollow-eyed, sharp-looking wretch"
- 13 Rehearse (hyphen, 2-5)
- 15 Tigers, zebras and sergeant-majors are
- 17 Composed
- 19 Has been defined as "one who redoubles his efforts after he has lost sight of his objectives"
- 21 Easy to make this horse caper
- 23 Captured Italian island that equipped America with lamps
- 25 Where the vast anger of the Norwegians is in evidence
- 26 Anagram of 22
- 27 Improved
- 28 He started out by being a beastly king

DOWN

- 1 This bullfighter is a boulder at heart
- 2 Terms for the provisions of "the tools" (hyphen, 5-4)
- 3 Division of an army made up of other divisions

- 4 It is not in us to give judgment against plaintiff
- 5 Where do those who never change their attitude stand today?
- 6 The Knight of the Swan
- 7 Pin it on a girl
- 8 Sad eyes (anag.)
- 14 You may get a fat reward for this later
- 16 It was no mouse he tamed
- 17 Devil and donkey start it, but don't get on together
- 18 Snowed under?
- 19 This artery is in your thigh
- 20 Arranged methodically, with a dolt in the center
- 22 Not a sedentary pursuit; except for the metal-worker
- 24 Do get her a tonic, Henry (hidden)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 151

ACROSS:—1 REMADE; 5 DISCUS; 9 ALIGNED; 11 BARKIS; 12 ALHINO; 13 SEA MILE; 14 NOOK; 17 WINK; 19 SURE THING; 22 VICES; 23 EDILE; 25 FUROR; 26 EARWIG; 27 EASES; 29 SONNY; 31 LADYSMITH; 34 TWIG; 36 SNEB; 37 FASHION; 39 MISSIS; 40 IONIAN; 41 REASONS; 42 SINGED; 43 GEE-CEE.

DOWN:—1 ROBINS; 2 MIRROR; 3 DAIS; 4 ELSEWHERE; 5 DEALT; 6 IDLE; 7 CRITIC; 8 STORKS; 10 GEMINI; 15 OUTFLOW; 16 KEYRING; 17 WIGWAMS; 18 NEWGATE; 20 IDEAL; 21 GLEED; 24 EASYGOING; 28 SASHEE; 29 STAMPS; 30 NISSEN; 32 INNING; 33 HEINIE; 35 RASED; 37 FIRE; 38 NOSE.

and I very rarely go to a Hollywood film. I felt aggrieved, and I noticed it was affecting me in such a way that I did not even want to go to one of the few good American films which had come over among the dozens of bad ones.

We in Great Britain feel ourselves increasingly part of Europe. We just missed the complete ruin which overtook other European countries. As a general population, we were in the war, and we cannot now disassociate ourselves from the rest of Europe, which is cold and hungry. Our own food is adequate but dull, and our clothes the same. We are thoroughly tired of war restrictions, and yet we know that, for the general good, we must keep on with most of them. We have tried to send food and clothes to European countries which are worse off than we are. It was something of a shock, while we were having another Christmas of making do, to find that all rationing was off in the States, and to read about what was being eaten and worn.

Here again I find myself understanding the position intellectually and realizing too that your over-rapid demobilization has put you into great difficulties. I know that your housing problems are as acute as our own in the normal parts of Great Britain, though of course nothing like ours in the bombed areas. I also know that millions of you are adult, generous, and acting for the good of mankind. Such knowledge, however, does not always affect one's underlying emotions.

This is perhaps partly the fault of the newspapers on both sides, which seem to delight in making mischief for its own sake. But manners as between nations are as important as manners between people, and on both sides of the Atlantic there are those who should be slapped and put in the corner. I am quite sure that you feel the same kind of things about us, and I am terribly afraid that it will react on the British girls who have married American soldiers. I do hope that those of you who have a chance will go out of your way to help them. I also hope that the "nice Americans" will come soon. I think that if a thousand men and women would come here, determined to be ambassadors of good-will, and to smooth down our hurts and suspicions by personal contact—the only thing that we can be really sure of in this world—something could be done.

NAOMI MITCHISON

Argyll, Scotland, January 20

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 162

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 23, 1946

NUMBER 12

The Shape of Things

HAROLD E. STASSEN, WARILY STALKING THE 1948 Republican nomination for President, made a difficult choice last week when he decided against running for the Senate. Two years of oratory on Capitol Hill would keep his name in the news and provide that build-up without which there is small hope for success at the convention. On the other hand, Stassen was well aware that the road to the Senate lay through a bitter primary in which that venerable anachronism Henrik Shipstead would have had to be pried loose from the Senate seat he has clung to for nearly a quarter of a century. Tradition dies hard in Minnesota as elsewhere, and many a Scandinavian farmer still thinks of the Shipstead of 1922—pioneer of the Farmer-Labor movement, colleague of "Old Bob" La Follette, and champion, in general, of the progressive way. The sad truth is that of the old Shipstead only the passionate isolationism remains. He contributed one of the Senate's two votes against ratification of the United Nations charter—a position too extreme even for Burt Wheeler. A defeat by Shipstead in the senatorial primary would have completely eliminated Stassen as a Presidential candidate, and he was not disposed to take the risk. As a result, he will have to keep himself in the limelight as a public-spirited citizen, absorbed in the momentous questions of the day and devoted to constructive criticism of the Administration. That is a hard row for a Republican candidate to hoe. Wendell Willkie tried it between 1940 and 1944, and added so much to his stature that the party turned in panic to Tom Dewey. *

IN NEIGHBORING NORTH DAKOTA AN EVEN more rabid isolationist than Shipstead has suffered a reverse that may finish him as a political figure. Attempting a comeback, Gerald P. Nye went before the Republican State Convention as a candidate for Senator Young's short-term seat. Young was nominated to succeed himself, with 195 votes; Dr. George Schatz, runner-up, got 151 votes; and to Gerald Nye, once a power in the state, went all of 34 votes. The man who couldn't wait for the smoke to lift over Pearl Harbor before attacking Roosevelt for "maneuvering" us into the war has said that he would not compete with Senator Langer for the long-term nomination that comes up in June. If he changes his mind, or if he runs as an independent in November, he is likely to make a better showing than his convention vote indicates; but his chances are not bright. Since his defeat in 1944 he has been living in Maryland, a source of resentment back home. His machine has crumbled, and his ear is no longer attuned to the political breeze of the prairie. With handicaps of such magnitude and a record of warm relations with the shadiest operators of America First, Nye is set not so much for a campaign as for a last gasp.

★

LAST WEEK'S STATEMENT ON INDIA BY PRIME Minister Attlee marked a substantial advance in the thinking of the British government. If its fine words are soon given substance by firm deeds, the world may be spared the horror of a bloody nationalist uprising and the Labor Party will lose much of the stigma of continuing Tory policy in that area. Mr. Attlee declared that India itself must decide its future constitution and its relation to the British Commonwealth and must solve the problems of its minorities and of the position of the feudal princes. He spoke out unequivocally against the use of the Moslems and the princes to bar India's road to independence. It is heartening that Mr. Attlee has recognized that this is the only constructive approach possible at a time when the nationalist movement has reached a new breadth and fervor and has for the first time won the support of the Indian armed forces. It would now seem advisable for Britain to transfer substantial power in New Delhi to a provisional coalition government, proportioned according to the recent provincial elections and empowered to convoke a sovereign Constituent Assembly. Left alone, this Constituent Assembly could probably reach a fair settlement on the broad question of a workable Indian constitution and on minority rights, for the Provincial legislatures from

IN NEXT WEEK'S NATION

Freda Kirchwey

Just back from Buenos Aires gives her Report on Argentina

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	329
The World Bank	331
Agenda for Security	331
First Round to Labor	333
The Army and the Atom	333
A Note from Paris	334

ARTICLES

Fumbling with Famine by I. F. Stone	335
Can the UNO Keep the Peace? by Percy E. Corbett	336
Salazar Is Next by J. L. Teller	339
The Slickest Lobby by Tris Coffin	340
Pro Memoria by Ignazio Silone	342
Poverty Follows the Crops by Carey McWilliams	343
Remember? A Poem by Richard Armour	344
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	345
The People's Front by Del Vayo	346

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Poetry of Hopkins by Delmore Schwartz	347
Top Secret by Arthur J. Goldberg	348
The Danger of Deflation by Leo Barnes	350
Briefer Comment	350
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	353
Music by B. H. Haggin	354
Films by James Agee	354

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

355

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 153

by Jack Barrett 356

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon I. F. Stone Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Assistant Managing Editors: Estella Draper, Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editors:
Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau; 313 Kellogg Building, Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Price: Domestic—One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

which it would be drawn are already heavily weighted with the representatives of minorities. Furthermore, India's representatives, under the scrutiny of world opinion, would wish to prove themselves worthy of such an opportunity.

✱

JOLLY HERMANN GOERING HAS DELIVERED the blandest indictment of the Nazi regime to date, complete with evidence of its ruthless aims and cynical methods. Hitler was nervous about marching into Austria, Goering told the tribunal at Nuremberg, and wanted to wait for Seyss-Inquart, the Austrian quisling, to ask for German troops "to restore order." Whereupon Goering drafted a telegram for Seyss-Inquart to send and then told him not to bother sending it since he had the text already on his desk. Goering also told the court how he used the Spanish civil war as a testing ground for the Luftwaffe and how Hitler summoned Emil Hacha, president of the already truncated Czech Republic, and informed him that he had decided to "eliminate" his country altogether. The horrors of the concentration camps Goering defended on the ground that "We decided to keep power under all circumstances." As simple as that. Without batting an eye, he explained that the "Communists" were the next strongest party in the Reich and therefore, as a matter of course, had to be liquidated, just as "unions were regarded as inimical to our new state and had to be dissolved." No pretense here, no attempt to brand such stories as lies circulated by refugees—an effort frequently resorted to by Hitler's American apologists before and after Pearl Harbor. Raymond Daniell, reporting the trial for the New York Times, writes that Goering admitted he had given the Czechoslovak Ambassador his word of honor that Germany had no designs on his country. "But of course, Goering pointed out, only an imbecile would read into his words any long-term commitment." His testimony will seem ungracious to countless "imbeciles"—a few of whom still sit in the Congress of the United States.

✱

THE POLISH ARMY IN EXILE IS ABOUT TO BE disbanded, according to a report from London. This army numbers some 200,000 men, of whom 107,000 are under the Command of General Anders in Italy, the remainder being in Great Britain, the Middle East and northern Germany. A statement by the present Polish government promising fair treatment to those who return to Poland is being distributed to all ranks in the army. Those who desire to go home will be sent back. Those who refuse will be offered a livelihood elsewhere, but it is stipulated that they must become civilians. Once the Allies recognized the present government of Poland, Britain's maintenance of a Polish army under the command of a general who is anti-Russian and violently opposed to the Warsaw government became intolerable. On the other hand, it is understandable that the British should feel a sense of obligation toward a Polish army which fought bravely on the Allied side. Certainly they have no moral right to force its members to return to Poland. The civilian settlement of those who refuse to go home will not be easy—and we doubt whether it is possible to make a civilian out of General Anders except in name—but the proposed arrangement seems to us both sensible and humane, if a little belated; and it should relieve the UNO of at least one small headache.

The World Bank

Savannah, March 18

THE inaugural meeting of the World Bank and Monetary Fund has appeared on the surface a pretty cut-and-dried affair. Questions of procedure and mechanics which it has discussed have made thin gruel for the large newspaper contingent attracted by the over-grandiose setup of the conference. Such disputes as have occurred were mainly kept behind closed doors, so that to the world this assembly of financial experts has presented, through its spokesman, Secretary of the Treasury Fred Vinson, a face of almost unwrinkled unanimity. Privately, however, some delegates have complained about American steam-roller tactics, and it is clear that when there has been opposition to American views it has been thrust aside.

One instance was the question of the location of the Bank and Fund. Britain, Canada, France, and India, among others, favored New York because there the new institutions would be removed from political influences, in contact with the activities of the world's financial and commercial center, and in proximity to the UNO. The United States, however, insisted on Washington, arguing the desirability of keeping the Bank and Fund as free as possible from private financial interests and pointing out that international economic policy-making had shifted from New York to Washington. And Washington it is to be.

Another Anglo-American dispute concerned the payment and functions of the executive directors. The United States, which envisages the board as a kind of world economic general staff, wanted full-time members at salaries high enough to attract first-class men, while Britain held out for part-time appointments at modest salaries. Again the American view prevailed. In both cases the American delegates had good arguments, but undoubtedly the strongest one was the power of the purse. No countries care to offend the nation to which they are looking for credit infusions to restore their economic health.

Thus the fears of the Bretton Woods critics that Uncle Sam, while paying the piper, would be voted down on the tunes have so far proved baseless.

K. H.

Agenda for Security

ALTHOUGH the international storm continues, the barometer has risen and the wind has abated somewhat. There has been altogether too much wind of late. It has done no skipper any good and has left in its wake a lot of battered gear that now needs considerable mending.

There are hopeful signs of improved conditions. The Security Council meeting, as we go to press, is scheduled for next week. Mr. Bevin has renewed his offer to extend the treaty with Russia and thereby has reminded Tories the world over that ex-prime ministers don't speak for current British governments. Mr. Attlee's statement on India—a body blow perhaps to Mr. Churchill's empire—is one of the first indications that the Labor Party means the kind of business it talked—before its election. But of all the good signs, Mr. Byrnes's St. Patrick's Day address on American policy was most significant. Four sentences are worth quoting in full:

I cannot emphasize too strongly that the United States looks to the United Nations as the path to enduring peace.

We do not propose to seek security in an alliance with the Soviet Union against Great Britain or in an alliance with Great Britain against the Soviet Union.

We propose to stand with the United Nations in our efforts to secure equal justice for all nations and special privileges for no nation.

We must maintain our strength, therefore, for the primary purpose of preserving and using our influence in support of the United Nations. We will not use our strength for aggressive purposes. Neither will we use it to support tyranny or special privileges.

Such linking together of responsibility and power is a healthy note to introduce into American foreign policy today. We do not agree with Mr. Byrnes that our commitment under the charter of the United Nations contains within it the logic of compulsory military training. We believe that in the age of atomic energy such a defense measure is a clumsy anachronism which, purely from a military standpoint, is likely to be highly inefficient. But armed strength should be related to foreign policy. For without clearly defined policy armed strength is as dangerous to international security as the policy of unilateral disagreement which Mr. Byrnes decried.

The place for the clear articulation of the foreign policy stated so eloquently in terms of broad principle is obviously at next week's meeting of the Security Council. We should be warned, however, not to expect too much from the UNO meeting. All the issues will not be disposed of satisfactorily. Some are apt to grow more critical. For, as Mr. Byrnes cautioned, "it takes time to pass from the psychology of war to the psychology of peace. We must have patience as well as firmness."

Winston Churchill
As seen by Oscar Berger

Iran is a good place to begin spelling out the meaning of "equal justice for all nations and special privileges for no nation." Mr. Byrnes had a sharp word for those who "think that whatever they want should be taken by force instead of making their claims the basis of peaceful negotiations." The Soviets, as if in reply to our notes, made reference to the "monopolistic British oil concessions" which Iran is allegedly defending. Now oil may be considered as a prize in the struggle between competing imperialisms or as the necessary basis of modern existence. Unless we want to align ourselves with British and American capitalist claims in the Near East, we must assure the Russians, as well as other peoples, of free access to the rich resources in the Persian Gulf area. In practical terms, this may call for the working out of a development plan by the Economic and Social Council of the UNO. There can be no unilateral solution.

The other objective of Russian expansion in the Near East is a free passage to the Mediterranean—a reasonable enough ambition for a great land-locked nation. But what Russia must remember is that in an ordered world this objective cannot be gained by a demonstration of or actual application of force. The security of our interests as well as of Turkey's requires that the Straits be made an international zone under the United Nations. This principle should also be applied to the other important strategic waterways of the world.

Manchuria is a more complicated and a more obscure picture. General Marshall's report that the situation remains very critical should be taken seriously. Incidentally, his report showed, too, that there is no short cut to establishing stable conditions in such a vast territory, with communications disrupted and with a long, bitter record of war and civil war. This is not to excuse the Red Army's tardy withdrawal from Manchuria or its dismemberment of Manchurian industry. The latter, it appears, expressed a fear of potential American aggression on the basis of its war-won dominance of the Pacific. Our intentions in Eastern Asia must be made clear. Here too the Economic and Social Council could be of service in advising on a scheme of reconstruction which would be directed primarily to the pressing needs of the Chinese people but which would also recognize the special Russian claims in Manchuria, as well as the necessity of bringing China within reach of Western science, techniques, and trade. The recovery of China must be no mere by-product of American economic imperialism.

The moral principles of the Byrnes address must also be applied in reference to the unfinished business of Franco and Perón. Mr. Stettinius, pursuing the logic of the State Department documentation, should be instructed to back France in invoking sanctions against the last European satellite of the Nazi state. As for Perón, his recent election has annulled not one jot of the evidence against him contained in the State Department's Blue Book and The Nation's memorandum. Until he has given proof of the elimination of the fascist menace in Argentina and the restoration of civil rights he should have no place in the councils of the nations.

Two other steps must be taken if outside nations are to regard our declared intentions seriously.

First, we must accept our responsibility in meeting the world's hunger. High-sounding principles of justice and human rights mean little or nothing to starving people. Our belief that men should live as free and peaceful beings must come after and not before our belief that men have a right to live. Our action in the face of the famine that threatens Europe and Asia is, in fact, a declaration of our commitment to the concept of one world.

Second, our recent action in strengthening rather than diminishing military control over atomic energy cannot but be interpreted as a threat by other nations. If our intentions are genuine, then we had better get "that dread agency," to use Mr. Churchill's phrase, into the hands of a functioning Security Council organization as soon as possible. For as long as we guard the secret and, worse, keep making bombs, who but trusting Americans will believe Secretary Byrnes when he says he "looks to the United Nations as the path to enduring peace"?

First Round to Labor

WITH the settlement of the General Motors and General Electric strikes, the country has emerged from the first phase of the struggle to find a satisfactory post-war equilibrium of wages and prices. The pattern of settlement which was first worked out by the oil fact-finding board and later applied to the steel strike has now gained general acceptance. A few minor strikes remain unsettled, the most important being the one at Westinghouse. Other strikes will doubtless occur. But it seems fair to assume that all of them, with the possible exception of John L. Lewis's threatened coal strike, can be settled within the limits of the President's wage-price formula. And Lewis has not yet made demands that go beyond the zone of compromise indicated by the settlement in oil, steel, motors, and other industries.

In many respects the General Motors strike was the most crucial of the post-war tests of strength between management and labor. It was the first big strike as well as the most bitter and the most protracted. Both management and labor chose to make it a test of principle. For management it was a fight to preserve the free-enterprise system, to resist government interference, and, above all, to repudiate the idea that either labor or the public had the right to study the company's books or otherwise concern themselves with its level of profits. The U. A. W., under Walter Reuther's able leadership, fought for higher wages with no increase in prices and for union security, not as immediate ends but in order to formulate a national policy which would prevent a recurrence of the chronic underemployment and depression of the 1930's.

On these principles, as on wages, both sides ultimately compromised. Although Robert R. Wason, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, asserted that General Motors "has saved American enterprise and the American way of life," it is doubtful whether many General Motors stockholders feel that anything has been gained by the long shutdown, since the terms of the settlement approximated those of the President's fact-finding board. Nor did the union achieve a clear-cut victory. Although the wage boost was not linked directly to a rise in prices, General Motors will undoubtedly apply for increased prices under the President's wage-price formula, and in view of the recent increases obtained by Chrysler, Ford, and Hudson, one may assume that its application will be granted. The union was successful, however, in resisting the company's efforts to undermine the union-security provisions of the contract, and on minor issues, such as vacation pay and seniority, it improved its position substantially.

The triumph of the General Electric employees was somewhat more evident because the company had refused, until the final day, to grant a substantial pay increase, and the management was definitely rebuffed in its effort to obtain a prior promise of increased prices.

On the whole, organized labor has more than held its own in the bitter struggles that marked the reconversion period. While it has not succeeded in maintaining take-home pay at war-time levels, it has won wage boosts which in most instances offset the increased cost of living. And it has repelled a vigorous and apparently well-organized attempt on the part of management to take advantage of the readjustment period to undermine the strength of the unions. By and large, labor's war-time economic gains have been maintained; it remains to be seen whether its political gains have been similarly consolidated. The coming struggle between the Reuther and Thomas factions of the U. A. W. at the Atlantic City convention will throw some light on this question. If, as now seems likely, the Thomas faction wins, the U. A. W. may be expected to play a somewhat restricted political role in the next few years. A Reuther victory, on the other hand, would indicate a much more active political role for the union. Although labor has reason to be satisfied with the results of the strikes, this is clearly no time for it to rest on its laurels. Intensified political activity is essential if labor expects to hold the gains that it has won on the picket line.

The Army and the Atom

NO PRINCIPLE is more fundamental to freedom than that the military must be subordinate to civilian authority. It is a principle which permits no compromise. The enormous power inherent in modern arms can be held in check only if it is kept under absolute control. In a democratic society armies must be mere instruments, devoid of any will of their own. To let them share in the formulation of the policies they are designed to implement is altogether foreign and perilous to the democratic tradition; it is to accord them a power which cannot fail to grow and cannot fail to be abused. Yet it is precisely such power that the Senate Atomic Energy Committee now proposes to confer upon the United States Army by allowing it a voice in shaping national policy with respect to the most momentous scientific development of modern times.

It is proposed, under an amendment to the McMahon bill sponsored by Senator Vandenberg, to set up a military liaison board with authority to review and to checkmate the decisions of a civilian atomic-energy commission. This military board could on its own initiative submit recommendations to the commission on any question which in its judgment affected national defense; and if the commission rejected its recommendations, it could take its case to the President for settlement. It is astonishing that of the eleven members of the committee only Senator McMahon resisted this proposal, for its effect is to enthrone the army and to leave the civilian commission with responsibility but no real control.

The army, as General Groves has made abundantly plain, looks upon atomic energy only as a weapon. It will, then, view every decision of the civilian commission as having an effect upon national defense. Consequently it will be able to extend its veto power to every effort toward the development of atomic energy for industrial purposes. It will be able to extend it, and will undoubtedly do so, into the regulations governing the exchange of scientific information. Let the civilian commission attempt to strike off the manacles which General Groves has put upon the nuclear physicists and the military board will scream that this freedom is inimical to national security. Research and experimentation respecting the potentialities of atomic energy in the field of medicine—believed by those best informed to be soon realizable—would be arrested and blighted by the narrow military concept that the atom is nothing but a bomb.

Even from the narrow standpoint of security, this military chaperonage of a civilian commission can produce only frustration. For men of science will not, and indeed cannot, work in the atmosphere of repression, intimidation, and secrecy with which General Groves has surrounded them. Ideas kept secret are sterile; they germinate only when afforded fertilization through contact with others, through free circulation. American scientists must have this freedom if they are to retain the leadership they have achieved in the atomic field.

More serious still, the world will be plunged into an arms contest which must inevitably prove catastrophic. The Federation of Atomic Scientists did no more than illuminate the self-evident when it called the Vandenberg amendment "a clear declaration to the world that the people of the United States will put their faith only in military might."

But let us go back to where we began. More odious and more alien to the American system than a reliance upon military might is an acceptance of military rule. And this is the inescapable implication of what has been proposed. Congress enacted a statute in 1870 providing that "no officer of the army on the active list shall hold any civil office, whether by election or appointment." This was mere formal recognition of what had long before become established tradition. For the armed services to be represented on the Atomic Energy Commission by their civilian chiefs is reasonable enough. For their own uniformed personnel to act for them as constituent elements in the government would mean that militarism reigned. There would be no end to such authority, since every phase of our life impinges upon national security. If the army is permitted to review the decisions of the Atomic Energy Commission, it will in time insist upon reviewing the decisions of the Department of State or the Department of Agriculture. We can embrace such an innovation only at the most fearful peril.

A Note From Paris

Paris, March 15

AFTER the nationalization of the banks France is getting ready for a more ambitious step, the nationalization of the electric and gas industries. The first draft of this measure was defeated in the Commission de l'Equipeement of the Constituent Assembly last Thursday night. However, at the end of a long session, the commission adopted a new draft prepared under the personal supervision of Prime Minister Gouin. Concessions had to be made by all the parties, and the result was naturally a compromise. But even in its present form the measure is of tremendous significance and cannot fail to have important repercussions on the rest of Europe, which is following with passionate interest France's daring program in the direction of planned economy. By combining nationalization of the big networks with private control of certain companies, France expects to reach the maximum of its electrical potential. The country cannot rely entirely on coal, particularly since coal imports from Germany are tied up in the complicated international issue of the Ruhr. What coal cannot provide, electricity must. Every industry, especially iron and steel, is waiting impatiently for power. The French workers are waiting too. The story of the French miners contains a wonderful lesson for the world. American workers' delegations should visit the French pits; they would come away with a better understanding of this country's extraordinary effort toward recovery. The miners' example was one of the strong arguments for the nationalization of electricity; in the light of it, all the talk about private initiative sounded quite ridiculous. I think their example has also given courage to Léon Blum. I talked with him for a few minutes last night just before he left by plane for Washington. With his unusual critical insight, he realizes perhaps more clearly than anyone the difficulty of his mission. Few men would have undertaken it with his deep conviction that he speaks for a very poor country, but one now awakening to the slogan heard in every public gathering of the left: "Produce and Work."

A. DEL V.

Important Announcement

Nation readers are cordially invited to hear the first report on Perón and Argentina by Freda Kirchwey, who has just returned from a survey of conditions in that country.

Miss Kirchwey will present her report at a special meeting arranged by The Nation Associates on Sunday, March 24, at 2:30 o'clock at the Belmont Plaza Hotel, 49th Street and Lexington Avenue, New York City.

Fumbling with Famine

BY I. F. STONE

Atlantic City, March 18

AT NIGHT on the boardwalk outside the huge brown pile of the fashionable Traymore, where the Council of UNRRA is meeting, there are still reminders of World War II. G. I.'s with one leg or none pass in their wheelchairs, pushed by a buddy or a nurse. These are the finished business of the war. The unfinished business—the task of cleaning up the debris, of making torn earth fruitful again, of saving half a billion people from a famine which may prove more deadly than the conflict itself—depends in part on the efforts of the delegates from forty-three nations gathered in the immense hotel.

This is a serious meeting, with little pageantry or platitude. There was just enough of the former at the opening session in the main dining-room, with the massed flags of the United Nations in the background under the high-arched cream-and-gilt ceiling. The delegates sat at long tables covered with fresh green baize. Beside each delegate was a black-and-white printed card with the name of his country on it. The camera men, kings of such occasions, took over at the very start, and the faces around the table composed themselves into properly statesman-like lines as the flashlight bulbs went off and the movie cameras churned.

The opening messages and speeches by the President, Governor Lehman, the local mayor, and Sol Bloom were decently brief. Representative Bloom, an old trouter, departed from text to picture millions abroad "with outstretched hands . . . praying, praying, praying" to UNRRA for help. The appeal did not seem as corny as it might have to those who had caught a glimpse of the confidential cables coming in from UNRRA men in the field. Governor Lehman, whose sudden resignation as Director General is deeply regretted here, said gravely at his first press conference, "I'm afraid there will be great suffering." He spoke like one who had taken worry to his bed at night and to breakfast in the morning.

The rapidly developing famine abroad is not entirely due to the war, devastating as that was. It is as though some angry providence were visiting affliction on destructive mankind, for there has been a succession of natural catastrophes. Severe droughts in the last two seasons have reduced the wheat crops in several of the world's granaries—Argentina, Australia, South Africa, French North Africa. The supply of man's other great staple, rice, has been cut not only by war in Burma and Indo-China but by recent typhoons in Japan and the failure of the moisture-bearing monsoon in India. In the rice-producing areas of China, as in the Balkans, drought moved in as occupying armies moved out. Even Antarctic wastes did not produce as expected; one of the reasons for the crucial shortage in fats and oils is the poor catch of the British and Norwegian whalers, which headed south again as soon as peace came.

The dimensions of the emergency may be gathered from the report made by the Combined Food Board to the UNRRA Council. Although world wheat and flour exports during the twelve months ending next June 30 will be about 60 per cent above the pre-war average, they will be about 60 per cent below the minimum requirements of a war-ravaged and drought-stricken world. These requirements are understated at 20,000,000 tons; the estimated available supply of wheat and wheat substitutes is only 12,000,000 tons. MacArthur's request for 1,500,000 tons of wheat for Japan, on top of catastrophic crop conditions in India, has made the problem "insoluble in full." The phrase is the Combined Board's. It means starvation for millions.

The responsibility for most of the deaths will be upon the American doorstep. The fatal and shameful error was President Truman's lifting of meat rationing last September, a move which shocked our European Allies. At the food conference held at Hot Springs after we entered the war it was agreed that it would be necessary to continue rationing in this country for eighteen months to two years after V-Day if devastated areas abroad were to be fed. Judge Samuel I. Rosenman's report to Mr. Truman last April 26 was more than a reminder of this obligation. His comprehensive 236-page survey showed the inescapable necessity for continued rationing if Europe was to be fed and put back on its feet again. This was the main point of a State Department broadcast last August 11 in which Joseph C. Grew, Archibald MacLeish, and Willard Thorp participated.

Past warning, advice, and policy were brushed aside by the White House. The lifting of meat rationing at a time when much pent-up purchasing power was available provided a boom market for the packers and made it more profitable for farmers to feed grain to livestock than to sell it for bread. There were bumper crops, and the Department of Agriculture was far more interested in absorbing surpluses through expanded meat production than in providing against hunger abroad. When Governor Lehman, presenting his final report to the UNRRA Council today, said, "The premature removal of food controls in certain countries was, in my judgment, quite unjustified and has contributed greatly to the present tragic position," he meant only one country, the United States. Canada and Britain have intensified their rationing since the war ended. Canada's magnificent contribution to the fight against post-war hunger puts our own country to shame, and Britain, despite its own incredibly meager rations, has shipped over 700,000 tons of cereals and cereal products to Europe in the past eighteen months.

Recent Administration statements on food are building up into an anthology of sour humor. At the White House food conference on March 1 Secretary of Agriculture Clinton P. Anderson said we would have to "strain ourselves a little more" to prevent starvation abroad. The strain is hardly perceptible. Food consumption is about one-third above last year, and meat consumption during the last quarter of 1945 was one-fourth above the pre-war level. With the removal in November of ration controls on fats and oils American consumption hit a per capita rate of 45 pounds a year as compared with 3.3 pounds in Poland and 4.8 in Italy.

"I am taking every practicable measure," President Truman said in his message to the UNRRA Council, "to assure that the United States does not fall behind the other supplying nations of the world." The joker is in the word "practicable"; there are few at this meeting who think the voluntary methods on which the Hoover Famine Committee is relying can come anywhere near doing the job. Again it was the United States and President Truman whom Governor Lehman had in mind when he told the council today he was convinced that "much more can still be done" if the leaders of the United Nations "are sufficiently courageous in their actions" to take "strong and . . . politically unpleasant measures." Washington is the only United Nations capital to which those phrases could apply. Reimposed rationing and measures to liquidate expanding herds of livestock are essential if millions abroad are to have a bare minimum of bread. In what promises to be a turbulent and controversial session there will be general agreement on one point. For all the instinctive kindness of the American people, on the famine front their government has been doing a shabby job.

Can the UNO Keep the Peace?

BY PERCY E. CORBETT

Professor of Government at Yale University; author of "Post-War Worlds"

THE first meeting of the United Nations Organization, held in London in January and February, plowed its dogged way through a large amount of indispensable work. The meeting was designed primarily to set up the considerable machinery necessary for the new league of nations. Some of these primary agenda items, such as fixing on a site for headquarters and appointing the Secretary General, were sufficiently contentious to make headline news. But for the most part they had to yield in publicity to the substantive problems of world politics, which were supposed to form only a subsidiary item in the program of this first and principally constituent session.

That public attention should focus mainly on the UNO's substantive business rather than on its structure is natural and right. But if the choice of a Norwegian Secretary General and a New York-Connecticut site, together with some inconclusive skirmishing on northern Iran, Greece, Syria, Lebanon, and the Dutch East Indies, were all that stuck in the popular memory of a month's deliberation, there would be ample excuse for an initial impression of futility. As a counter-agent, some emphasis on the structural achievement is warranted.

From now on the General Assembly will figure chiefly as an agency for regulating the internal economy of the United Nations Organization and a forum for the discussion, not the decision, of international questions. But in London it was the essential constituent organ. It even had to create the Security Council, which henceforward will overshadow it in the actual disposition of international business. The practical reason for this temporary precedence is plain. The General Assembly was, as it were, ready-made. No election was necessary. It consists of representatives of all the United Nations.

For itself the General Assembly adopted and tested a code of procedure and a pattern of committee assignment made ready last fall by a Preparatory Committee adequate to its wide field of consultative and electoral activity. It elected the non-permanent members of the Security Council and set that body on its way. It picked eighteen states to constitute the Economic and Social Council, which promptly began its work. Ballots in the Security Council and General Assembly provided the International Court of Justice with its bench of fifteen judges, and the court was given the prospect of immediate business by Britain's offer to submit for decision its dispute with Guatemala over the territory of Belize. Steps were taken to set up the Commission for the Promotion of Human Rights, promised in Article 68 of the San Francisco Charter. Other organs for social tasks were established, among which should be mentioned a committee on refugees and displaced persons and a commission to continue the League of Nations' control of narcotic drugs. Finally, and perhaps most important of all, provision was made for a commission on atomic energy.

This record is enough to dispel any notion that the London session was an idle performance. The San Francisco Charter has at least received its essential mechanical implementation. The important question remains whether the meeting provided any indications as to how the machinery may work and what beneficial results may be expected from its operation.

There were in the first place some significant negative indications. It should be abundantly plain now, if it was not so before, that the most destructive war in history has not produced any revolutionary change in the nature or tone of world politics. The record shows few demonstrations of brotherly love and plenty of bickering. The election of non-permanent members of the Security Council, the appointment of a Secretary General, and the choice of a site were field days for balance-of-power tactics and the sharpest type of diplomatic horse-trading. Great and small powers alike showed their traditional concern for sovereignty and prestige. Far from marking any closer approach to world federation, the session emphasized the difficulties to be anticipated in operating even a league type of international association.

This revelation of the sameness of things has evoked a variety of responses. One is a fresh blast of scorn for the unreality of international organization and a call to isolationist nationalism. Another is righteous indignation—at once the easiest and the most respectable escape from the hardship of thinking things through—over the stupidity of our own and the knavery of foreign governments. This leads sometimes to the isolationist camp and sometimes to its direct opposite, namely, the appeal to the peoples behind governments for an immediate fusion in one world union. Finally, there is a response which may be hoped to be that of the majority of the persons who are actively concerned. This is a fairly cheerful acceptance of human limitations, coupled with determination to get on with the business of strengthening the restraints on the arbitrary conduct of states.

Isolationism is blind retreat into a vanished past. The world-federation response is ideally good but ignores some stubborn facts that were thrown into sharp relief once more by the London meeting. It looks as if the attitude with the most potentialities of progress were the unspectacular and uninspiring refusal either to abandon effort or to demand the impossible.

Once we stop talking, even to ourselves, in the temptingly sonorous terms of "new eras," we may find some comfort in the very plain language used by Mr. Bevin and Mr. Vishinsky in their frequent jousts in the Security Council. It had at least the merit of not concealing in euphemistic vapor the broad divergences of outlook and interest that separate the Soviet Union from Britain and the United States. Security will probably not suffer if diplomacy dispenses with the ruse of glossing over disagreement with tributes to "essential harmony of interests" and "the universal spirit of cooperation."

As for the proceedings in which these clashes occurred, it is too early yet to say whether they advanced the prospect of an equitable settlement of the Russian-Iranian dispute concerning the Azerbaijan province and its autonomy movement, improved the chances of democratic government in Greece, or contributed anything to the achievement of self-government in Indonesia. There is some evidence that they accelerated the withdrawal of at least the British troops from the Levant states. Apart from the question of any immediate results, however, the solicitude of the Soviet government for the liberty of weak or dependent peoples would have given firmer ground for satisfaction if the situation as a whole had not suggested (a) that this solicitude extended chiefly to peoples outside the Russian "joint defense zone," and (b) that its manifestation on this occasion was a diversionary move to distract attention from current complaints against Moscow. Certainly Americans will welcome any consistent support of those anti-imperialist principles which their delegates have championed throughout the discussion of trusteeship.

The Soviet use of the veto during the session has aroused some justified anxiety about the future effectiveness of the Security Council. The veto was reluctantly accepted by the small nations, and by advocates of international organization the world over, as a recognition in law of the practical consideration that no coercive action could in fact be taken against one of the super-powers without the gravest risk of a world war. As they have officially declared in their report, the Canadian delegates at San Francisco "were influenced in their decisions in this matter by the statements of the great powers that their special voting position would be used with a sense of responsibility and consideration for the interests of the smaller states, and that therefore the veto would be used sparingly." Nor were these statements made to influence merely the Canadian delegation.

In London the Soviet delegation had recourse to the veto formally or informally in three cases—first to prevent the selection of the British and American candidate for the office of Secretary General, then to prevent Britain's formal acquittal of the charge of threatening the peace by maintaining troops in Greece, and finally to defeat a resolution expressing the Security Council's "confidence that the foreign troops in Syria and Lebanon will be withdrawn as soon as practicable."

This could hardly be called sparing use. Moreover, the type of occasion was no less disturbing than its frequency. It was scarcely contemplated, for example, that the will of a majority would not be allowed to prevail in matters of appointment, or that the veto might be used—whether or not any question of action was involved—at any point in the Council's examination of a case where a permanent member felt displeased with the turn things had taken. At this rate all substantive business must hang on the mere pleasure of each permanent member. The experience is eloquent on the worth of "understandings" designed to qualify a written text.

On the other hand, it might well have been wiser strategy for Britain, France, the Netherlands, and the United States to welcome inquiry on the spot into all the charges preferred by the Soviet Union. In the case of Greece and the Levant states immediate evacuation rather than inquiry was asked; but there too it would have been possible to offer compliance with any decision reached by the Security Council after first-hand investigation.

If it be one of the major problems of the moment, first, to convince the U. S. S. R. that the Western world has no designs on its security, and secondly to make it believe that the UNO will be a more effective instrumentality than military might in furthering its over-all interests, then it will pay to permit it to utilize to the full all UNO procedures. This would not be appeasement. It could take the form of laying everything open to impartial examination and firmly asking the same freedom in return. It will probably be bad for Britain and for peace in general if Mr. Bevin, in his devotion to the Churchill policy of saving the empire, finds it necessary to take the high tone of perfect righteousness every time imperial activities are called in question.

Nor, in this effort to demonstrate that all the resources of investigation and adjustment belonging to the UNO are as open to the Soviet Union as to anyone else, should we stick pedantically to the abstract criteria suggested by Mr. Stettinius on February 11. The permanent delegate of the United States holds that no investigation should be ordered unless the Security Council believes that "continuance of the situation" is likely to endanger international peace and that investigation will not introduce new complications but will promote just settlement. The peace will undoubtedly be endangered if the Soviet government becomes convinced that any UNO procedure is being held closed to it.

It is fairly clear from the comment on Mr. Churchill's speech of March 5 that the United States will be in no hurry to formalize its de facto alliance with Britain. Little would be gained and much might be lost by doing that now. The problem at the present stage is not security against Russia; it is the discovery of solid common ground with Russia. Geography and a certain community of values conspire to throw Britain and the United States into the same camp on the major issues of foreign policy. That, plus a number of joint working arrangements which Mr. Churchill passed over too lightly, is alliance enough for the moment. Already the American and British delegations to international conferences manifest a marked tendency to solidarity. To put this on a contractual basis would reduce, not increase, the chance of making the UNO a successful agency of collective security, for that chance depends on serious Russian participation. The essential thing at the moment is to work the UNO for all it is worth, not to make fresh international arrangements against the event of its failure.

The Security Council is holding its second session in New York this month. We have another chance of appraising its capacity to find peaceful methods of composing conflicts of interest between the great powers. But an even stiffer test is just in the offing. The Atomic Energy Commission, which is the Security Council plus Canada, will begin its work this spring, and it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that the prospect of peace is only as great as the prospect that this commission may in good time devise an acceptable plan of control.

Salazar Is Next

BY J. L. TELLER

Editor of the Independent Jewish Press Service on leave abroad; foreign correspondent for the Jewish Morning Journal

Lisbon, March 9

EVENTS in Spain and Portugal run closely parallel. Leaders of the anti-fascist underground and their confederates in the army and navy tell me that the deadline for Salazar's overthrow has been fixed. It will come within a fortnight after the fall of Franco; it may even precede the change of government in Spain. Those who are planning the coup intend to set up a provisional military regime which will supervise the first free democratic elections held in Portugal in twenty years.

The Anti-Fascist Committee is composed of representatives of the Republican Party, a progressive middle-class party; two Socialist factions, the Socialist Party and the Union of Socialists; the Communist Party; and various prominent individuals without political affiliations. Working with the committee are a number of naval officers—almost congenitally anti-Salazar—and army officers who have turned against Salazar under the impact of recent events in Spain. The anti-fascists now boast of considerable infiltration into the garrisons in the environs of Lisbon, which were formerly among the regime's most loyal supporters. These garrisons are given everything that Portugal can afford in the matter of equipment, while the suspect provincial garrisons are kept under-supplied.

The rebels chafe under the alleged indifference of public opinion in the democratic countries to conditions in Portugal and charge the governments of Britain and the United States with conspiring to maintain the Salazar regime. Some prefer to retain their faith in America and contend that the actions and utterances of Ambassador Baruch should not be confounded with official American policy, but even these patient souls were shocked by Baruch's speech at a reception for Cardinal Spellman, in which our ambassador praised the government of Salazar just as the United States was signing, with Britain and France, a virtual ultimatum to Franco.

It is hard for friends of the United States to comprehend how this country can play Britain's game of supporting Salazar when it is generally acknowledged that Britain's special economic privileges in Portugal derive from Salazar. The only explanation, Portugal's progressives say, is the influence of the Vatican on American policy. Each time Baruch delivers a speech lauding the regime, fence straddlers among high army officers reiterate their view that the overthrow of Salazar might alienate Britain and the United States. When Baruch first arrived in Lisbon, the liberals here pinned great hopes on him. Hundreds of persons flocked to the embassy and left cards on which they had scribbled a single word, "democrat." Baruch's acknowledgment of this touching demonstration came several days later when he delivered his first speech for Salazar. His generous praise of the dictator ever since has embarrassingly exceeded all requirements of protocol. One of Portugal's leading progressives once asked him, "When will you help us achieve free elections?" And he replied—the story was told me by the person who put the question—"Why elections? They only bring sanguinary repercussions."

Britain has good reasons to fear the overthrow of Salazar. Tied to the sterling group, Portugal can carry on very little trade with other countries. Britain, furthermore, holds exclusive purchasing rights to some of Portugal's major products, so that Portuguese exporters cannot sell at the higher prices other clients would pay. Take sardines, for example. Britain pays 285 escudos a case and sells them to other countries at nearly double that rate; the Portuguese are helpless since the entire sardine output has been sold in advance to Britain at its own price. Britain's debt to Portugal, incurred in less than two years, now amounts to nearly a hundred million pounds sterling. The Anglo-Portuguese Telephone Company is a British concern, as is Lisbon's tram corporation. Portugal's democrats are convinced that Britain would be reluctant to see the overthrow of the regime which gave it these concessions.

A few months ago British secret agents made contact with the anti-Salazar underground, but their overtures were rebuffed. The Anti-Fascist Committee prefers to ascribe obtuseness rather than malice to the British newspaper correspondent who, having obtained the confidence of underground leaders, published a list of provincial garrison commanders who allegedly headed the anti-Salazar movement in the army. It is confident that despite all vacillations the army will follow through once the first step has been taken, but it recognizes that the army's frame of mind depends greatly on the attitude of Britain and the United States.

The underground leaders were greatly encouraged last October when the dictator in a spurious pre-election gesture—there was only one candidate for the Presidency, a man hand-picked by Salazar—granted his people freedom of political assembly. República, an insignificant daily with a total circulation of 15,000, primarily in the provinces, accepted in good faith the dictator's change of heart and ran a series of editorials critical of the regime. Within a few days its circulation in Lisbon alone rose to 100,000 (Lisbon's total population is 750,000, of whom 60 per cent are illiterate). A committee for democratic unity circulated petitions requesting that the government defer the elections for six months to permit the opposition to present its case to the voters. In less than a week some fifty thousand persons, including army officers and civil servants, had signed the petition. Thereupon the frightened government rescinded the privilege it had granted, and the police began a diligent scrutiny of the petitions. Many signers were held for questioning.

All this revealed the latent strength of the opposition. Business men and industrialists now see Salazar's regime as a peril to Portugal's post-war prosperity. Exporters especially are annoyed by Britain's maintenance of blockade regulations in peace time, its requirement that goods exported from Portugal have a British navicert. While Salazar has the backing of the Catholic church, the strongly Catholic rural population has been turned against him by the mulcting practices of the bureaucrats of the state-controlled agricultural cooperatives. The disaffection of the industrial workers, who have always been regarded as a medium for anti-Salazar ferment, was heightened during the war years, when they obtained no increase in wages though the cost of living rose between 400 and 500 per cent. Those who have set the deadline for Salazar wonder whether our State Department has established an axis with the Portuguese bankers, Espirito Santo and Fonseca Santos e Viana, who are Salazar's main supporters. They say, "We shall meet the deadline regardless."

The Slickest Lobby

BY TRIS COFFIN

Commentator for the Columbia Broadcasting Company

Washington, March 12

THE housing needs of millions of veterans and other Americans are being frustrated by one of the most powerful and versatile lobbies ever to descend on Washington. The combined pressure of big builders, real-estate men, and lumber and materials interests has virtually smothered any large-scale housing—in spite of the desperate emergency.

The brains behind the lobby are Herbert U. Nelson, a charming old man who is executive secretary of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, and Cotton Northrup, short-tempered, sarcastic representative of the National Retail Lumber Dealers' Association. Some days ago a Congressman pleaded with Northrup not to block veterans' housing. "These men were overseas fighting for you," he said. "They weren't fighting for me," Northrup snapped back.

Reputed to have from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000 to spread around, the lobby is not at all modest about its achievements. Nelson is very proud that it was able to water down the Patman emergency home-building bill and tie the hands of Housing Coordinator Wyatt.

In opposing the Administration's efforts to promote low-cost building the lobby has used five different methods. The first was infiltration into the government. Builders, real-estate men, and supply experts were brought to Washington by every train in the early days of the war to help in the great building program of the army, navy, and other agencies. By whispering in the right ears these men succeeded in keeping price controls off real estate and housing, the fourth largest industry in the nation.

The slickest play by the infiltration technique was made last fall when an inter-agency construction committee was created to work with the builders on reconversion. The real-estate interests induced Reconversion Director John W. Snyder, the little Missouri banker who became President Truman's economic adviser, to name Hugh Potter, one of the biggest speculative builders in the United States, as head of this committee. The story of how Potter made it his first task to get rid of WPB Order L-41 was told by Maurice Rosenblatt in The Nation of February 9.

L-41 was the control order that gave priorities to low-cost housing—under $8,000—and left more expensive building to scabble for scarce materials. With L-41 out of the way, the builders could go merrily into the construction of stores, theaters, and expensive houses, which meant bigger money. This should be quite plain to Congressmen, for many stores in Washington are getting fancy new fronts while houses can't be found. Hugh Potter is now back in Texas, where he has launched several big developments, but his influence on Snyder has not entirely worn off. The President's Reconversion Director remained practically neutral on the Patman bill, damning it with faint praise.

The second method of the lobby was to bombard builders, lumber dealers, and real-estate men throughout the nation with inflammatory "news letters." One of the most effective of these is Headlines, put out by the N. A. R. E. B. An editorial in a recent issue entitled Property Owners Must Wake Up lumped together Colliers, the OPA, and the C. I. O. as the source of "slurring attacks" and "government propaganda" against the real-estate business and declared that organized labor had a billion dollars and a sinister propaganda machine to defeat the interests of the little real-estate man. "Property ownership," it said, "... needs to have every property-owner fighting mad." Other articles have asserted that the Wyatt housing program would cause builders to lose money.

A third method has been to flood Washington with telegrams signed by local business men. In a two-week period Representative Patman received 257 telegrams from Houston and Dallas, and other Congressmen nearly as many, all protesting violently against the Patman bill. Patman, an old hand in Congress, sniffed suspiciously at these telegrams, but his suspicions were not confirmed until he had politely answered them. Then George Vaughn and Sons of Dallas wrote him that they had sent no telegram. Patman asked Western Union to find out just who had. Investigation revealed that an unidentified man had come into the Western Union Dallas office with a roll of bills and a list of names and asked that the telegrams be sent.

Other interesting information was supplied by the Post Office Department, which returned a score of Patman's replies stamped "Not in Directory" or "Not Called For." Patman asked Attorney General Clark to have the FBI look into the matter, but the Justice Department said there was no violation of a federal law. According to Clark, it is O. K. to sign a false name to a telegram.

A fourth method was for the big pressure groups to send out advertisements for real-estate and building firms to insert in local papers. Some were full-page ads.

The fifth—and this method is as old as the hills—was to round up constituents to buttonhole Congressmen in the corridors and lunch rooms and glare from the galleries during the voting. It is estimated that the N. A. R. E. B. tried to influence 50 per cent of the Congressmen in this way. The local delegations were rotated so there was always some home-town lobby in Washington during the fight on the Patman bill.

The arguments of the buttonholers were direct and blunt. Housing subsidies were "an attempt to communize America"—the alternative proposed was to raise prices all along the line. The Wyatt-Patman program would put half the builders out of business. And as a clincher, "You vote for the Patman bill, and we'll defeat you this fall. At least, you can be damn sure we won't donate anything to your campaign."

On the surface it is a mystery why builders, real-estate men, and materials suppliers should spend so much time and money to defeat a housing program. There are two explanations. The construction of houses costing less than $10,000 is not very alluring to men excited by the smell of big profits. And a low-cost housing boom would dent and perhaps wreck some very profitable business in lumber and other conventional construction material—since builders would have to find cheaper substitutes. The needed substitutes are already appearing, too. Henry Kaiser testified before the House Banking and Currency Committee that he was using waste lumber and aluminum in his housing developments and that they were working out just as well as lumber. Kaiser said significantly, "The lumber boys had better get the wood out of the forests, or they'll find themselves out of business." Representative Patman has in his office samples of new building materials made of cotton burs, formed plywood, palmetto, and aluminum. Use of these would cut a lot of the gravy out of the materials and lumber business.

The Administration has been no match for this lobby. President Truman does not have the genius of Franklin Roosevelt for organizing the Administration and its friends in Congress into a single, smashing team. Wyatt and Bowles are carrying the load almost by themselves downtown. Patman has had very little hard-working support on Capitol Hill. The old-line veterans' organizations have been lackadaisical. The American Legion took no stand on the Patman bill; the Veterans of Foreign Wars belatedly supported it. Only the American Veterans' Committee and the Amvets are in there pitching. One of the prize exhibits in Patman's office is a cable from the Tokyo chapter of the American Veterans' Committee. Wasting no words, it says, "The national housing shortage is apparent to everyone but Congress."

Such a message is fine for a feature story, but it will take a lot more than slogans to pass the Patman bill and get the Wyatt program started.

Pro Memoria

BY IGNAZIO SILONE

Author of "Bread and Wine," "Fontamara," and "Seed Beneath the Snow"

EVERYTHING concerning the causes and effects of this war has already been said, but since people forget so easily, it is necessary to reiterate several points which might be overlooked in the final analysis.

In search of the reason for the political failure of Italian socialism in the last post-war period—that is, after the First World War—Gramsci and Turati, two leaders of the Italian Socialist Party from 1919 to 1922, reached the same conclusion although they started with contrary points of view. This was that the labor movement was annihilated not by Fascism, as is generally thought, but by its own intrinsic incapability. The German labor movement was destroyed in the same way. Before they turned to Hitler, the German masses followed the Social Democratic and Communist parties. Hitler, therefore, represented not the reason for their failure but the result of the confusion in their ranks.

Let us look at the intrinsic incapability which condemned Italian socialism to political sterility and defeat.

In 1919 and 1920 there was organized unity in the labor class in Italy; unfortunately, individual members were not in agreement about their plans and aims. Neither the political organization nor the trade unions were capable of coordinating the workers' conflicting desires or of achieving the necessary changes in the structure of society and the state. Both the maximalist policy of the Socialist Party and the reformist policy of the trade unions and cooperatives had the bad effect of isolating the working class; they discouraged the farmers and the middle class and pushed them into the arms of the reactionary agrarian bloc and the capitalists. The anti-patriotic and anti-religious attitude of the Socialist Party also contributed to the isolation of the proletariat and facilitated the treason of Fascism, which was able to disguise its purpose as the salvation of family, country, and civilization.

These reasons for defeat were frequently and sadly enumerated by the Socialists and Communists during the long period of Fascist oppression. But now they do not seem to be present in the consciousness of the leaders. We ought to realize that the most serious menace to the development of Italian democracy and socialism is the idea that if we are defeated, it will be the work of "secret reactionary forces." It will be our fault if such a dangerous hypothesis is generally accepted. The danger evidently lies in the timid detachment of the numerous anti-Fascist groups, in their anxious expectation of a panacea which does not exist, in the sacrifice of the effective concord of free minds to the fetish of organizational unity. Unfortunately, the danger also lies in the illusion that the agitation of the masses can clear a path toward a definite goal and that all structural changes can be postponed till better times.

The most alarming aspect of the violence now prevalent in many Italian provinces is not its intensity but the rioters' lack of common aims correlated with a national plan. This situation invites disaster. The parties of the left will fail in their duty completely if they do not succeed in utilizing, in an intelligent and constructive way, the vital forces at their disposal.

All this reminds us, with despairing monotony, of the events of 1919. Is it really necessary to show that not all agitation is by definition revolutionary? The difference between a movement which seeks its goal within itself and a creative revolution is as the difference between black and white. As for the present delay in political activity, one should remember that time plays a decisive role in all political crises—revolutionary energies cannot be preserved like plums, to be used later. The moment comes when a political crisis stops maturing and begins to rot. One would have to be ignorant of the ABC's of political history to believe in a gradual and progressive accumulation of strength for the left. A political crisis which drags on indefinitely without evolving into anything new and permanent becomes subject to a complete psychological reversal among the people; those who today support the revolution may tomorrow hail the counter-revolution. It is not necessary to re-examine the course of events in 1919 to be convinced of the truth of this statement; one need merely consider the developments of the last few years in various Mediterranean countries. The best way to fight a danger has always been to recognize it. In this case great intelligence is not required—memory should be sufficient.

Poverty Follows the Crops

BY CAREY MCWILLIAMS

OF THE many social problems brought to public attention since the turn of the century, none has so persistently eluded effective action as seasonal farm labor. The sorry plight of the tatterdemalion army that follows the crops has been exposed time and again. The spotlight of many official inquiries has been focused on it—the Industrial Commission hearings of 1900, the Immigration Commission hearings of 1909, the Industrial Relations Commission inquiry of 1914, the La Follette committee hearings of 1939-40, and the Tolan committee hearings of 1940-41. One of the most powerful and widely read novels of our time, "The Grapes of Wrath," brought the story of seasonal farm labor to a wide audience in America, and John Ford's superb adaptation of the novel to the screen reached uncounted millions. Despite this publicity, however, and making generous allowance for the early work of the Farm Security Administration, seasonal farm labor is worse off today than it was in 1910 or 1920.

The latest, and one of the ablest, analyses of the problem is found in "Seasonal Farm Laborers in the United States," by Harry Schwarz (Columbia University Press). Emphasizing the distinction between "hired hands" and "seasonal farm laborers," Mr. Schwarz estimates that approximately 3,100,000 workers did some seasonal labor in 1943. Most of the seasonal farm workers are of course employed on the large-scale commercial farms. In the last week of March, 1940, a low period for seasonal farm work, 58,000 farms whose 1939 production was valued at $10,000 or more each—1 per cent of all farms by number—employed about 25 per cent of all seasonal farm workers. Analyzing comparative earnings for the period 1910 to 1943, Schwarz finds that "whether measured in terms of money return or adjusted to allow for changes in living costs, farm workers' earnings all during this period were appreciably and increasingly lower than factory earnings" (my emphasis).

In view of this fact, how did it happen that during most of this period there was a vast surplus of seasonal farm workers? The answer, of course, is that there was no alternative employment for them. They were barred from other kinds of work by lack of skill, racial origin, exclusionist trade-union policies, sex, age, physical condition, or a scarcity of industrial jobs. The migrant life, the short periods of employment, and the ever-present surplus of workers have made it next to impossible to organize seasonal farm labor.

In analyzing the economic set-up of the two industries with which he is specifically concerned—fruits and vegetables, and sugar beets—Mr. Schwarz puts his finger on the three factors that have long made for acute conflict between employers and employees. First, labor has always constituted a key item of cost in the production of fruits and vegetables, and to a lesser degree of sugar beets. In some vegetable crops labor costs apparently run as high as 50 per cent of the total cost of production. Secondly, harvest-labor costs are of peculiar importance. When a crop is ready for harvest, most of the previous costs—for fertilizer, seed, and labor for pruning and cultivation—have already been paid. Since the grower can then do nothing about reducing these items, he tends to regard them as overhead. In fact, he comes to believe that his profits will be measured by the amount he can cut from his harvest-labor bill. This tendency is emphasized by the third factor, which is that harvest wage rates can be more easily influenced than the other items of cost. The average grower can do little about reducing taxes, interest rates, irrigation assessments, rent, freight charges, farm-machinery costs, and similar items. Hence his preoccupation—his obsession—with harvest-labor costs. The "squeeze" that is put on unorganized farm workers represents not merely the pressure of organized growers but the cumulative pressures which monopolistic industries are able to exert on organized growers. Small wonder, then, that the seasonal farm worker has always been the low man on our economic totem pole.

One would have expected that during the acute wartime man-power shortage farm labor would score impressive social gains. But while some wage rates did increase between 1940 and 1945, no general gains were recorded. Pursuing an age-old strategy, the large grower interests successfully maintained the insulation of farm labor from the rest of the labor market. They were able to do this by obtaining deferments for regular "hired hands" and by augmenting the supply of seasonal farm labor from groups and classifications outside the normal labor market. For example, they employed 45,000 prisoners of war (in 1943), 12,600 Japanese American evacuees, 4,400 inmates of penal institutions, 2,500 conscientious objectors, 62,000 soldiers, sailors, and marines, tens of thousands of patriotic townspeople, and thousands of workers imported from Mexico and the Bahamas. By such stratagems the large growers avoided the necessity of having to compete with industry for workers.

Using their vast political power, these same interests forced the Administration to transfer control of the farm-labor program from the Farm Security Administration to the Extension Service, that is, to the growers themselves. Thus the excellent policy of holding hearings to determine "fair and reasonable" farm wage rates was quickly reduced to a slick device for maintaining uniform substandard wages. Wages in the sugar-beet industry were fixed at the same rate for 1939, 1940, and 1941 despite the fact that the average price received by growers rose 35 per cent between 1939 and 1941. At these farcical wage hearings labor was seldom represented and the decisions were strictly unilateral.

While agriculture suffered no real man-power shortage during the war, the incentives for increased production coupled with the threat of a shortage accelerated the trend toward mechanization. Actually agricultural employment declined from 1939 to 1944 by 7 per cent, that is, at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent a year, or three times the pre-war rate, although production was greatly expanded. This expansion was achieved, of course, largely through the increased productivity of farm labor.

It should be noted, furthermore, that the technological revolution in agriculture has only just begun. For example, the use of segmented seed, which dispenses with the need for labor in the thinning and blocking processes, first became widespread in the sugar-beet industry in 1943. The new mechanical beet-blocker, introduced in 1942, is reported to reduce labor requirements for blocking from 27.2 man-hours to 2.5 man-hours per acre. The mechanical sugar-beet harvester is just coming into general use. Through these three devices, the jobs of some 93,000 workers are threatened.

In a story carried in the New York Times on January 2, 1946, the International Harvester Company announced that it plans to construct a huge plant in Memphis for the mass production of its new cotton-picker. This machine will pick up to 1,000 pounds of cotton an hour, while the average worker picks only 15 or 20 pounds. One great objection to the cotton harvester combine has been that it picks the leaves as well as the bolls, and in consequence the cotton becomes discolored. Now experiments in California have shown that if the cotton leaves are sprayed with a cyanamid solution while they are covered with dew, the leaves fall off. The difficulty is thus overcome. Once the cotton harvest is mechanized, the demand for labor in cotton areas will be reduced 15 or 20 per cent. This possibility, incidentally, lends real force to Adam Clayton Powell's recent argument that the Negro should "evacuate" the South. However, the demand for labor in the fruit and vegetable industry of the South and West will almost certainly increase.

Despite the mild experimentation with government controls during the war, the farm-labor market is still a chaos systematically exploited by large-scale growers to the detriment alike of the farm laborer and the small farmer. When I wrote "Factories in the Field" in 1939,

I naively predicted that the arrival of the Okies and the Arkies would make it no longer possible for the large-scale growers to manipulate the labor market as they had been doing for fifty years. A large proportion of the thousands of Mexicans they brought in from 1920 to 1929 had had to be repatriated by the cities and counties during the depression, and it hardly seemed credible that the ruse could be worked a second time. However, when the war program drew most of the Okies and Arkies into the defense plants, the Associated Farmers brought about another importation of Mexican labor, this time at the cost of the federal government—a vast improvement over the 1920-29 deal. At the present time a delegation of California growers is in Mexico City lobbying for a renewal of the war-time importation agreement and soliciting 50,000 Mexican braceros for exclusive employment in California agriculture in 1946.

Now, as always, seasonal farm labor is excepted from the protection of unemployment insurance, old-age insurance, wages-and-hours legislation, and the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. Inasmuch as the prices of the major farm commodities have been artificially sustained by government action since 1933—with the promise of aid for two years after the war—one might expect the concept of "parity" to be extended to seasonal farm workers. But the prospects for the enactment of the farm-labor legislation which Senator La Follette presented to the Senate on October 19, 1942, are less bright today than they were then. This legislation would extend the protection of the National Labor Relations Act to agricultural labor on large industrial farms, give the same group of workers the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, regulate private employment agencies dealing with agricultural labor, provide a wage-fixing mechanism by the establishment of an Agricultural Wages Board, and in general extend to farm labor on the large-scale commercial farms the protection of our existing social-security legislation. How far must the industrial revolution in agriculture be carried before Congress sees the wisdom of assisting the victims of this revolution rather than of rewarding its beneficiaries?

Remember?

Is there no memory in mind of man
To recollect the way it was before?
By soon forgetting how it all began,
Must we go through the ghastly thing once more?

Already in a time of still-new peace
The siren voices may be heard to say:
"Manchuria, Iran, Malaya, Greece
Are no concern of ours . . . too far away."

RICHARD ARMOUR

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Information, Please!

LET'S stop inflation," cries the National Association of Manufacturers in a full-page spread which is the latest instalment of its super-colossal advertising campaign. Pointing out that the government is planning to spend four times as much in 1946-47 as it spent in the highest pre-war year, the N. A. M. tells us: "Most thoughtful people believe that government . . . should not spend more than it takes in . . . that it should not keep on going deeper into debt. Yet that is exactly what's happening today. . . . This is the kind of money-handling that causes inflation." As a counter-measure the advertising suggests that people write their Congressmen urging them "to cut the cost of government, eliminating all waste, all unnecessary services, and postponing all expenditures that can be put off until our war bills have been paid." If these things are done, we are assured, we shall soon see results in a fall in the cost of living.

The outstanding feature of this very expensive example of the copy-writer's art is its extreme vagueness. All it really says is that a balanced budget would be a good thing and could be achieved by reducing government expenditures. Yet it seems to me that people who advocate a program of public economy ought to be prepared to show specifically how it can be accomplished. We are entitled to know just what "waste" the N. A. M. considers ought to be eliminated, what services it believes are "unnecessary," and what expenditures it thinks can be postponed. Only when we have such information shall we have a proposition that can be analyzed and debated.

Of course I understand why the N. A. M., like other champions of public economy, is coy about getting down to brass tacks. Economy in general is a popular concept just because it is so noncommittal; economies in detail are bound to be at the expense of particular groups which the apostles of budget-balancing hesitate to upset. For instance, one very useful economy would be to end the mail subsidy given to newspaper and magazine publishers. But if the N. A. M. proposed this practical step it would offend just the men it relies upon for favorable publicity.

However, as long as we talk about economy in vacuo, we shall not get very far. I propose, therefore, to try to make up for the N. A. M.'s reticence by examining the budget for 1946-47 with a view to seeing where cuts might be made.

By far the biggest single item in the budget is national defense, for which $16 billion is provided. Included in this sum are relief appropriations and provision for various other activities connected with winding up the war. Since the services are notoriously wasteful, even though so much of their administrative work has been done by ace business executives in uniform, there might well be room for economy here. But any really important cuts will be dependent on decisions concerning the future size of the army and navy. What are the views of the N. A. M. on this question? It must have some if it is going to talk seriously about budget reduction.

The next largest item is $5 billion for debt interest, which I cannot imagine the N. A. M. would propose to trim in any way. In fact, the banking community, with whom the N. A. M. is reputed to be on fairly intimate terms, is putting on a powerful campaign against the Treasury's cheap-money policy which, if successful, will mean a gradual increase in the cost of carrying the debt. So perhaps we should dismiss any hope of economy in this direction. Nor, I suppose, can we hope for N. A. M. support in reducing or eliminating the $1,585,000,000 set aside for tax refunds. It would never do to deprive industry of its strike reserves!

Now we come to $4,208,000,000 for veterans' benefits and pensions. Obviously there is room for economy here, particularly when we consider the way generous benefits tend to make demobilized men snooty about taking low-paid jobs. What do you say, N. A. M. members, to a cut of at least 25 per cent? Did I hear a murmur about unfortunate political reactions? Well, perhaps you are right; veterans do have a lot of votes. Let's pass on, then, to public works, on which agreement should be easier. Over a billion is provided for the general public-works program, and in his message the President mentioned a total expenditure of $1,740,000,000 for direct public works and grants and loans. Highways and airports are down for something over $300,000,000. Why not leave the first to the states and the second to private enterprise? Or should we first hear the view of manufacturers of automobiles and aircraft?

If I had space, I might go on examining the estimates to show how difficult it would be to get agreement on reducing government expenditure even among a fairly homogeneous group of business men. This does not mean that economies should not be attempted or efforts made to balance the budget. Most liberal economists, although they are supposed to believe in deficits for their own sake, would actually be much happier if we had a balanced budget at this moment. And we might have had one if Congress had not insisted on so large a measure of tax relief last fall. So far as I recall, the N. A. M. raised no protest about that. As for economies in government, I could suggest a lot, most of which would be fought tooth and nail by one or another of the business lobbies.

What is needed just now more than economies is measures to prevent a rise in the cost of government activities. The biggest threat in that direction is a general rise in prices such as is bound to occur if the N. A. M. is successful in its battle to overthrow the OPA. A return to the free market, for which it is clamoring, would under present conditions send prices soaring, raising the cost of a host of government purchases and forcing increases in government salaries beyond those already overdue. For all its ostensible opposition to inflation, the N. A. M. today is its most persistent champion.

KEITH HUTCHISON

[Mr. Hutchison has gone to Savannah to observe the proceedings of the International Monetary Conference and will report on them next week.]

INGRAM LIBRARY
Springfield, Co.

The People's Front

Paris, March 15

THE arrival of Martínez Barrio and Negrín in Paris this week has focused paramount attention on the chances of creating a genuinely representative Spanish Republican government. The French Cabinet, without participating in any way, is following the conversations among the Spanish leaders with deep interest. Winning the battle of democracy in Spain is decisive for France. The fear that lack of action, by the United States and Great Britain would strengthen Franco was expressed today by Salomon Grumbach, chairman of the French Foreign Affairs Commission. "If nothing is done to implement the official condemnation of Franco," he declared, "the joint note of the three powers would have the unfortunate effect of bolstering rather than weakening Franco's position." If France is left to stand alone, if after a few months it finds itself obliged to reopen the frontier, Franco will have won another victory, and much Spanish blood—perhaps not only Spanish—will have to flow before he is finally overthrown.

I already anticipate that a representative regime will not be effected overnight, even though the pressure from below is enormous. Every Republican, whether in France or Mexico or Spain, but especially in Spain, is counting the hours until a strong, united government moves into action. A few nights ago I went to Montrouge, a Paris suburb, to visit four hundred Spaniards who have just returned to France from the Nazi slave-labor camps. It is impossible to describe their misery—and equally impossible to describe their courage. Every shade of political opinion was represented there; yet when I finished my speech an Anarchist, who would normally oppose the Socialist view I expounded, came over to me to express his agreement with everything I had said. All I said was "Unity." And last week-end when I traveled down to the French-Spanish border I found the same agreement. From time to time a Spaniard of the resistance still manages to slip through the frontier barriers. I spoke to one who had just arrived; he brought the same word from home, "Unite, and quickly."

But the problem of creating the kind of government the Republic and the Spanish people need cannot be solved merely by adding a few names to the list of Cabinet members. For the average newspaperman as for the average Spaniard not intimately acquainted with developments in Republican politics since last August, the issue is a simple one: Negrín goes in, a Communist is appointed, and everything is settled. Unfortunately, it is not quite as easy as all that. The question is not one of personalities but of policy. That was true last August when Negrín and I declined Giral's amiable invitation to join his Cabinet; it is still more so now that Giral's obstinacy in handling the problem of the reconquest of the Republic like a Spanish political crisis of twenty-five years ago has resulted in utter failure.

Today as in August two very different policies confront each other. On one side stand the men who believe in the Spanish people, who have no fear of the hard struggle that the reestablishment, the firm reestablishment, of the Republic implies. On the other side are the old-style politicians, tired men who during the Spanish war never had a single moment's faith in victory, whose only hope in exile is that a revolution by the United Nations Organization will spare them the necessity of fighting. The central idea underlying the formation of the Giral Cabinet, as opposed to Negrín's logical solution, was that a government without Negrín and the Communists, a mild regime with a distinct anti-Soviet flavor, would fire the imagination of Washington and London and secure immediate Anglo-American recognition. When this failed to materialize, the faint spark of fighting spirit in the Giral government was extinguished. We refused to enter the Giral Cabinet last August because we felt it was too weak to direct the fight against the fascist Spanish regime; the intervening months have confirmed our original judgment. Certainly eight months of indecision are not likely to strengthen any government in exile.

Here let me make it clear that the "we" refers to those who share Negrín's position. We do not disdain action by the UNO. Indeed, we are convinced that under Franco's terror it would be childish to expect the whole effort for his overthrow to come from the Spanish people themselves; a combination of international action and resistance inside Spain is indispensable to rid the world of a center of fascist activities that constitutes a real menace to the peace. The State Department has told the French government that Franco is no threat to international security. That is what Chamberlain said about Hitler on his return from Munich—and he believed it. Daladier said it too—and he knew he was lying.

From the standpoint of international action as well as that of mobilizing the fight against Franco within Spain, we believe the essential requisite is a strong leadership and a strong Republican government. As Negrín said yesterday in his first talk with the Spanish leaders in Paris, we cannot have the government in exile remendado, revamped, every month. What is done now must be definitive. That is why, despite the urgent need for prompt action, a solution cannot be expected within a few days. It is no simple question of "enlarging" the government but of changing the whole attitude, of giving back to the Republic the spirit it had during the Spanish war.

DEL VAYO

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Poetry of Hopkins

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS. By the Kenyon Critics.
New Directions. $1.50.

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS wrote that Christ was the best of literary critics. This extraordinary statement may have many meanings, though of course from some points of view it is fabulous or meaningless. Certainly it sets a very high and very obscure standard, since Hopkins probably meant to say that the true evaluation of all things was to be found in God's mind. In this life, where we must manage with less gifted critics, Hopkins's claim for Christ as critic may very well suggest the derivative meaning that the New Testament and the Psalms are touchstones of literary style. And if one judged Hopkins's poetry by this means, the comparison would not be unjust, since Hopkins wrote on religious subjects and since the sonnet, which he often used, resembles the psalm as a lyric form. Such a comparison would make clear how distant Hopkins is for the most part from the economy of expression and the homeliness of metaphor which are the most frequent and most difficult signs of a great style.

To think of the best of literary critics is to be reminded of the best literary criticism and of the best judgments of Hopkins. In the introduction to the "Poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins" Charles Williams wrote an excellent essay on Hopkins, and in "After Strange Gods" T. S. Eliot had two pages about Hopkins which are I think unanswerable as an analysis of the limitations of his poetry. It is astonishing that of all the critics in this volume of essays on Hopkins, only F. R. Leavis takes account of Eliot's observations, and Leavis mentions only Eliot's description of Hopkins as a nature poet. This failure to consider Eliot's judgment is all the more astonishing because some of these critics depend so much upon other essays of Eliot, especially the one on the metaphysical poets.

